ENTRE NOUS.

THE King and Queen are to reside principally at Frogmore Lodge until the end of this month, when they will proceed to the Isle of Wight for a brief stay at Barton Manor before going to Scotland. The King will take some short cruises in the Royal yacht Alexandra during his stay in the Isle of Wight.

Their Majesties are to pay a visit to Aldershot shortly, when they will stay for a day or two at the Royal Pavilion, and there is to be a review of the troops.

The King is to hold an Investiture of the Bath and other Orders in the Throne Room at St. James's Palace at noon to-morrow. On Friday, at the same hour and in the same place, his Majesty will hold a Court for the reception of addresses on the Throne, and about twenty are to be presented. There will not be more than three from bodies which claim a prescriptive right of presenting their addresses to the Sovereign on the Throne, and these are to be received first by the King, the unprivileged bodies being admitted afterwards in turn.

It is expected that Queen Alexandra will finally terminate her residence at Buckingham Palace in a few days, when she is to proceed to Sandringham for a short time. The King has placed the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert at Queen Alexandra's disposal for the remainder of the season.

Princess Victoria has not been staying much at Buckingham Palace during the last few weeks, but she has been away in the country with Miss Knollys for rest and change, as she suffered much in health from the shock of her father's death and the fatigue of the various ceremonials in connection with that event. Princess Victoria is going shortly to Christiania on a long visit to the King and Queen of Norway.

A ridiculous paragraph has gone round the papers which states that the King and Queen will go to Scotland "towards the end of July," and that they are expected to take up their residence at Buckingham Palace "during the first fortnight in August." Of course, this is a farrago of nonsense. The King and Queen are not going to Scotland until the middle of August at the earliest, and they will not take up their residence at Buckingham Palace until the beginning of next year. This paragraph must have originated in a lunatic asylum, for who has ever heard of the Court going into residence at Buckingham Palace in August, of all months during the year!

The King has sanctioned an exchange of offices between Sir Fleetwood Edwards, Serjeant-at-Arms in the House of Lords, and Sir Stanley Clarke, Paymaster of the Household. The salary of each post is £1,000 a year. Sir Fleetwood Edwards succeeded Sir Henry Ponsonby as Keeper of the Privy Purse to Queen Victoria, having been previously for many years Assistant Private Secretary and Groom-in-Waiting to her late Majesty. Sir Stanley Clarke was for twenty-five years Equerry-in-Ordinary to King Edward when Prince of Wales and Private Secretary to Queen Alexandra when

LLOYD GEORGICS.

No. I.—By a cynical Tory.

A sanguine prophet is L. G.;
His latest forecast shows it;
A boom in trade we're soon to see.
I wonder how he knows it.

Of evidence I see no scrap
Whence such conclusion follows;
It seems to me like going nap
On, say, next April's swallows.

The Future may be black, or red,
As Heaven and Fate unfold it.
So I'll believe this boom ahead—
As soon as I behold it.

Still, if of rosy paint he choose
To be a florid dauber,
Why, let him so himself amuse
And out-Micaw Micawber.

Lord Beauchamp's change of politics would have horrified his father, who was a Tory of the old school, and he by no means relished Lord Beaconsfield's "education" of the party, and the subsequent developments of that teaching. The late Lord Beauchamp made some excellent speeches as a young man, when he sat in the House of Commons. The first Earl was one of the Tory members for Worcestershire for thirty years, and the Lygons were always regarded as stout pillars of "the good old cause." The late Earl succeeded his elder brother, who was warmly attached to a well-known female of high rank who long survived him. He one day informed his fair friend that he had left her £30,000 in his will. "Could not you let me have it now?" was her reply, and she got it in a few days.

The concession by the Select Committee of the House of Commons of powers to the London County Council to license employment agencies instead of merely registering them as at present, is a further and, it is to be hoped, a final step towards the suppression of bogus agencies in London. The County Council has found that registration alone gives insufficient protection to the public, mainly owing to the difficulty of getting people who have been swindled to come forward and give evidence in the proceedings necessary to get the offending agent struck off the register. One of the principal aims of the new measure is to strike at the traffic carried on by disreputable theatrical and music hall agents in the supply of girls for low-class places of entertainment abroad, in regard to which some striking evidence was given to the Committee. Equally useful is the proposal to bring male employment agencies under the purview of the Council, and it is a pity that other fee-snatching concerns like the paying guest agencies could not also have been included in the scheme.

LLOYD GEORGICS.

No. II.—By a triumphant Free-trader.

Hurrah! Free Trade is going strong;
And sunk in deep dejection
Are all the retrogressive throng
Who clamoured for Protection.

The wind, they vowed, he couldn't raise,
With trade and exports shrinking.
But lo! He's found us means and ways
As easily as winking.

What other land could pay so much,
And feel it yet so lightly?
What price the Germans, French, and Dutch?
What price the Yankees sprightly?

Their screeds let Tory quacks let loose
From half a hundred rostrums.
John Bull's quite well. He's got no use
For Dr. Tariff's nostrums.

The wealth of this country, like that of every industrial nation in a fairly healthy condition, grows rapidly and pretty constantly. The cost of Government must also increase in every country with the increase of population; and this natural increase is stimulated under modern conditions by the tendency to enlarge continually the functions of Government and throw more and more expensive duties on the State. These are truisms which nobody can dispute.

But when all such considerations are taken into account, the recent growth of expenditure and taxation, under Conservative and Liberal Governments alike, remains a matter for grave anxiety. The present Government has now got the figure up to 171 millions. Twenty years ago it was 87 millions. We have very nearly doubled our national expenditure in those twenty years. In the previous twenty years (1870-1890) we had only increased it from 69 to 87 millions. It took fifty years (from 1845 to 1895) to raise the figure from 50 to 100 millions. From this it will be seen that not only is expenditure increasing, but the rate of increase is growing rapidly. If the present rate of progression continues we shall certainly be raising and spending taxes to the amount of 300 millions before 1925.

Mr. Snowden regards this prospect with joy. But does anybody believe that a nation can raise this amount in taxation—largely for unproductive purposes—and continue to thrive? The Chancellor of the Exchequer, followed by an enthusiastic chorus of Liberals, bids us rejoice over this magnificent vindication of free trade as a revenue-yielding proposition. In a sense the boast is justified. Our protectionist neighbours seem to have a good deal more difficulty in raising the wind. Germany in particular, the cynosure of every tariff reform eye, has been piling up debt prodigally while we have been paying it off, laying on new taxes by the dozen to keep down her growing deficits, and still failing to make the two ends meet. Either we in this country have a great deal more wealth to levy upon, or we have a much more effective method of getting at it.

But all this is beside the point. Free trade was not originally preached or adopted in England as a superlative device for raising the greatest amount of taxation with the least possible trouble to the Treasury. And among all our forefathers none would contemplate an annual expenditure of 170 millions with more unspeakable horror than Cobden and Bright. What we ought to have from the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a reasoned demonstration that the wealth of the country is growing, whether owing to free trade or any other cause, in proportion to the toll that is taken from it by the State. This neither Mr. Lloyd George nor any of his predecessors within my recollection has ever attempted to do. Nor do I believe that any man can do it.

The House of Commons is to blame even more than the Government for the growth of expenditure; for the first of all its functions is to be the guardian of the public purse, and the gradual abnegation of this function is, if not the reason for the growth, at any rate the reason why it goes on at a constantly accelerated rate without articulate protest and without a finger being moved to check it. This is by far the most serious consequence of that subordination of Parliament to the Executive, which has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished. Radicals still mouth on platforms the ancient shibboleth of "peace, retrenchment, and reform." But whatever may be the case with the rest of the formula, retrenchment is a word that has ceased to have a meaning. With a little sugar on the pill in the shape of platitudes about the "bankruptcy of tariff reform," or some claptrap about [illegible]ening the lives of the veterans of industry or safeguarding our maritime supremacy, a Budget carrying twenty millions additional taxation is swallowed without a murmur, and money is voted away at the rate of several millions an hour without a pretence at scrutinising the accounts

LLOYD GEORGICS.

No. III.—By a medical practitioner of a certain stamp.

Oh! yes. Facetious he may wax
And air his humour frisky
About this shameful super-tax
On whisky;

May feel a satisfaction bland
In sobering spirit-swillers,
In penalising maltsters and Distillers.

But of us doctors recks he not,
Never so much as thinking
That half, at least, our fees are got From drinking.

Jack Sober (let who will extol)
I deem not worth a stiver;
He never gets an alcoholic liver.

His tongue is clean, his blood is pure,
His gastric organs placid;
He hardly knows what's meant by uric acid.

His children, too, exemption win,
No gouty ails succeed to;
They seldom call the doctor in—
No need to.

Make spirits cheap, not dear, say we;
Encourage folks to drink 'em,
Or nothing soon a year will be Our income!

The Bill amending the Royal Declaration seems to satisfy most of the worthy people who are deeply concerned about such matters, and that is the chief thing to be desired. But personally I am at a loss to see the slightest reason for requiring any declaration of religious belief from the Sovereign of these realms. We have abolished all religious tests for membership of Parliament and the holding of Government posts. We have established it as the unwritten law of the land that the King reigns but does not govern. Why, then, should he be subjected to tests which are not imposed on those who really do govern? Why should he be the one person in the realm who does not enjoy liberty of conscience? The answer, of course, is that for political reasons this was considered expedient in the seventeenth century, and the twentieth century is incapable of perceiving that the reasons which existed then have now disappeared for ever.

By a striking coincidence, while Parliament was looking for the first time at the Coronation Declaration in its new form, the Roman Catholics were consecrating, with imposing ceremony, the first cathedral that they have had in London since the Reformation. Protestant fanatics may see in this function a dire portent, but the vast mass of English people behold it unmoved, and the majority can even bring themselves to extend a kindly sympathy to the great efforts and sacrifices by which their Romanist fellow-subjects have brought this great work to its conclusion. The "No-Popery" spirit, by which this country was dominated—not without reason—for two hundred years after the Reformation, has died out with the causes from which it sprang. The sectarian passions, jealousies, and fears of the seventeenth century have happily passed away—not from England alone, but from all Europe; and it is time that we made a clean sweep of all the putrid refuse that they have left behind.

Bishop Goe was for many years an active leader of the most austere and uncompromising section of the Low Church party, of which Bishop Baring was regarded as the head, and it is well known that when Archbishop Sumner died in 1862 Lord Shaftesbury induced Lord Palmerston to recommend that most militant prelate to the Primacy. Mr. Goe worked for some years at Hull, and his strong advocacy of Evangelicalism on all occasions attracted the notice of Bishop Baring, who presented him in 1873 to the important living of Sunderland. He was transferred in 1877 to Bloomsbury by Lord Chancellor Cairns, who was also in full sympathy with his opinions. Ten years later Mr. Goe was elected to the see of Melbourne, where he replaced the late Bishop of Manchester. He remained in Australia for fourteen years, and his episcopate was both successful and popular, although Bishop Moorhouse was a very difficult man to follow.

The Bishop of London has presented the Rev. Ernest Hilliard, Vicar of St. Andrew, Fulham, to the important living of Christ Church, Mayfair, which is of the net value of about £550 a year. Mr. Hilliard is a preacher of considerable power, and popular with both clergy and laity. He has worked hard for the last twenty years in West Kensington, and his appointment to the comparative ease of Mayfair is well deserved.

The living of Christ Church became vacant by the appointment of the Rev. Eric M. Farrar to the Rectory of Dennington, Norfolk, on the presentation of Mr. J. D. Hodsoll. This living is worth about £900 a year, with house. Mr. Farrar, who is a son of the late Dean of Canterbury, was formerly Vicar of Hoxton, where he remained for ten years.

The Bishop of Norwich has appointed Canon Westcott to be Archdeacon of Norwich in the place of Archdeacon Perowne, rector of Redenhall, who has resigned after holding the office for thirty-two years.

SCRUBB & Co., Ltd., caution the public against the many injurious imitations of SCRUBB'S AMMONIA that are being offered, and draw attention to their having affixed the signature of SCRUBB & CO. to each bottle, without which none is genuine.

The stipend is £200 a year. Canon Westcott, who is a son of the late Bishop of Durham, was for sixteen years headmaster of Sherborne School. He was appointed to a stall in Norwich Cathedral last year by the Lord Chancellor. The appointment is regarded in the diocese as an excellent one.

The Bishop of London, who is in residence at Fulham Palace, is to leave England on August 12 to spend a month in Canada, and he will return to the diocese on September 24.

---

The Dean and Chapter of Canterbury have appointed the Rev. C. R. McDowall, assistant master at Eton, to be headmaster of the King's School, in the place of Canon Galpin, who has been presented by the Archbishop with the rectory of Saltwood. There were between eighty and ninety candidates. The King's School at Canterbury, which was rebuilt in 1865, has a remarkable Norman staircase. This flourishing school was founded by Henry VIII., and it has always maintained a very high reputation. Lord Chief Justice Tenterden, who was the son of a barber at Canterbury, was educated at the King's School.

The Rev. William Temple, who has been elected headmaster of Repton School, is the younger son of the late Archbishop of Canterbury. He had a distinguished career at Oxford, and he is now Fellow and Lecturer of Queen's College. Mr. Temple, who is a very able man, is a Liberal in politics, and he holds advanced ideas on social questions, in which he takes a keen interest. He was a candidate for the recent vacancies in the headmasterships of Rugby and Clifton. He has Derbyshire connections, as his mother, Mrs. Temple, is a first cousin of the late Duke of Devonshire.

Canon Barnett has succeeded Canon Beeching as the canon in residence at Westminster Abbey. The Dean is also in residence. Canon Barnett is to be in residence during August also.

I would call the attention of my readers to the annual appeal of the Women's Holiday Fund, whose object is to assist poor working women in obtaining a rest and change of air. Last year over one thousand women were helped in this way. All pay what they can afford themselves, but without the assistance of the fund they would be unable to go away for their short holidays. Contributions may be sent to the Secretary, Miss Crawford, 76, Denison House, Vauxhall Bridge Road, S.W.

I am afraid that I cannot find space for the letter in praise of the Boys' Brigade which a number of its distinguished supporters, headed by Lord Roberts, have issued. By this time, however, everybody recognises the excellence of the work done by the Brigade—the pioneer organisation of the kind—and I hope it will be sufficient if I remind my readers that funds are now needed for the seaside summer camps for London boys, which are certainly not the least important and useful feature of the movement. Contributions should be addressed to the hon. treasurer of the Brigade, 34, Paternoster Row, E.C.

General Spencer Ewart is a military replica of Admirable Crichton. After going the rounds of nearly every department of the War Office he has been promoted to be Adjutant-General with a seat in the Army Council. A bon garçon, and a man of the world, General Ewart has every recommendation for his new duties except the one really necessary qualification—experience as a regimental commander.

Mr. Haldane's explanations in Committee of Supply last week satisfied the House as to the necessity for an Overseas Inspector-General of the Forces, but not as to the expediency of combining the duties of general overseas inspection with those of local command in the Mediterranean. What, however, is now clear is that Sir Ian Hamilton will be in a somewhat different position from the Duke of Connaught, whose headquarters were at Malta, and whose duties, partly civil and partly military, were confined to the Mediterranean. Sir Ian Hamilton's headquarters will be practically in London, where he will spend "a considerable part of the year," and whence he will visit the garrisons, not only of the Mediterranean, but of all Crown colonies, as well as those of self-governing colonies, when he is invited by their Governments. This puts quite a different aspect on an appointment, and brings it more or less into line with the suggestion already made in Truth that an Inspector of Colonial Forces is a practical necessity.

Colonel S. B. Smith, late commanding the King's Dragoon Guards, has been appointed Assistant-Adjutant-General in Ireland, and he will take up the duties of this post on Saturday next.

---

I hear growls from the Indian Army about the way appointments are now made. It appears that patronage is vested in the Commander-in-Chief's military secretary, whose duty it is to interview senior officers and report on their qualifications for appointment as regimental commandants. In England such work is done by the Lieutenant-General who is secretary to the Selection Board, but in India Sir O'Moore Creagh has handed it over to a young cavalry major of thirteen years' service and thirty-four years of age. "Scatter" Wilson is this young man's nickname, and before him officers of twice his service and age have to bow down to secure the favour of his chief.

---

The Military Secretary to the Commander-in-Chief in India is only a glorified aide-de-camp, chosen for his social, not professional qualities; and to make him responsible for the patronage of the Indian Army is an anachronism which ought to be abolished. Why should not the Adjutant-General in India undertake the duties of patronage as well as of discipline? The Military Secretary could then confine himself to his social functions, such as arranging his chief's dinner parties, and escorting the ladies of the family to Divine worship.

Mr. Haldane's reply to Mr. Cautley's question last week about the promotion of R.G.A. subalterns justified the supplementary heckling of Mr. Arthur Lee. The Secretary of State said the present block is temporary, and will "soon pass away;" but it has only just begun and cannot pass away till it is removed. The block is not due to normal fluctuation, but to the big influx of officers in 1900, and until the 200 subalterns, who com plete ten years' service in 1910, are got rid of the block will remain.

Mr. Haldane says there is no reason to suppose that these 200 young officers will "continue subalterns" all their lives; nor is there if special measures are taken to retire or promote them; otherwise they will continue in their present rank till they die, for at best only ten to twenty steps in the R.G.A. list are annually available, while just now there are none at all. I hope for the sake of R.G.A. subalterns that Mr. Haldane will take some of those "other steps" which he told Mr. Lee he had up his sleeve, for the present outlook is enough to damp the spirits of the most ardent warriors.

An infantry lieutenant reminds me that there are line as well as artillery subalterns with over ten years' service. There are; but they are distributed here and there in battalions, and there is nowhere any appreciable block of promotion as in the R.G.A. list. When the South African war broke out many fresh batteries and ammunition columns had to be raised, and then disbanded when the war was finished; but the number of infantry battalions was not increased.

---

A reader at the Curragh, who has strong feelings on the subject of cruelty to animals, invokes my aid on behalf of certain Army Service Corps horses who are periodically employed in taking parties of N.C.O.s from the sergeants' messes in the camp to and from a Masonic hall at Newbridge, about three miles off. It appears that this is an extra job for the horses at the end of their ordinary day's work, which during the training season is generally a heavy one; and I gather that the non-commissioned Masons run to a good size, as my informant estimates the average load at two tons, dead weight. It occurs to me that the use of Government horses and an ambulance wagon for this particular purpose may be open to objection on other grounds than that of cruelty, and perhaps some one in authority at the Curragh may be moved to look into the matter from that point of view.

Quite a general post of flag commands was announced on the eve of the manœuvres, none of which will take effect until after these exercises. Sir Archibald Berkeley Milne, who has already held the command of the Second Home Fleet beyond the time limit, will turn over to Vice-Admiral Sir George Astley Callaghan—an appointment that has come as a little surprise to Service circles. Rear-Admiral T. H. M. Jerram, instead of going back to finish the period of his Sheerness command when he strikes his mobilisation flag, will succeed Admiral Callaghan as second-in-command of the Mediterranean Fleet—a corollary surprise to the one last mentioned. Rear-Admiral William Lowther Grant, who only got his flag on October 26 last, hoists it for the first time as successor to Rear-Admiral Jerram.

The voluntary retirement of Commander Alexander Percy Davidson has occasioned a great deal of sympathetic comment in the Service. Commander Davidson was senior to ten of the thirteen officers of his rank who were advanced to captains in the midsummer batch of promotions. He has a splendid active service record, and his withdrawal from the Navy is unanimously regarded as a protest against the system of selection under which he was passed over because his merits do not include the letter G after his name. His services are sacrificed upon the altar of the fetish "Five Firsts," which blocks all the avenues to promotion save the road from Whale Island.

It would be highly interesting to know how it is that the Rivista Marittima has been able to publish specific details, which I have reason to know are correct, of the cruiser Lion, now being reared with such jealous secrecy in Devonport Dockyard? Whilst constables are guarding the avenues leading to the slip whereon the monster cruiser is growing, this Italian publication presents its readers with plans and particulars. We may learn from Rome what Mr. McKenna would curtly decline to tell any member of the House of Commons in the public interest.

The egregious memorial presented to the Prime Minister by the Imperial Maritime League, demanding the immediate expenditure of 100 millions on national defence, was stated to "bear the signatures of more than one hundred and fifty admirals and generals." A naval correspondent, who is as proud as he ought to be of the fact that we have just mobilised about the biggest fleet that has ever put to sea, has been looking up the said admirals in the Navy List, and sends me the following interesting list:—

Nearly all these officers retired as captains or commanders. On the average they have been out of the Navy for about seventeen years. There are very few retired officers who do not believe that the Service has gone to the dogs since they left it, and none get out of touch with current Service conditions more quickly than naval officers. The Imperial Maritime Memorialists no doubt believe that an expenditure of £100,000,000 on the top of £40,000,000 Navy Estimates is absolutely necessary to our naval salvation, but their advertisement of their belief only makes them ridiculous.

The Daily Express states that "the German warship Zieten has arrived at Lerwick, and will be stationed there until further notice." Even the Daily Express must be aware that a foreign Power cannot "station" a warship in a British port; but ignorant readers are of course ready to draw the worst inferences from a statement of this sort. It may re-assure some of them to know that this "German warship" is a gunboat of THOS. GOODE & CO.—Exhibition of old and modern WEDGWOOD, including many specimens never previously exhibited.—South Audley Street, London.

975 tons, built at Blackwall in 1876; that she is employed in fishery protection in the North Sea; and that she called at Lerwick for shelter from a north-westerly gale.

The letter of protest in last week's Truth against the damage inflicted by naval vessels upon the gear of fishermen has brought me quite a little crop of confirmatory correspondence. The evil seems to be very real and very extensive. Firing practice, power trial runs, submarine evolutions, and torpedo manœuvres upon several of the Channel fishing grounds are of almost daily occurrence. The apathetic attitude of the Admiralty towards the fishing industry is well illustrated by the Olivia disaster. Five weeks ago the destroyer Quail cut down a Falmouth lugger and drowned four men. The boat sank right in the track of the drifting and trawling grounds. She constitutes a serious obstruction to fishermen, which will result in wholesale destruction of nets. Yet the Admiralty decline to raise the boat. So strong is the feeling locally that Captain Orchard has written to the President of the Board of Trade in vigorous terms demanding his intervention. Surely the sea is wide enough, and modern warships big enough and fast enough, to enable them to carry their exercises beyond the limits of the coastwise fisheries.

Since the last reference in Truth to the Royal Naval School, Eltham, its affairs seem to have drifted into an absurd tangle. It will be remembered that the Council resigned on the defeat of their proposal to wind up the institution. The Corporation met and passed a resolution appointing a committee to obtain the advice of the Education Department, and also resolving to follow it. After a conference with this committee, the Education Department evolved a scheme which again proposed that the school should be closed and the funds when realised applied in granting exhibitions at schools approved by the Department.

The members of the Corporation then met again, and necessarily found themselves all at sixes and sevens. They had decided not to close the school; they had further resolved to follow the advice of the Education Department, and the Department had advised them to do what they had resolved not to do. Whether they took the advice of the Department or rejected it, they must go back on their own resolution. It is not surprising that they separated without being able to agree as to what they would do.

The Education Department seems very much to blame. It ought to have recognised that after what had happened the continued existence of the school was res judicata, and that whatever advice it gave must assume the continuation of the school. Why it did not do this is incomprehensible; but apparently either it was too much bent on propounding fads of its own to appreciate the limitations of the position, or else it was inspired from outside to try to upset the decision which the Corporation had come to and restore the original proposal of the old council. Some of the party who defeated the council suspect, not unnaturally, that their opponents have got at the Education Department by the backstairs. That suspicion may be unjust, but the result is just the same as if it were well founded, and I should think that the most useful step at this juncture would be to endeavour to elicit Mr. Runciman's personal views on the subject by means of a question in Parliament. He, at any rate, can hardly refuse to see that his Department, instead of helping the Corporation, has only added to its difficulties, and that it ought to try again on quite different lines.

COMMON OBJECTS OF THE RIVER.

Dear Truth,

I think it's very rude
That lovers now should make so free.
When I was young, we billed and cooed
Upon what's called the strict q.t.

To spoon we never had the face
When other folks were by to see;
The amorous kiss, the soft embrace
Were stolen on the strict q.t.

Far different ways have come to pass,
As all who know their Thames agree;
Both men and girls seem made of brass;
They have no use for modestee.

To Henley yesterday I went,
Upon the mild aquatic spree,
And in a skiff my time I spent
Betwixt the hours of lunch and tea.

And oh! the lovers that I saw
In punts and boats—my goodness me!—
Who openly defied the law
Of flirting on the strict q.t.

Of passers-by he nothing recks,
No more, if that is all, does she,
But sit and clasp each other's necks
With unconcerned audacitee.

I call it a disgusting sight,
An outrage that ought not to be;
That's why, dear Truth, to you I write.
Please stop it. Yours,

Proprietee.

The promotion of Mr. John Newlands, Deputy Controller of the Central Telegraph Office, to be Controller is a well-earned reward for the excellent work which he has accomplished in India. Mr. Newlands, who gained his reputation in Scotland, entirely reorganised the whole telegraph system in India, and the work was successfully carried out in spite of serious difficulties. He has a very remarkable organising and administrative capacity, and there is ample scope for the exercise of his talent in his new post. The salary of the Controller is £800 a year, rising to £1,000.

A good deal of dissatisfaction has been expressed in the Ebbw Vale district at the decision of the District Council to proceed no further with an inquiry as to what had become of money paid for the service of summonses on rate defaulters. The present collector manages to secure a summons for 1s. 6d., whereas the late collector used to charge 2s. 6d. A letter from the late collector was read, in which he took up the attitude that the request for information was nothing but an attack upon his character. Surely under such circumstances the best thing for him to have done would have been to attend the Council and explain where the extra shillings had gone. A proposal to this effect was, however, defeated by the casting vote of the chairman, which looks as if the late rate collector might very well pray to be preserved from his friends.

Is the rigid Sabbatarianism of Bournemouth to be relaxed? Can it be possible that tea-rooms will at last be allowed to open, just like public-houses? It is at any rate significant that an application for the Sunday opening of a refreshment kiosk, instead of being at once contumeliously rejected, was last week referred to a special committee. A worthy alderman named Beale sounded a note of warning. "Nobody," he said, "objected to a cup of tea, but the question was, what was behind that cup of tea?" What indeed! It may be bread and butter or cake or even muffins. Doubtless the special committee will thoroughly consider this unsettling problem.

A correspondent suggests, in reference to a paragraph last week, that the improvement of the railway service to Torquay is of much more importance to that health resort than the management of the cemetery. I was under the impression that the town is fairly well served by the Great Western. My correspondent, however, complains forcibly of the delays that occur at the junction at Newton Abbot, and describes the station there as "an old, inconvenient, dirty shed, which was insufficient for the traffic twenty years ago, and as it is would be a disgrace to a railway in Spain." Perhaps the managers of the railway think that ten minutes' or a quarter of an hour's detention in this purgatory will intensify the visitor's appreciation of the paradise of Torquay.

WEDGWOOD'S WAIL.

(As heard by a Lobby Poet.)

I met him in the Lobby yesterday;
And his countenance was anything but gay,
So I asked him, "What's the matter?"
And he answered, "A.'s a ratter.
He's out to give the blooming show away.

"The Veto is the cherished end I sought;
For the Veto tooth and nail I've always fought;
What's more, I'd nearly won it.
Now he's been and gone and done it!
This compromise will whittle it to nought."

And I said: "But should they compromise the show,
Your side will take as well as give, you know.
If concessions Asquith's making,
Per contra he'll be taking
A substantial quid for every yielded quo.

"Besides, suppose you'd fought it to the end;
'Tis on the cards you might have been, O friend,
Upset and not upsetter.
No. A compromise is better
Wherein both parties acquiescent blend."

But he couldn't seem to see my point of view;
His visage still was lengthy, glum, and blue;
While he merely could repeat O,
"Boo-hoo! I want my Veto.
Shan't be happy till I get it. There! Boo-hoo!"

Apropos of my remarks last week upon the interview between the Howard Association and Mr. Churchill in regard to the manufacture of criminals by the imposition of fines in the police courts which are beyond the means of the offenders to pay, Mr. Francis Wellesley, one of the Visiting Justices to Wandsworth Prison, sends me a glaring example of the evil. While going his rounds at Wandsworth on June 27 he found there a boy, aged sixteen years and nine months, undergoing fourteen days' imprisonment in the third division in lieu of paying a fine of £5 imposed by Mr. Hopkins, the stipendiary at Lambeth Police Court. His offence was "disorderly conduct," which was the technical description of what the lad himself described as "skylarking" round the bandstand on Peckham Rye. He had denied the offence, and he had been convicted on the sole evidence of a police constable, added to which he had an absolutely clean record. He had already served a week, but Mr. Wellesley at once paid half the fine, and released him from gaol, afterwards communicating the facts to Mr. Churchill.

I sincerely trust that Mr. Churchill will take notice of them. He must see that it is a slur upon the administration of the law when visiting justices are compelled to put their hands in their pockets in order to release from gaol prisoners who ought never to have been sent there. I trust, too, that Mr. Churchill will also ask Mr. Hopkins for an explanation of the part he has played in the matter. To fine a lad of sixteen £5 for skylarking on an open space is worthy of the founder of the house of Shallow. To make matters worse, the lad's father went a few days after its imposition to appeal to Mr. Hopkins to reduce the amount, but the magistrate refused to alter his decision.

Unfortunately, as I have from time to time pointed out in TRUTH, such committals from Metropolitan police courts are only too frequent. I am also aware that frequent representations have been made to the Home Office regarding them, so that full particulars of the extent of the scandal should be easily available. After Mr. Churchill's remarks to the Howard Association the other day I cannot help thinking that if he will obtain those particulars he will not hesitate a moment before taking some steps to make such committals impossible in the future.

A number of correspondents have called my attention to the fine of £5 and £5 5s. costs imposed by the Farnham Bench upon Captain Ferdinand Bigg-Wither for cruelty to a dog. Undoubtedly it was as gross a case as could be conceived, and imprisonment is richly earned by any brute who can chain a dog to the ground and kick it to death. But I do not think the Farnham magistrates need to be pilloried for not sending this "officer and gentleman" to gaol. After all, his chief punishment will lie in the general contempt which his conduct excites, and that he will experience in full measure.

A novel defence was set up at Norwich last week in the case of certain milk-sellers charged with selling adulterated milk. It seems to have occurred to these ingenious tradesmen that if they put a label "diluted milk" upon the can from which they served customers they could not be charged with adulteration. The magistrates came to the decision that the law as to "a label distinctly and legibly written or printed" does not apply to the sale of milk, and fined the defendants, further warning them that in future such a defence would be regarded as an aggravation of the offence. The Norwich bench are to be congratulated upon their sound common sense in sweeping aside this ingenious pretext for evading the law. Persons who require milk and water do not need to buy the water as well as the milk from the milkman.

Several cases of wife assault heard by the Leicester magistrates last week would lead one to suppose that the occupants of the bench have not yet managed to disabuse their minds of the belief that a wife is an ordinary household chattel. The worst was the case of a man named Tomlin. He had previously been before the court on a charge of assaulting his wife, and the case had been adjourned in order that an amicable settlement might be arrived at. Tomlin repaid the leniency extended to him by seizing the woman by the throat and battering her against some railings, rendering her unconscious, and for days she was in a serious condition. The magistrates merely fined him 40s. and costs. When it is realised that it was by sheer luck that Tomlin did not stand in the dock on a charge of murder or manslaughter the ridiculous leniency of such a penalty is apparent to every one but the Solon who imposed it.

Two bold, bad citizens of Hastings were brought before the Borough Bench last week on a charge of wilful damage to a wall. One was a Mr. King, the other a Mr. Brett. Mr. King was six years old, and his companion in iniquity was five. When the Bench recovered from the shock occasioned by the right of these desperadoes they warned the mothers to look after them and sent them home in their perambulators. It is a pity that they did not at the same time inform the prosecutor that the court was not a kindergarten, and that the law does not yet recognise responsibility of offenders under the age of seven.

"One of the worst cases of cruelty they had ever heard of," was the comment of the Paisley justices on a case brought before them last week, where two men had practically beaten a horse to death. It is true that the penalty of £5 which they imposed was a substantial one, but, at the same time, if ever a term of imprisonment without the option of a fine had been earned it was in this case, and one would have had a higher opinion of the justices' good sense if they had imposed it.

SILENCE IN COURT.

("Oh for a Dome of Silence!"—Mr. Plowden.)

I look before and after,
And pine for what is not;
What the reports call "laughter"
With some pain is fraught.
I yearn to leave the court and seek a silent spot.

Far from crime and scorn,
Hate, and pride, and fear,
That fill the tales forlorn
Which constantly I hear,
No more I'd crack that joke that hides the rising tear.

Better than all measures
Of delightful sound,
Better than the treasures
Of humour in me found
Would be a dome of silence, in solemn stillness bound.

I was favoured last week with the following unsigned note:—

From the "Protean rascal." Thanks for recent advertisement. You had better now become a client. I can send you lots of winners.

The person whom I have characterised as a Protean rascal is that tipster and bookmaker of many aliases, E. W. Beston, of Birmingham. Whether I am indebted to him for this anonymous note I do not know, but I have been interested in the copy of one of his publications, styled Lloyd's Mid-Week Special, which was enclosed. The Special named thirty-three horses for races at Newmarket, Worcester, and Alexandra Park; and on comparing these predictions with the results I find that the odd three were winners and the remaining thirty losers! Thanks, Beston, but I do not think I will become a client.

"Put not your trust in—sporting prophets." One of them, H. A. Mordaunt, opens his circular with this sound advice, but at once proceeds to qualify it by urging that although the other fellows should be avoided, his "successful and untarnished record of a quarter of a century" entitles him to your confidence and your cash. His record notwithstanding, Mordaunt —who, by the way, gives only a Post Office address— is a new acquaintance in this line, and so is R. Doyle, 59, High Street, Brentford, whose circular has also been passed on to me, but the name of A. Cox, of Foxley Cottage, Holyport, who has likewise been commended to my notice, is already enshrined in the Truth Cautionary List. The most remarkable thing in connection with this business is the density of the dupes, who have not the sense to perceive that if the circularisers' stories of their successes were true they would be backing winners for themselves instead of picking up a disreputable livelihood as touting tipsters.

Yet another of these prophets, Arthur Champion, 235, High Holborn, W.C., distributes specimen copies of a booklet styled "Champion's Guide," in which tips for the current week are given. It is "published every Monday evening," but a recipient of the specimen copies has noticed that they only reach him on Friday evening, and, being of a sceptical turn of mind, he is not at all impressed by predictions of winners of races that have already taken place. His scepticism is not unreasonable. If Champion wants to give gratuitous demonstrations of his successes as a prophet he should circulate his prophecies before the events, not afterwards.

Albert S. Bloch is sending round an intimation that he has just opened an office at 41, Conduit Street, W., for "financial business" on terms which he ventures to think "you will find entirely advantageous." Presumably this Albert S. Bloch is one of the three Hebrew gentlemen formerly trading in partnership under the money-lending alias of "Henry Harris." I frequently cautioned my readers against the partners jointly, and, needless to say, the same advice applies to them severally.

A curious sequel to a matter which has occupied a good deal of space in Truth during the past six months has recently been brought to my notice. This is the case of Mrs. Jack. Mrs. Jack was the name of a client for whom Messrs. Austen Debenham and Co., the paying guest agents, of 72, New Bond Street, were advertising for a home for herself and her little girl. My suspicions regarding the genuineness of the advertisement were aroused owing to Mrs. Jack's address having been given as care of Miss Beatrice Carter, 8, Perham Road, West Kensington, whom I knew as the henchwoman of Bartlett, whose latest alias is Glyn and Co., of Argyle Place, Regent Street. Debenham and Co. disclaimed any connection with Bartlett, but when invited to make good their disclaimer discreetly forbore to do so.

I am not now surprised at their discretion, for I have recently heard from the lady who has been entertaining Mrs. Jack, and Mrs. Jack, it appears, had been sent to her through Glyn and Co., to whom she paid a fee of a guinea and a half for the guest. The hostess is dissatisfied, because Mrs. Jack has proved to be a paying guest only in name. She came to the house for her confinement, and when she departed with the newly born baby she left an unpaid account behind her and only Miss Carter's address. Miss Carter now ignores all correspondence on the subject, while application to Glyn and Co. for assistance in obtaining the address of their client has only resulted in a threat of legal proceedings. Under these circumstances persons who paid Austen Debenham and Co. their guineas to be placed in communication with Mrs. Jack may be thankful that they failed to obtain her as a guest. But the fact that she figured as a client of Austen Debenham and Co., and was ultimately placed by Glyn and Co., is pretty good evidence that Austen Debenham is only another alias of the ubiquitous Bartlett.

There was a reference last week in Truth to the A. W. Shaw Company, Limited, publishers of a business magazine called System, in which I related the experience of a Blackpool gentleman who had been annoyed by the receipt of an account for a subscription to the magazine which he had not ordered. From what the company tell me he has only himself to blame for any annoyance caused him. He had sent the company a postcard authorising them to send a copy of the magazine on approval and promising to return it within seven days if he did not desire to subscribe. He returned the magazine, together with another book which accompanied it, to the carriers, but failed to properly address the parcel or to advise the company that he was returning it. It was therefore in perfect good faith that the company forwarded him the account for a yearly subscription.

With reference to a paragraph in last week's Truth, Lord Northcote writes that the use of his name by F. C. Barter in connection with his Imperial Chamber of Commerce scheme, or for any other purpose, is wholly unauthorised. It will be surprising if similar disclaimers are not forthcoming from the other gentlemen whose names Barter uses.

A COMPROMISE ON THE VETO.

"You'll marry me;" I said.
She gently shook her head—
"On that proposal I must put the veto;
To say whom I will wive
Is my prerogative."
Said I, "That claim is one I can't agree to.

"Selection is my task;
I merely have to ask,
And, if 'tis needed, exercise coercion."
But, with her nose in air,
She answered, "Sir, how dare
You utter such a palpable perversion?

"Your legal lore is slight,
You do not read aright
The constitution of the realm of Cupid.
For me to give away
My right to Yea or Nay
Would stamp me as particularly stupid."

"Suppose, then," I replied,
"To bridge the cleavage wide
We meet and hold a Conference—what say you?
Thus politicians do
When deadlocks now ensue;
Do not reject my overtures, I pray you."

We met, and we conferred—
The "melancholy bird"
Sole auditor of our confabulation;
And I am glad to say
We found a middle way
Which subsequently filled me with elation.

We laid down rules precise:
I was to ask her thrice—
Thereafter my proposal to be carried.
It scarcely needs to tell
Our compromise worked well,
So well, indeed, that—well—we now are married!

SCRUTATOR.

PRIVILEGED LIBEL IN THE ARMY.

A CONSIDERABLE sensation was made in the House of Commons last week when Major Adam, reading a statement which he had sent to the Secretary of State and the officers implicated, charged a well-known cavalry general with having rendered "a confidential report or confidential reports on an officer or officers under his command, which report or reports contained deliberate mis-statements of fact." The unpleasant impression which this charge created was deepened when Mr. Haldane, replying on the whole debate, passed over in silence this grave charge, as well as the whole of the comprehensive indictment of the confidential report system which Major Adam presented in the same speech.

The charge preferred by Major Adam relates to the case of the five senior officers of the 5th Lancers, including the second in command, who were suddenly, without warning, placed on half-pay some three years ago. The circumstances have been so fully discussed in Truth on many occasions that it is unnecessary to recount them now. There is no doubt that the whole five officers, whose previous records were unblemished, were the victims of confidential reports made by Lieutenant-Colonel Graham shortly after succeeding to the command of the regiment, and transmitted to the War Office by Major-General Scobell, then commanding the Aldershot cavalry brigade. Of the five, two have since been re-employed and have consequently had their mouths closed. A third left the Service. A fourth, Captain Brice Wilson, protested vehemently against his treatment, virtually charged his commanding officer with stating an untruth, and demanded an inquiry. An indiscreet statement of his case in the Daily Mail furnished the War Office with a convenient weapon against him, which was promptly used, and he was got rid of. He has since exhausted every means of calling attention to his treatment, both in Parliament and outside, but without effect. The last of the five officers was Major Adam himself. At the time when he was placed on half-pay he was serving on the General Staff at the War Office; it is one of the most significant points in his case that he had only served for a few months with Colonel Graham, who made the report which got him out of the regiment. As long as he was at the War Office his mouth also was closed. But at the last general election he was returned to Parliament. Being thus unmuzzled, he has now taken the first opportunity of publicly accusing his late commanding officer, and the brigadier who endorsed his report, of rendering a report or reports which "contained deliberate mis-statements of fact." His object was to bring this case at last to a head, to force the Secretary of State and the Army Council—if there is an Army Council for this purpose—to face the issue which when an inquiry was demanded by Captain Brice Wilson they successfully evaded by finding a convenient pretext to eject that officer from the Service.

The question now is whether, having at last been presented in this ugly shape, the case is to be allowed to rest where it stands. That it should do so appears incredible; but after Mr. Haldane's silence in the face of Major Adam's allegations, there is not even now any definite reason for supposing that the War Office will face the music. The War Office, however, is not the only party concerned. Does Major-General Scobell, who is, I understand, in England, see no reason for vindicating himself? I do not understand Major Adam to charge him with rendering a report which he knew to contain deliberate falsehoods, but an officer charged in Parliament with transmitting such a report owes it to himself to show that either the charge is unfounded or that he at least acted quite innocently. Major-General Scobell, it is to be presumed, will now demand the inquiry which was refused to Captain Brice Wilson. Finally, there is Lieutenant-Colonel Graham, with whom the report or reports originated. I presume that he is in Africa, commanding the gallant regiment which he exchanged for the 5th Lancers. When Captain Brice Wilson, in the correspondence which has been published in Truth, made much the same sort of charge against him that Major Adam has now made in Parliament, he rather adopted the policy of "taking it lying down." But I should think that when last Tuesday's Times gets out to the West Coast, he will feel some sort of obligation to rise up at last in his own defence. Perhaps he also will favour the Secretary of State with a demand for an inquiry. I should be sorry to do Mr. Haldane any injustice; perhaps he has already communicated with the General and the Colonel, preparatory to making some statement to Parliament in answer to Major Adam's charge, though in that case he might have announced his intention at the time. But if none of these things happen, if neither the Secretary of State nor Major-General Scobell, nor Lieutenant-Colonel Graham, sees any necessity to move in the matter, then it is the duty of the House of Commons, before which the charge has been preferred, to insist on the matter being threshed out. I trust that Major Adam will spare no effort to obtain that result, and that no party considerations will be allowed to stand in the way of his obtaining it.

Let no one suppose that this is a mere personal question, that it begins and ends with the half-dozen officers immediately concerned in it. It is but one instance of an abuse the extent of which can never be exactly known, but the effects of which are felt far and wide, and react on the efficiency and well-being of the Army, apart altogether from the injustice done to individual victims. Major Adam gave the House last week a long list of names of officers who have strong primâ facie grounds for complaining of wrongs inflicted by confidential reports, and who have agitated in vain for inquiry and redress. In all of them, he alleged, with some show of reason, that a good soldier has been lost to the Army by the fault of a superior officer, who is really the man that ought to have been got rid of. The reflection that must occur to every reader of his speech is that these cases have been collected more or less accidentally and at random, and that for every such case brought to notice there will necessarily be dozens which are known only to the sufferers. The direct loss of capable officers by this cause is serious enough, but more serious still is the indirect effect in disgusting and discouraging others and in repelling young men from a career which may be cut short at any moment by the caprice or malice of a superior.

What is the remedy for this state of things? No one denies that, if promotion is to bear any relation to merit, officers must be reported upon by those under whom they are serving. It may be—I am not concerned to argue the point—that the King's Regulations offer, on paper, a fair show of security against the abuse of the reporting officer's authority. But in practice this security has been allowed to become an empty form, and the blame for this rests with the War Office. Again and again scandals arising out of confidential reports have brought to light the fact that the regulation requiring an unfavourable report to be communicated to the man concerned has been disregarded. But there is not, to the best of my belief, a case on record in which the reporting officer has suffered for this gross and mischievous breach of discipline. From the frequency with which such irregularities are brought to light it is a fair inference that they disclose a common practice. The War Office has seen this evil practice growing up, and has made no attempt to stop it, although it could be effectually discouraged by making an example of any officer guilty of such irregularity, and could be suppressed altogether by the addition of a sentence to Paragraph 138, King's Regulations, requiring an adverse report to be signed by the officer reported upon, in proof that he has seen it. A further fault of the present system is that when an adverse report has been rendered with all due formality, insufficient opportunity is given to the accused of justifying himself if he desires to do so. A senior officer, at any rate—a commanding officer above all—should have an indefeasible right to a court of inquiry in such a case, and the Army Council should have no power to refuse it, for when the Army Council has once taken action against an officer on the strength of his report it is practically on its defence, and, therefore, ought to have no control over further proceedings. All this would have been perceived and provided for long ago but for the radical vice of our present system of military administration—the complete lack of touch and sympathy between the War Office and the regimental officer. The regimental officer holds that the Army is at present run by a staff of mandarins, hide-bound in the traditions of their exalted caste, and, whether having forgotten or having never had the opportunity of learning, ignorant of the conditions of regimental life and practical soldiering. In this the regimental officer is right. The Army Council has so far utterly failed to acquire the confidence and respect of the Service; and the reason is, not that its constitution is defective, but that it has never been composed of the right men. That is why the House of Commons hears speeches like Major Adam's, and why the House of Commons ought to take up the indictment and thresh it out.

KENNEL CLUB CRUELTY.

Some sensation has been caused in "doggy" circles by a very severe judgment passed by the committee of the Kennel Club upon Mrs. Ashton Cross—a well-known breeder and exhibitor of Pekinese and other dogs. There is a very strong feeling that Mrs. Cross has not been fairly dealt with, and I think that opinion will be shared by any one who reads, as I have done, the evidence given before the committee. The charge made against Mrs. Cross was that she exhibited a Pekinese dog at the Birmingham show in January last which was not entered and not registered, and that the dog was exhibited in the name of another dog of hers which was registered; and, further, that having been informed by the secretary of the club that she must relinquish the prize-money which she had won with the dog in question, she took no proper steps to do so, or to inform the secretary of the Birmingham show that she had been told to do so, and eventually, when the money was paid over to her, did not refund it or offer to refund it. These are obviously charges of very dishonourable conduct. The committee of the Kennel Club virtually found that they were proved. They suspended Mrs. Ashton Cross from exhibiting at any show under Kennel Club rules for the next two years, ordered her to be prevented from attending any such show, and further disqualified her for life from judging at or taking any part in the management of a show.

This conclusion was arrived at after a lengthy inquiry at which Mrs. Cross was represented by Sir Edward Clarke, K.C., and Mr. George Joseph; and it is not possible within the limits of an article to examine the whole of the evidence that was given. But the substance of Mrs. Cross's case was as follows. The dog entered at Birmingham was one of a litter of four pups rejoicing in the names of Chu-ting, Chu-ming, Chu-sing, and Chu-wen. Chu-sing was the hero of the story. It was not disputed that he was entered and shown at Birmingham in the name of his brother Chu-ting, but Mrs. Cross asserted that this was purely an accidental mistake. Chu-ting, who was duly registered, had been exhibited in London in November, and at the time when the entries for Birmingham were being made a gentleman was negotiating for the purchase of him. Mrs. Cross stated that she proposed to exhibit Chu-sing at Birmingham, and although he does not seem to have been registered in accordance with the rules, she either overlooked or did not attach much importance to that fact, thinking that it was a formality which could be complied with later. She is assisted in the management of her dogs by her daughters, one of whom filled up the entry form and wrote the name Chu-ting in place of Chu-sing. The daughters, as well as Mrs. Cross herself, gave evidence before the committee, and generally bore out this view of the matter. Mrs. Cross noticed that the name was printed "Chu-ting" in the catalogue, but said that she regarded this as a printer's error, and several other mispriats of names were pointed out. Such was the case in regard to the entry of the dog. As regards what happened afterwards, it appeared that Mrs. Cross's daughter had written on February 16—some two or three weeks after the show—to Mr. Jaquet, secretary of the Kennel Club, explaining the mistake, expressing regret for it, and saying that, of course, the dog "must be disqualified, and lose the second prize which he won." This letter was written in consequence of her attention having been called to the mistake by a communication from the purchaser of Chu-ting, who, having seen this name in the Birmingham catalogue, concluded that the dog that had been delivered to him was not the dog he had bought, and demanded satisfaction. Mr. Jaquet, in his reply to Mrs. Cross, requested her to write to the Birmingham secretary relinquishing the prize money. This was done, though not till ten days after the receipt of Mr. Jaquet's letter. The Birmingham secretary replied that if the Kennel Club did not take exception to the dog being exhibited in the wrong name the prize-money would be sent, as usual. I am not sure what the prize-money was, but from a remark made by Mrs. Cross it would seem to have been £1. The Birmingham Committee actually did forward the money—I presume provisionally—but at that time legal and other proceedings were pending, and acting under legal advice Mrs. Cross retained the money until May 29, when she refunded it after receipt of an intimation from the Birmingham Committee that this ought to be done. The charge against her was lodged with the Kennel Club Committee on May 26.

There was no conflict of evidence in this case. The only witnesses examined were Mrs. Cross and her daughters. They gave their explanation of the facts, and the Committee simply refused to believe them. The Committee do not seem to have had a particle of justification for so doing. That the ladies conducted their business in a somewhat unbusinesslike manner would possibly be a fair comment on the case; but there is nothing in the evidence to justify any stronger conclusion, and ladies are so frequently unbusinesslike in their habits that it is monstrous for a body of gentlemen to impute to them fraudulent motives, dishonourable conduct, and downright lying merely because the wrong name of a dog was given in entering it for a show, and because, after the mistake was discovered and notified to the club by the exhibitor, further letters were not answered or written as promptly as they might have been. Except for the initial fact of the entry of the wrong name, the rest of the case against Mrs. Cross is simply frivolous and vexatious. After she had herself communicated the facts to the Kennel Club, spontaneously relinquishing the prize-money, and, in accordance with their instructions, placed herself unreservedly in the hands of the Birmingham Committee, there was obviously no ground for charging her with improper conduct in the later stage of the case, and this charge appears to have been only thrown in as a make-weight. As regards the one substantial count of the indictment, a club committee have no right to convict a member of dishonourable conduct except upon clear and conclusive evidence. Where a particular act is open to either a favourable or unfavourable construction, the favourable construction ought to be adopted in the absence of evidence excluding it. There was certainly no such evidence in the present instance, and the decision of the committee is as unjust as it is cruel.

£5,000 FOR A PENNY.

The current number of Answers contains an announcement of a "record prize offer" of £5,000. This sum is the first prize in one of those seductive competitions which turn on the prediction of the number of births or deaths that will be registered in a given area in a specified future period. In this case the competitors are invited to forecast the number both of births and deaths registered in London, Manchester, Cardiff, and Glasgow during the last six months of 1910.

As has been more than once pointed out in Truth, competitions of this type are among the most ingenious and effective schemes ever introduced for transferring cash from the pockets of the public to those of newspaper proprietors. The mere chance of winning £5,000 by eight lucky guesses is enough in itself to draw competitors by the hundred thousand. But, as the class which invests its pennies in gambles of this sort well knows, and as the promoters of the gamble well know, success in this particular kind of prediction is not wholly a matter of luck. The birth-rate and the death-rate are pretty closely governed by the law of averages. When you have ascertained—and the information is accessible to everybody—the number of births and deaths registered for a number of years past in a given locality between certain dates, you have a pretty safe guide to the limits of variation in the figures for corresponding dates in the near future. It only remains to deduce in this way a reasonably wide maximum and minimum figure, put in a series of forecasts covering all the intermediate figures, and you may rest fairly assured that one or other of your forecasts will be correct. In short, the prize is most likely to go to the competitor who puts in the largest number of forecasts based upon the averages of recent years. It is here that the newspaper proprietor comes in. There is no limit to the number of forecasts that any individual may send in. All that is required of him is that each one shall be written upon the coupon printed for the purpose in each copy of the paper. In other words, every man, woman, and child in the kingdom may have as many guesses as he or she pleases at one penny a guess—the price of a copy of Answers. In order to catch the largest possible number of pennies the competition is kept open for many weeks—an arrangement which incidentally seems to give a considerable advantage to competitors who happen to be in, or in touch with, the public registry offices of the towns to which the competition relates, for the competition only started at the beginning of July, the first of the six months for which the forecast is required. For the further encouragement of competitors the corresponding figures for the last six months of the past three years are supplied gratis by the promoters, so that every competitor has a good basis for his forecast ready to hand. Subordinate features, all tending to serve the same purpose, are, first, a proviso that in the event of a tie for the first prize, which involves its division, an extra £100 will be given to the coupon first received, which is an inducement to competitors to hurry up with their coupons as quickly as possible; and, secondly, a prize of £50 to the newsagent whose stamp is found on the winning coupon—a potent inducement to newsagents to push the sale of the paper. On the top of all this throw in a second prize of £100, a third of £50, and fifty consolation prizes of £1 each, and you can almost see the millions of pennies rolling into the Answers till. The wit of man could hardly devise a more masterly method of running a public gambling scheme under colour of selling a newspaper.

A peculiar interest attaches to the Answers "Record Prize Offer" from the fact that competitions of this class received considerable attention at the sittings of the recent Joint Parliamentary Committee on Lotteries and Indecent Advertisements, and that the competitions in Answers were the subject of much edifying evidence given by Mr. R. Hamilton Edwards, as a director of the Amalgamated Press, Limited, and managing editor of a number of its publications, Answers included. Mr. Edwards revealed on that occasion an almost pious abhorrence of competitions such as that described above. Here are a few questions and answers which clearly show how strongly he feels on the subject:—

1073. Would you tell the Committee what steps you would take with regard to these competitions?—I can only suggest that some law should be framed which would prevent the running of competitions for prizes of very great value or competitions in which entry fees are permitted.

1074. Would you suppress all competitions in which entrance fees are asked for?—Most certainly.

1075. Would you make the demanding of an entrance fee the test and the dividing line rather than anything else?—Emphatically, but I think I would include also the offering of any very great prize, say, a prize of £500 or £1,000.

1076. It has been suggested to the Committee that they should forbid rather the coupon system; in your opinion, that would not go far enough?—No, it does not, because the coupon in connection with the offer of a big prize is rather an incentive to gambling.

1077. Would you go further and forbid all competitions in which entrance fees were demanded?—Yes, no matter what the nature of the entrance fee might be; I regard the coupon as an entrance fee.

After this the committee were evidently puzzled to know why the witness's firm were among the most conspicuous promoters of such competitions. The explanation was given with admirable frankness:—

1081. Would you explain to the Committee why it is that, holding these views, you approve of the issue of competitions or of competitions being conducted in connection with journals with which you are connected?—Because I, as managing director of a company owning a lot of newspapers and periodicals, have to come into competition with other newspapers and periodicals also offering competitions, and if we were to refrain from offering prizes similar to those offered by our rivals we should possibly depreciate very greatly the value of our properties, and our shareholders would call us to account for having misconducted our trust.

The unfortunate gentleman appears, therefore, as an object for profound sympathy. He feels acutely the errors of his ways, but he is powerless to amend. As director of a company his fiduciary position makes him the slave of unprincipled shareholders who insist that dividends shall be earned by hook or by crook. As a managing editor he is bound hand and foot and deprived of his free will by the inexorable laws of trade competition. He appeals to the Legislature to deliver him from his bondage. Thus:—

1097. So that it would not be sufficient, I suppose, if any legislation was passed dealing merely with the limericks, but it ought to deal with the whole question?—It ought to cover all sorts of competitions.

1098. And the only way, in your opinion, of getting at these competitions is to strike at the root of them, which is the entrance fee?—Exactly.

1099. Not the coupon, but the entrance fee?—The entrance fee and the competitions in which a very large prize is offered.

Before leaving the evidence, here is another passage which justifies what I have said above as to the promoters' knowledge of the peculiar conditions of the birth-rate and death-rate competitions:—

1108. As to the question of guessing the number of births, I suppose that is not entirely chance if it is honestly done?—The number of births in a given town has been registered over and over again, and you can search the records and guess, but you cannot be sure that the precise number is going to happen on any given date, so that if you found that the average return was from 290 to 310 and you wished to be sure, you would possibly use twenty coupons in order to cover the margin.

Or if you wanted to make assurance double sure you might spend another 1s. 8d. and widen your margin of safety on each side.

It is certainly significant that after all this evidence we should now have Answers boldly breaking the record in the matter of birth-rate competitions. The big prize is, in the opinion of Mr. Edwards, the chief source of the evil. You may feel that the stress of competition compels you to offer a big prize, but why need you lay yourself out to beat the record, and thereby invite your competitors to go one better, compelling yourself in due course to raise the limit once more? Apparently Mr. Edwards feels that if you are to be hanged you may as well be hanged for a sheep as a lamb. It might also be suggested by a severe moralist that if a company director finds that his conscienceless shareholders and his unscrupulous competitors compel him to do things that he strongly disapproves of, he has a simple way of escape open. There is no compulsion on a man to be a company director. However, we must take the facts as they are. The managing director of Answers thinks that these competitions ought to be stopped by law. The last Answers competition proves that they will not be stopped by any other means. The Joint Committee recommended legislation, and the time has long since come when the Government ought to deal with the subject The present moment seems particularly auspicious for the purpose, since such legislation would be essentially "non-contentious."

WOMEN I HAVE MET.

The Sale Woman.

The Sale Woman is by no means ashamed of her passion for getting something for nothing. Rather does she uphold the principle on the grounds that it is instinctive—since au fond we are all predatory animals—and that it develops in the character boldness, resource and the triumph of mind over material. While modestly aware of her own special facilities—a natural stare, an always available deafness, and two daughters whom she has trained to hold fast to coveted objects until her own attention be duly focussed upon them, she sees no reason why particular friends should not endeavour to emulate her prowess, if only to make them realise their own deficiencies.

The Sale Woman realised from the beginning that war cannot be waged in kid gloves, and also that in war-time it is best to wear your old clothes. Thus she never hesitates to take possession of a dozen coveted "articles" from under the disappointed noses of undecided rivals, nor fears to explain to the unduly wearied attendant that, after all, she thinks she will only take one of them; equally bold is she in trying on a whole pile of "marked-down" blouses, insisting that every button shall be buttoned, and then, after frank disparagement of each, refusing with due firmness to buy one of them. I remember seeing the Sale Woman deliberately seize a blouse that had been taken hold of by an enterprising rival, and when the blouse was torn in the conflict of wills, the Sale Woman covered her semi-defeat by proving conclusively that it was the other woman's bounden duty to pay for it, and that for her part she was not accustomed to such behaviour in a really respectable shop.

That the Sale Woman is not ungenerous may be seen from the fact that, having scrupled to pay an extra shilling for something that merely professes to be of superior quality, she will, without moving a muscle, pay three times as much as she intended for something merely because it is marked down. In the generosity of her heart she is never so enthusiastic as over the "slightly soileds," the "misfits," or the "owing to recent mournings. Even after a day of guerrilla warfare she is never out of temper, but having scored all along the line, purrs over each parcel as it arrives, detailing what it cost and what it might have cost; how three other women were after it, but—here a knowing smile—what one really saves if one really understands these things!

A vivid imagination is the lot of very few of us. The Sale Woman has it in superabundance. Thus, while most women buy a belt to match a dress, she will see that the only possible use for a captivating belt at 1s. 11¾d. is a dress valued at several guineas; I have often had the privilege of seeing her buy a blouse for guineas merely because the buttons pleased her. As she herself tersely puts it, it is the smallest causes which often lead to the greatest results. The liveliness of her mind further causes her to alternate between two extremes. Thus one year she will uphold stoutly the principle of cheapness at any price, and that it is only judgment that counts; the following year she will be equally convinced that if you want things you must pay for them. The financial result is about the same, for whereas a bout of cheap buying leads the Sale Woman into a practical celebration of her own economies, a succession of expensive things causes her to refrain heroically from all the little things at something and a farthing which are really her soul's delight.

Perhaps the only disadvantage of the alternate system is that one year overlaps into another, and that the dressmaker, with her usual perverseness, objects to trimming an expensive brocade of one year with a lace of exquisite cheapness of another. Further, she can never see how much it is to her own advantage to convert cheap ready-mades into creations of Parisian chic—nor does she like unpicking sale garments in order to use the trimmings for one new gown, the lining for another, the outside for a third, quite regardless of the fact that it saves time and trouble to buy them all together, even though they may need later a little ingenuity and adaptation.

But when the Sale Woman has difficulties to overcome, she overcomes them. In the intervals of sales, short though they be, she answers advertisements for everything under the sun, sells her old clothes at high prices, chops her jewellery, or turns an honest penny in old false teeth. A woman's soul loves a bargain, but it is perhaps the Sale Woman's everlasting merit that her bargains are nearly always those of other people.

A SPURT AT WESTMINSTER.

As compared with the leisurely pace at which we have been travelling since Parliament reassembled, we witnessed last week quite a spurt in galvanic activity which cannot fail to leave its mark upon the few remaining weeks of the summer sitting. It is generally recognised to be a good thing that we have a move on us at last. No more dallying with Census Bills and passing convivial hours with superannuated Scottish policemen, which have been about the extent of our ambitions as law-givers in recent weeks.

The truce was all very well in its way, but it led to a lot of privy conspiracy and rebellion. I have told you about the gallant but unavailing endeavours of Mr. Wedgwood to pin Mr. Asquith down to a definite Veto policy while the Conference is still incubating. After a good deal of forlorn-hope heroics against the Treasury Bench our more determined spirits below the gangway banded themselves together into a conclave scarcely less secret and mysterious than the Conference itself, with this difference, that when the mountain did open it evolved a very formidable sort of ultimatum from our friends to the Prime Minister, which the Master of Elibank handled as gingerly as one would a hot potato. The example was contagious. Long-suffering as they have been through all these years the Scottish Liberals have grown weary of the defection and lukewarmness of their friends and countrymen on the Treasury Bench, and have formed their own definite and distinctive party, with which the Master will presently have to negotiate hat in hand. Considering that nearly every sectional interest has its separate Parliamentary organisation, including, I am given to understand, the members interested in the hop-growing industry, it is strange that with all their clannishness the Scots have not thought of it before. For they are essentially of the land, the accent, and the point of view. Delane, of the Times, once described himself as "a Welsh Irishman domiciled in England but strongly attached to Scotland," and he had arguments for the implied confusion; but I should like to see any one try to fit that cap on the head of Mr. Munro Ferguson or Mr. Pirie. The Scottish members have hitherto depended upon individual demonstration. The Old Hand recalls the magnificent instance of Dr. MacGregor. The doctor, a man of noble brow and imposing mien, was returned for Inverness-shire as a supporter of Mr. Gladstone's 1892 Administration. By 1894 Mr. Gladstone had retired into private life, Lord Rosebery had been manœuvred into the Premiership, and Sir William Harcourt was leading a disillusioned and dispirited majority in the Commons. Dr. MacGregor thought the moment propitious to establish his commercial value in votes. He was very anxious to see a Government Crofters' Bill pushed through, and badgered Ministers about it with questions. One Monday afternoon, according to the Old Hand, he pressed Sir William Harcourt for an announcement, and the then Chancellor offered to make one on Thursday. "That is not good enough for me," exclaimed the MacGregor, and, seizing his hat, he stalked out of the House, his nose high in the air. Moreover, he forthwith applied for the Chiltern Hundreds, and the Tories won Inverness-shire hands down.

With this historical moral before us, it is just as well that the Government have put on steam, Conference or no Conference, and have occupied the thoughts of their supporters with something more fruitful than cabals. The Accession Declaration Bill, for instance, although recommended by both leaders and carried on its first reading by an overwhelming majority, will absorb plenty of attention when it gets into Committee. What man will not fluster and bluster about what he is pleased to believe are his religious convictions? And when you have constituents of all shades of lightness and darkness bombarding you with resolutions, emphatic protests, and all sorts of shoddy declarations of faith, you are dragged from your native obscurity into the open. The Old Hand, who is to me a mine of wisdom, narrates an incident that occurred at his club in the early days of the Boer War. The papers recorded, on the vivid authority of our war correspondents, that a lyddite shell had burst with disastrous effects among a Boer commando, who, after a successful scrap with the Rednecks, were returning thanks with psalm and melody. Most improperly, the post-prandial conversation at the club had drifted on to theological topics, and Romans and Protestants were soon at it hammer and tongs. Observing the unpleasant turn of events, a thoughtful man in the corner interposed with: "Talking about religion, I guess that lyddite shell gave that Boer prayer meeting h——." There was a shout of laughter, and the members at once settled down to more reasonable topics. I think that something of the sort—of course, strictly Parliamentary—will be needed if we are to get the Declaration Bill through without trouble. The first reading of a measure is usually a nominal stage, but three hours passed before the House could be persuaded to release its hold of this one, and we had, as might be expected, fierce opposition from the Ulstermen, and a real Cromwellian pronouncement from so unexpected a quarter as Mr. Alpheus Cleophas Morton, and, as I indicated last week, those twin darlings of the gods Mr. Agar-Robartes and Mr. Neil Primrose, were prepared to go to the stake rather than surrender one jot of their principles. Possibly when, and if, the weather gets warmer, the intense antagonism of the minority to the Bill may evaporate, but the Old Hand, recalling Parliamentary struggles over matters that have involved no question of faith, is quite prepared for an all-night sitting on the Bill. That may or may not be, but whatever happens we shall feel that we are the worthy heirs of the storied past, descendants of the Thirty Years' War, and all that sort of thing. The subtle humour of it is that Mr. Asquith is keeping back the final stages of the Bill, together with the Budget, until the autumn sitting, so that if Mr. Redmond decides to vote against the whisky duty in November he may be threatened with the loss of his amended and acceptable Accession Declaration.

Happening to stroll across to the House of Lords on Monday afternoon to see what sort of a reception they gave the Bill intended to mitigate the horrors of the traffic in worn-out horses—a measure that I am glad to say has been unanimously supported chez nous—I was edified to find the Lord Chancellor giving the two Front Benches a piece of his mind. On the day consecrated to the little transatlantic affair between Jeffries and Johnson, Lord Loreburn seemed to put himself into the correct fighting attitude. He impatiently shook back his wig, danced aside from the Woolsack, clenched his fists, and squared up bravely to the object of his assault. It seems that there has been some trouble in Committees on private Bills caused by certain decisions of the Lords "in their judicial capacity"—i.e., the ennobled lawyers—on the interpretation of the Local Government Acts, and things are so much at sixes and sevens that Lord Crewe, with the full consent of the Prime Minister, agreed to the appointment of a Joint Committee of the two Houses to try and straighten out the tangle. The Lord Chancellor beamed upon the House while the polite and amiable discussion was in progress, but at its close he metaphorically tossed his wig into the ring and told Ministers and ex-Ministers that it was all their fault for deliberately employing ambiguous language in their legislation, because they could not agree among themselves, in the hope that the Courts would presently interpret it in their favour. The poor judges often find it difficult to attach a "coherent meaning" to the Acts—something that should surely be recalled in their favour when we come to discuss the Judicature Bill on Friday—and Lord Loreburn pleaded for intelligible language instead of a series of conundrums "almost insoluble to the piercing intellects of his Majesty's judges and the more obtuse intellects that are to be discovered here." Having thus neatly planted his upper-cuts all round, the Lord Chancellor sank back on the Woolsack and was ministered to by his mace-bearer. I fled back to the Commons to find them going over the familiar ground of the Budget.

THE NEW MEMBER.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE DUC D'ALENÇON.

NO situation is more envied by old-fashioned French aristocrats than that of Bailli of the Order of Malta. The Grandmastership is beyond their reach. Membership is counted by them better worth having than, perhaps, the Blue Ribbon is in England. Think, then, how highly the late Duc d'Alençon, as Bailli honoraire et Grande Croix de Malte and a Bourbon Prince, must have stood in their eyes. The seat of the Order is at Vienna. There, as brother-in-law of the Empress Elizabeth and a semi-Coburg Kohary, he found himself at home. But his real home was the Valley of the Thames. The Revolution of 1848 drove him with the other members of the Nemours branch of Louis Philippe's family to Bushy House. Queen Victoria, a cousin equally with Prince Albert of the Duchesse de Nemours, lent them this residence, and they kept it until the death of the Duc de Nemours fourteen years ago. The Duc d'Alençon was the same age as Prince Alfred (later Duke of Edinburgh), and they were very much together when the latter was sent to stay at the White Lodge, Richmond.

The late Duc had, when obliged to live abroad as a cavalry officer, a craving for the scenery of the Thames Valley, between Chiswick and Pangbourne. He hardly knew any other up to the age of twenty-six, when he left England to enter the French army. Its peacefulness and soft variety calmed him after he had lost his wife in the Charity Bazaar fire. To live near his old haunts became then a necessity, and he took Belmont, near Wimbledon, where he died. Of a sweet, pensive, pious nature, he had the calm there which enabled him to live in the spirit of a George Herbert or a Keble. The Duchesse was a singularly lovable being, a child of nature like her sisters, an unconscious imitator of Diana Vernon, whom she worshipped as a growing girl, and the darling niece of the Duc d'Aumale. The Duc d'Alençon was supposed to have felt remorse at having thwarted her inclinations in a crisis of her life and obliged her to quit Munich, where she wished to be near her daughter and her two brothers, who sympathised with her unconventional nature and love of personal independence. Had she not been constrained, she would not have met the terrible death by fire. The thought brought anguish to him everywhere, but with least bitterness in England. She also had lived at Bushy, where her eldest child was born, but preferred the Bavarian Highlands and the Valley of Meran to that of Richmond. She could not endure the stiff English manner, and thought that of the French too ceremonious. When the Duc was in garrison at Vincennes he had the name of being the handsomest cavalry officer in the French service. He had a most engaging, sunny countenance. He used to head brilliant cavalcades, in which his wife, the ex-Queen of Naples, the Countess de Trani, and sometimes the Empress Elizabeth figured. They looked so at home in the saddle, so joyously flushed by the keen air of the woods, so happy in each other's company, that no prescience could have sighted the cloud of tragedy that awaited most of them.

As an old gentleman the Duc d'Alençon gained in interest. He might have served as a model to, say, J. P. Laurens painting a scene from the life of Fra Angelico. If the eyes that were formerly all sunshine expressed infinite suffering the rest of the face had a peculiarly sweet expression.

His mother, Duchesse de Nemours, née Victoria of Saxe-Coburg, and a playmate often of the late Prince Consort, was a sweet blonde, all but really handsome, and troubled, as was the Duc de Nemours, with painful shyness. He had a stutter that seemed to strangle him, when, as a future Regent, he received deputations on a tour that both made in the West of France. To conceal his stutter he affected to be distant and a Prince of few words. This attitude deeply offended those whom he received. The poor Duchesse spoke French with a German accent, of which she afterwards rid herself. She often broke down when she had to accept bouquets and pay back ladies their complimentary little speeches. She sometimes cried from shyness, and got the name of a mannerless creature bred in a convent. The poor thing had not had a hearty welcome from her father-in-law. He proposed for her in his son's name, on the assumption that the Duke and Duchess Ferdinand of Coburg-Kohary would send her to France with a considerable marriage portion. They were rich beyond the dreams of avarice, and almost first in wealth among the magnates of Hungary. But the richer the Duke grew the closer-handed he became. He proposed a dowry of 50,000 frs. a year, instead of the 150,000 frs., at least, which the French Court expected. After great haggling he agreed to give 70,000 frs. a year. Louis Philippe asked the Chamber of Deputies for a dotation of 300,000 frs. for his son and a widow's dower for the Princess of Coburg of 100,000 frs. This demand led to a debate that made a great noise in the early spring of 1840, and in which seeds of the coming revolution, then eight years distant, were sown. The bulk of the King's private fortune was approximately ascertained by the Opposition. It produced an income not less important than that now arising from the Duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall. The guardians of the Comte de Chambord, who was the guest of Austria, obtained through Metternich a list of the properties in Austria and Bohemia and territories in Hungary of the Duke of Coburg-Kohary, with information from Viennese bankers as to his investments. An outcry against the rapacity of the two millionaire fathers, as we should now say, was raised in the Chamber and echoed throughout France. The majority on which the Government reckoned became so impressed that it voted "No dotation." This vote took place following the one of the House of Commons that settled 750,000 frs. on Prince Albert as future husband of Queen Victoria. She was very angry at the whole thing. In 1848 she tried to make up to her Nemours cousins for their mésaventure by lending them Bushy House for as long a time as they might choose to keep it. They kept it for forty-eight years. The Viennese relatives did not see why they should provide them with a residence in exile.

In sitting for her portrait to Mme. Vigée Lebrun Marie Antoinette said to that artist: "Did you not, at first sight, think me insolent?" "Yes. But the impression at once wore off. At second sight, and ever since, I have thought you divinely gracious." My first sight of Mme. Chermeteff, the winner of the Grand Prix de Paris, gave an impression similar to that to which Mme. Vigée Lebrun owned. It has not yet been replaced by a second sight one. She is strikingly handsome, still young, looks her best in sumptuous raiment and ablaze with jewels, and is of a Jewish type. Her town house in Paris—for she has another in Moscow—is in the Rue de Marbœuf, and the one in which the Comtesse de Beaumont held her literary, artistic, and political court, and helped to lay the foundations of the ill-fated Catholic Union General Bank. It is very much a house, as at present arranged and kept up, to proclaim that ici l'on est riche. Mme. Chermeteff's father, M. Kounetseff, a great Moscow and Paris dealer in fine teas, also had a Paris residence as well as a Moscow one, and educated his children a good deal on French lines. In his time they lived in the Avenue de Bois (one now drops the "Boulogne"), where he died. The fortune he left to his sons, G. G. and N. G. Kounetseff, and to his daughter enabled them to set themselves up with a racing stud apiece. The colours of the MM. Kounetseff have often triumphed at French races. Mme. Chermeteff's husband is a great collector of curios in Moscow, and has also a very large fortune. He and his wife are not the worse friends for following their several tastes in all freedom. I hear that he is head of the house in Moscow and she in the Rue Marbœuf. Her jockeys wear a jacket in cloth of gold, yellow, with blue stripes. She is not less fond of dogs than of horses, and had a kennel at the Rue Marbœuf, the inmates of which are taught not to howl or bark in a way that might justify police interference. It contains twelve specimens of different races. At her place near Moscow she has a rare collection of domesticated animals. Her "rocs' eggs" are the Imperial breed of mops dogs, and the auroch, or gigantic bison, of Central and East Europe, but now extinct save in the Tsar's forest estate in Lithuania.

Mme. Chermeteff is not the only lady to have gained the Grand Prix de Paris. During the Presidency of M. Félix Faure, Mlle. Marsy, of the Français, while still in deep mourning for Le Petit Sucrier, Max Lebaudy, carried off that prize. She had then a famous racing stud, on the management of which an American millionaire kept, in her interest, a sharp eye. The prize was said to have brought her upwards of 800,000 francs—a nice addition to the fortune the young sugar king had left her. The President, it was noticed, avoided sending for her to come and receive his congratulations in his tribune, where he and Mme. Faure were surrounded by the ladies and gentlemen of the Corps Diplomatique. But under the pretext of examining the winning horse he complimented her beside it. On marrying some comte or another and saying good-bye to the stage, she decided to live the life of an opulent chatelaine and Lady Bountiful. To this end she offered for the poor at the altar of her parish church a pearl necklace appraised at 500,000 francs. The late Mme. J. Stern, whilom the brilliant Sophie Croizette, also of the Français, set herself up, too, with a racing stud and horse farm at St. Jacques, in the Oise. Mmes. Brochard, Ricotti, and Clément Froment's colours are well known on French racecourses for their victories. The ex-Queen of Naples for many years had a stud farm near Boulogne-sur-Mer and stables near Chantilly. The Empress of Austria used to visit both, and took a practical interest in them.

I do not know whether I ought to speak of the ladies of the Stella Club, at St. Cloud, as "sportswomen." They hope to form there a little Auteuil, but not for terrestrial steeplechases, only for aviation matches. It is now sixteen months old, and has 156 members of both sexes. Grand Dukes and Grand Duchesses head the list. The Archduke Leopold and the Archduchess Blanche of Castille, his wife, have, I hear, accepted honorary membership. They are both air enthusiasts, and their eight children are bitten with their craze, or passion. The Archduchess is a sister of the Spanish Pretender, Don Jaimé, and the last person, one might on seeing her think, to go in for air flights with all the impetuosity of her Bourbon nature. The figure of this air princess is short and extremely stout—a feature that rather hits the eye as one sees her between her two eldest daughters, tall, slim archduchesses well on in their teens.

The French duchesses of the club are all authentic and women of wealth in their own right. M. Barthou, the Keeper of the Seals, and the French oil king, M. Deutche de La Meurthe, have just joined. Mme. Blériot has been elected présidente, and Mmes. Surcouf and Poliakoff the vice-présidentes. The name of the former figures in the French naval annals as a glorious pirate, the auxiliary of De Tourville, with no other commission than that of his audacious genius. The lady secretary and treasurer have proved their skill as air-women, but only in the baskets of the balloons. M. Barthou seems as though he heads the whole judicature, a gallant, gay Lothario amid all these air-women. They had him to lunch at their club last week. I have not heard whether he tickled the muse on the occasion. Had they asked him to write something in the club album he would have surely done so. The local habitation of the club is in the grounds of the Aero Park. Officers have been encouraged to join in its sports. The pennon of the Stella is tricolor with a white star on the blue band. Is this a way of saying: While we accept, because we can't do otherwise, the Republic, we disclaim all connection with Marianne?

I cannot help asking myself these questions as I think of M. Briand's last speech: Did he keep a level head under the flattering attentions of the King of Bulgaria, who went to the Chamber to hear him? Or did he merely want to show politeness to a crowned head in taking a Conservative tone, and something more? Or was M. Briand, through the hour in which the Royal visitor affected to listen, merely tickling the trout—that is to say, the elements of a new party—before trying to land it? Nobody, as a debater, has less objection to effecting a change of front in the tribune. Being, as he says himself, a man of realities, he does not mind being inconsistent when by inconsistency he may land the fish. He would like to be in a team with Raymond Poincaré, his colleague at the Bar, where he is a master, as he also is in the Senate, and Poincaré has his eye on Briand, but would be glad were he divested of his too innocent working-class notion that whatever suits him personally must be the right thing. Otherwise his admiration is unstinted. Poincaré grows ecstatic in speaking of Briand's voice, which he thinks no less miraculous in its way than Caruso's.

The Prime Minister's speech after King Ferdinand left went on for an hour and twenty minutes. In this second part he unsaid, under pressure no doubt, all he had said in the Bulgarian King's presence. M. Aynard, a great Lyons banker, the delightful Cochin, and that son of Anak, the 6 ft. 6 in. high De Montebello, had been claiming him as their own. They pretended not to notice his veer round leftwards, whilst the very important Democratic Republican group welcomed him in a frenzy of joy as a strayed sheep that came back to the fold. They forgot or forgave the use he had made on them of the dog lash. Clemenceau sometimes lashed them, too. But it was because his nerves carried him away, and he used an elegant cravache. The mark of the hunting whip unfortunately remained. Consequently those whom he chastised entered into the Delcassé conjuration to turn him out of office.

THE NEW PEPYS.

June 28: Met General Wigg, who have a pretty story to tell me of a wager made by some of his Stock Exchange friends last Ascot. They combining to back Bachelor's Double, and get on some hundreds at market price with Rigden and Cutting, a firm of touting bookmakers. Anon come a wire from a friend on the course announcing the colt's victory. Whereat great rejoicings, and two of their number to Ascot forthwith by motor to draw their winnings. So to Rigden and Cutting's stand, where they find a great placard affixed, upon which the horses that have run 1, 2, 3 in the Hunt Cup are correctly set forth; and immediately following came this announcement: "Also ran—Rigden and Cutting." So this pair of welshers have, at least, the saving grace of humour.

June 29: Encountered my Lord Borehambury in Pall Mall. A mighty fortunate chance, for he did mention that he was minded to call on my wife this afternoon. So I was forewarned. Home to lunch. Presently out with my wife to help her chuse the new tea-gown I have promised her. She being stock-size, abundant choice of such garments offered at the West End sales, and we have a mighty long business, but in my good-humour I will not hurry her; so we are not home from our shopping until after six; where I do find my Lord Borehambury's cards upon the lobby table.

Reckoning up the afternoon's expences, and find that, adding in taxi fares and tea in Bond Street, they are no less than £4 17s. 9d. But I am consoled therefor by the abounding pleasure which my husbandly kindness have brought to the wife of my bosom; whom God knows I do love best of all women, but could cheerfully wring the neck of that Jezebel, Bet.

We to the Ingersoll-Inskips this night, in Berkeley Square, where is a reception and musick. I conversing with Squillinger, who give me a brave report of the King, and say he is already earning golden opinions on all sides, which make good hearing. Told me, moreover, of his recently meeting the Empress of Muscovy, who was monstrous civil to him, and he is not sure but perchance too much is made of her imperiousness.

Anon we fell to discussing the suggestions that have been put forward of late for the improvement of Buckingham Palace. But Squillinger aver—and I think truthfully—that the only way of improving that hideous barrack is to demolish it and build it anew from the foundations. And how any architect can have designed such a structure he cannot conceive; only that they were capable of anything under the Regency.

June 30: To Brompton Parish Church for the wedding of my friend Palmer, 10th Hussars, with my Lady Alexandra Carrington. The bride, who is given away by her father, my Lord Carrington, lookt vastly well in white satin. But more than that of her dress I cannot say, being a man and having no eye for the nice details of feminine toilet. But Lord! If only my wife had been there! For how the wretch would have revelled therein and come away with every seam and gore and gathering registered with precise accuracy upon the tablet of her memory. The bridesmaids were five—to wit my Lady Victoria Carrington, my Ladies Blanche and Diana Somerset, Mistress Gwendoline Glyn, and little Mistress Monica Wilson. They were arrayed in some soft white stuff, whose name I know not, but become them all mighty well. Captain Long, Scots Greys, stood best man, whom I do recollect a small boy at his father's place of Rood Ashton in Wiltshire. And indeed I knew his mother before she was married, being then my Lady Doreen Boyle, daughter of my Lord Cork, at whose seat of Marston by Frome, in Somersetshire, I did use to meet her. And excellent good witty talk she had, and her mother, my Lady Cork, no less, being one of the Canning family and sister to my lord Marquis of Clanricarde.

Anon to the wedding reception in Prince's Gate. Talkt awhile with my Lord Carrington, to whom I recalled a certain election episode, when his relative, Rupert Carington, was standing for North Bucks against one Fremantle, of my Lord Cottesloe's family. And one Tole, a watchmaker in Stony Stratford, being an ardent Liberal, had a facetious practical joke played upon him by the Tories, who on the night before the election did paste his shop front over with great posters, inscribed "Vote for Fremantle." But Tole had got wind of their design, and had caused to be printed, in the Liberal colour, a number of slips inscribed "Don't," and the type mighty big. So he up with the lark and did paste the said slips at the head of the Tory bills. Wherefore when the Tories did come round later to chuckle over their little jest, lo! the laugh was against them, for every one of their bills did now read: "DON'T Vote for Fremantle."

Talking anon of a certain well-known resident of Stony Stratford in yet earlier days, who had many warm admirers and many no less warm enemies. And my Lord tell me how he was once vastly amused to hear two ladies of the rival camps discussing the gentleman at a garden party; and the hostile lady did end by firing off this Parthian shaft at the other: "Oh, yes! You do think him an angel without wings. But I do know him a devil without a tail." Which methought a shrewd example of feminine venom.

July 1: Our vicar have a jumble sale this day for the funds of his Sunday school, and my wife is taking part in it. So out of curiosity, I lookt in. Anon pressed into the service as a salesman by the vicar's daughter, who have good eyes and an alluring manner. Put down my hat and stick on a bench and addressed myself to the selling of old kettles and saucepans. But while my back is turned, some accursed busybody disposed of my hat for 2d., and my stick (which is gold-mounted) for 4d. Moreover, the purchaser have got away with the spoils, and no chance of recovering them; which vext me beyond endurance.

July 2: To Hastings for the week-end to bid adieu to my wife's sister, who, they do assure us, is really dying at last, but an unconscionable time about it. And I cannot but hope that she will not be disappointed this time of her happy release. Moreover, I had lief get full use of my mourning cloathes for the late King, before the cut thereof do become obsolete.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

ACCORDING to the written law, dear Lady Betty, all in England are free, but there are no such slaves to the unwritten law as the English. This it is which occasions that we are free but not independent.

Every Englishman and woman drags the proprieties chained like a cannon-ball to the foot.

Courage tempered with common sense it is that breeds success. Courage resembles the sail which catches the wind; common sense the rudder which guides the ship.

. . . . .

Learn not to fear to say "No," nor to fear to be said "No" to.

. . . . .

The common sense of the commonplace is the best asset of the State.

. . . . .

Theory drives; practice directs, and practice seldom endorses the conclusions of genius in its own generation.

To that is to be attributed the frequent neglect of genius when alive.

. . . . .

Genius is in advance. It addresses posterity. Is it to be wondered at, then, that it is mostly intelligible to posterity only?

. . . . .

You can outgrow your posterity; most genius has.

* * * * * *

Titles, like wine, are the better for the keeping, and "distance lends enchantment," particularly to an ancestor. The latest elevation to the peerage to-day almost always excites the virtuous indignation of the longer-established members of the House of Lords and "society," and it may be depended upon that the majority of new creations have caused similar dissatisfaction from time immemorial. The immediate successor of the newly made Peer is considered to be less objectionable than was the latter; the next bearer of the title is more creditable; and the tenth Baron and his contemporaries point proudly to the once obnoxious founder of the family as to a glorious ancestor whose virtues, necessarily transmitted by heredity, entitle the present Peer to especial respect. Was ever such a comical system adopted and perpetuated in any country but England?

The "Once a Peer, always a Peer" principle is contrary not only to common sense but to the best interests of the community. The Peer in existing conditions is one of the chief centres of example, and if he radiates a pernicious influence he should unquestionably be deprived of the title for the public good.

The phrase "The Governing Class" obviously implies that the remainder of the community is "The Subject Class." This separation of the classes is a survival of the conditions imposed by the successive conquerors of England, and the total removal of the iniquitous distinctions and their accompaniments is the primary object of popular political effort at the moment in the country.

Is it seriously to be pretended that it is an element of "Patriotism" for the many—as representing the vanquished—to continue to yield preferential treatment to the few—as representing the victors?

* * * * * *

"It is not a bark, loud, open and free,
As an honest old watch-dog's bark should be;
It is not a yelp, it is not a growl,
But a something between a whine and a howl . . ."

are lines in the Ingoldsby Legends which are applicable to the present clamour of the Opposition for compromise. There was no suggestion of compromise in connection with the Budget when the Opposition, and especially the Unionists in the Upper House, imagined they had the Commons at their feet, and the drop of the political see-saw from the unconstitutional to the compromise attitude is pitiful in the extreme.

* * * * * *

It is alleged that the country is threatened with a Constitutional breakdown. Mental or physical breakdowns have recently become the national complaints; the slightest increased exertion in the direction of work—not of amusement—almost invariably now produces either a breakdown or symptoms of it which cannot be neglected.

The complaint seems to be comparatively rare in other countries and in our Colonies, and it is, therefore, to be inferred either that the English are not physically or mentally capable of bearing the strain of modern strenuousness, or that "indolence" should be substituted for the term "breakdown."

It is especially curious that whilst our statesmen, politicians, officers, financiers, authors and actors are continually compelled to discontinue work on account, or through fear of a "break-down," our artisans, labourers, domestic servants, shop-keepers' assistants, or clerks are seldom afflicted with the complaint.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER AND THE LAW SOCIETY.

Sir,—In the expression of his opinions—always candid and often forcible—the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a respecter neither of persons nor of professions; but in stigmatising, as he did in a recent House of Commons debate, the Law Society's opposition to new legislation, however beneficial and remedial, as invariably inspired by their desire to maintain at all cost the present high scale of legal charges he was only adding his incisive voice to the general chorus of condemnation of that effete body's obstructive tactics in the past. In almost similar words the late Lord Chancellor denounced their bitter opposition to the much-needed system of land registration, which they tried to prevent being given even a fair trial. Indeed, their antagonism to this measure and to the even more sorely needed appointment of a Public Trustee of private trust funds fully warrants the belief that they allowed the obvious interests of the client to suffer, let us say, temporary obfuscation in the face of the weightier professional considerations raised by these remedial measures.

Stung by this public indictment of their conduct proferred by the Chancellor, who, as a solicitor himself, is in the best position to know, the Council have retorted by a resolution, which they will invite the general meeting of the Law Society to pass next Friday, characterising Mr. Lloyd George's words as "an unfounded aspersion on the honour of the profession to which he belongs." From its terms, the resolution gratuitously assumes that the Council is properly representative of the whole body of solicitors. It is nothing of the kind. In truth, the Council is only a small irresponsible clique, which perpetuates itself by a co-optive system of annual re-election. Its unrepresentative character is attested by the eloquent fact that out of the 25,000 solicitors on the roll only some 9,000 are members of the Society, while out of the 16,000 London solicitors only 4,000 are members.

The great majority of the profession has long ago recognised that the Council's energies are absorbed in furthering the private interests of their own narrow set, leaving the crying needs of the profession utterly neglected. For instance, the Council have persistently refused to remedy the scandalous abuse by which solicitors are allowed to mix their own and their clients' money in one banking account—the main cause of so many solicitors' defaults. A useful legislative measure prohibiting solicitors from mixing their clients' money in this way with their own, and requiring solicitors retaining clients' money to keep a separate clients' banking account, the Council find it too inconvenient to advocate. Public confidence has been shaken, and as an inevitable consequence—and in spite of the Council's strenuous opposition — a Public Trustee has been appointed to protect, at least, clients' trust funds from defaulting trustees, who are so often solicitor-trustees. It is the action, or rather inaction, of the Council which has rendered the appointment of such a trustee imperative, and has brought the profession generally into public discredit.—Your obedient servant,

F. O. C.

FRUIT TREES AND BIRDS.

Sir,—Your correspondent who describes the thrush as "a little thief" doubtless believes in what he says; but in order to confirm or confute his opinion I would recommend him to experiment with a diet of strawberries or other fruit on a tame thrush—not too long, lest the poor bird starve. The thrush subsists mainly on animal food; and I have never seen him "steal" anything more valuable than a caterpillar, grub, slug, or worm. Unobservant people often falsely accuse both thrush and blackbird of attacking fruit, when, did the accusers trouble to use both eye and intelligence, they might find that the birds are merely pecking and pulling to pieces already damaged fruit with the object of securing the grub (a choicer tit-bit than any fruit) which did the original damage, and whose presence the sagacious birds can always detect. These remarks do not apply to that mischievous little rascal the sparrow, for whose flagrant misdeeds innocent song-birds are often persecuted; but it should be widely known that most birds are the gardener's best friends.—Yours truly,

E. G. E.

ROUND THE MARKETS.

The Slump in Yankees—Half-Year Ends with a Panic—Home Stocks Steady—New Irish Loan.

THE Stock Exchange has spent an eventful week. It finished the half-year with a panic in Americans. The prevailing tendency of Yankees has been downwards for some months past, and the decline has been proceeding at a quickened pace since the refusal of the Government to allow the railroads to raise freight rates pending a thorough investigation of the question by the Inter-States Commerce Commission. Last week came the news that while the application of the railroads to put rates up was in abeyance the Inter-State Commerce Commission had actually ordered the lowering of certain freights in the West under a ruling that the roads could not charge more for a short haul than a long haul. Then the downward pace in stocks increased to a gallop, and in a few days the leading stocks had come down from 5 to 10 dollars. How great the drop has been may be seen from the following table:—

| | Highest 1909. | | Highest 1910. | | Lowest last Wednesday. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Baltimore | 124½ | .... | 122⅜ | .... | 108 |
| Erie | 40 | .... | 35⅛ | .... | 25½ |
| Missouri | 52 | .... | 52 | .... | 30 |
| Southern Pacific | 142¾ | .... | 142½ | .... | 111 |
| Union | 226 | .... | 211 | .... | 164 |
| Steel | 96⅝ | .... | 94¼ | .... | 70½ |

The fall has now been so great that a good many people are wondering if the time has not come to buy. It may be that opportunities for quick turns will present themselves in the near future, but, as I have so often had to point out, Yankees are not the things for the small man; they move too violently. Shares in that market should be left only to those speculators possessed of a long purse and able to keep in very close touch with the market. The future of the market is full of uncertainties, and if the worst of the slump has taken place prices are not likely to settle down for some time yet.

Turning to Home securities, the best that can be said is that prices have been comparatively steady. The public, heavily committed as it is in new issues (the total output of new capital in the first half of the year has exceeded that for the whole of 1909), has still no appetite for Home Rails, and neither the approach of the dividend season nor the optimistic trade predictions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer made at the introduction of the Budget last week has stimulated buying. A fresh competitor to Consols is an issue of £4,000,000 guaranteed Irish stock. It will bear interest at 3 per cent. (not 2¾, like previous issues), and is being offered at 92½. The highest class investment stock just now seems to stand the lowest in point of popularity, but for the long shot a 3 per cent. stock bought at a discount of 7½, and literally as good as Consols, should prove a good purchase.

RAILWAYS.

The Grand Trunk Outlook—Traffic Position Favourable—Why Holders of "Thirds" Should Guard Against Over Confidence.

Grand Trunks have suffered from active selling in the past week. The slump in Yankees and the liquidation of a German account helped the decline, while in addition the company's revenue statement for May did not please those people who had looked for big figures. The expansion in gross receipts for the month was satisfactory enough, the gain on the system as a whole being £101,000, but as £91,600 of this went in increased expenses the addition to net revenue was only £9,400. The ratio of expenses to receipts worked out at 69.31 per cent. against 65.91 in the corresponding month of 1909. For the first five months of the year the company's record reads as follows:—

| | Gross Receipts. Inc. | Expenses. Inc. | Net. Inc. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Main Line | £374,900 | £293,800 | £81,100 |
| Canada Atlantic | 23,950 | 5,020 | 18,930 |
| Grand Trunk Western | 81,600 | 72,500 | 9,100 |
| Detroit Grand Haven | 31,300 | 24,550 | 6,750 |
| | £511,750 | £395,870 | £115,880 |

The retention of £116,000 in net out of an addition to gross receipts of £512,000 is not at first sight encouraging, but the report may throw a different complexion on the result. The company has again been wrestling with that item Engine and Car Renewals Suspense Account. In the June half of 1909 the amount applied from revenue towards reducing that debt was £87,000; in the December half the allocation was £259,000. At present X = the appropriation made for the June half of 1910; the amount left to wipe off at December 31 was £197,700, and upon the sum actually extinguished to a great extent depends whether the large published increase in expenses is a matter for rejoicing or grumbling.

A separate statement for the month of June is not issued by the Grand Trunk, and shareholders must now await the half-yearly statement, due about the middle of August. The net gain for the five months on the main line and the Canada Atlantic and Detroit branches is £106,780. (The results of the Grand Trunk Western for dividend estimate purposes may be left out, as the company keeps its accounts separately.) For the first half of 1909 the Grand Trunk paid the due interest on its 4 per cent. guaranteed and 5 per cent. first preference stocks, but left over the question of the dividend on the second preference until the completion of the second half of the year. To give the second preference its due rate next October takes £63,250, and the net revenue gain already shown will (without allowing any addition for June) permit this and leave a balance to be carried forward equal to rather more than ½ per cent. (actual) upon the third preference.

As regards the half-year that has just been entered upon the outlook is favourable. Traffics are likely to continue to expand, and the parent company should derive benefit in connection with the completion in time for this year's harvest of the Government section of the Grand Trunk Pacific line from Winnipeg to Lake Superior Junction, which will give a continuous track from the West to the Great Lakes. The company should start the new half-year, as I have shown, at least £100,000 to the good, and it will not have to make so large a special appropriation from revenue upon reducing the car renewals suspense account as it did in the December half of 1909 (when it wrote off £259,000). But in order to guard holders of Trunk Thirds against over-confidence I would remind them of three things. First, their chairman told them in April that the removal of the suspense account would not mean that the whole sum released could be regarded as available for dividends, because the company would have to charge in its ordinary expenditure a substantially larger amount to take care of the ever-increasing demands for equipment and motive power. Second, the company will have a bigger wages bill to meet owing to the demands of the men to be paid on a higher scale in order to compensate them for the rise in the cost of living. Third, there are the liabilities of the Grand Trunk towards the new Pacific road. Mr. Smithers was good enough to throw light upon the position in this respect at the last meeting; he made it clear that as regards the Prairie section the guarantee of the parent company would not become operative, nor would the parent company be entitled to credits from the new line for some time yet, as the line would not be formally opened until certain terminal and other facilities had been completed. Thus the Trunk cannot apparently be called upon under its guarantees in respect of 1910. But the very fact that the liabilities exist (and may possibly be called into question later on) is a good reason why the Trunk board is likely in the next year or two to avoid a policy of dividing up to the hilt. Ordinary prudence requires that it shall conserve its resources until it can be seen whether or not the company will have to pay out to the new Transcontinental road. This means that holders of the third preference must not be too sanguine about getting their full dividend yet awhile. As a speculative lock-up the stock is doubtless all right, and Trunk Ordinary will continue a favourite amongst speculators owing to the reversionary rights possessed by the stock to the whole of the surplus profits of the Grand Trunk Pacific. But the investor who wants to be pretty well assured of his income will not for the present venture beyond Trunk Seconds.

RUBBER.

Big Dividends—Strength of the Industry—The Investment Position—Three Useful Tables.

The second half of what will prove a memorable year in rubber history has opened well with a shower of handsome dividend declarations. The Linggi and Pataling announcements of 50 per cent. each are followed by Selangor's 75 per cent., Vallambrosa's 183⅓ per cent., making 250 per cent. for the year, Damansara's 25 per cent., Perak's 30, and Batu Caves' 35 per cent. Selangor began last year with an interim of only 6d. per share, and totalled 5s. 9d. for the year; and market connoisseurs say that this first interim of 1s. 6d. per share will lead to a total of 15s. for 1910-11 if rubber maintains the average of the first six months of this year, for not only is the price very high, but there is a larger acreage of rubber now in production. These distributions only serve as a preparation for the long array of record dividends which will repay investors for their confidence in this industry; and there is no other section of the Stock Exchange and no other industry in the world which can provide such tremendous rewards in so brief a period and upon such modest outlays as rubber plantations require. All the assaults which have been made upon this market, all the prophecies of pessimists and the croakings of ill-informed and obstinate stockbrokers cannot overcome the logic of these splendid profits, which are now extending throughout the whole list of producing companies. There are yet to come the dividends of the wild rubber concerns, which will be no less astonishing and will attract greater attention, as their quotations are not yet in the thousands per cent. premium stage. These dividends are incontrovertible; and if we re-examine, perhaps with greater care, the strength of our position we shall find convincing proof of the stability and rich promise of the plantation industry.

I have prepared a small table which, although dealing in exact figures, may help my readers to form a clear view of the position of the rubber investor, and may help to form a definite opinion of what an acre of plantation rubber may be worth. For this purpose I have adopted the scale of yields which, drawn up by the editor of the Straits Times, has found general acceptance among rubber authorities in this country; and I have also combined with it the scale of prices which I employed in my recent tables. With the aid of these figures I have endeavoured to show in a comparative form the net profit which upon a reasonable basis an acre of newly planted rubber and an acre of six-year-old rubber may be expected to produce within the next ten years.

Comparative Estimates of Profit.

| Year. | (1) From an Acre of Rubber now Newly Planted. | | | (2) From an Acre of Rubber now Six Years Old. | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | lbs. | Net Profit per lb. | Total Profit per Acre. | lbs. | Net Profit per lb. | Total Profit per Acre. |
| 1910.... | — | — | Nil. | 240 | 7/- | £84 |
| 1911 ... | — | — | Nil. | 360 | 6/- | 108 |
| 1912.... | — | — | Nil. | 460 | 5/- | 115 |
| 1913.... | — | — | Nil. | 720 | 4/- | 144 |
| 1914.... | 90 | 2/- | £9 | 840 | 2/- | 84 |
| 1915.... | 120 | 2/- | 12 | 840 | 2/- | 84 |
| 1916.... | 240 | 2/- | 24 | 840 | 2/- | 84 |
| 1917.... | 360 | 2/- | 36 | 840 | 2/- | 84 |
| 1918.... | 460 | 2/- | 46 | 840 | 2/- | 84 |
| 1919.... | 720 | 2/- | 72 | 840 | 2/- | 84 |
| Total .. | 1,990 | — | £199 per acre. | 6,820 | — | £955 per acre. |

To plant an acre of rubber and to bring it to maturity may cost anything up to £40, although owing to cheaper labour it may be found to be much lower in districts such as Java and Southern India; and the expected returns of £199 per acre for new planting concerns are based, it will be seen, upon a net profit of only 2s. per lb. Let us cut this estimate down by 50 per cent., and you may halve it again, you pessimists of the Press and you Doubting Thomases of the Stock Exchange, and I defy you and the industrial world to find another investment which combines the promise of such a profit with equal security. This table gives, I hope, due weight to the advantages which are enjoyed by companies which, possessing old rubber in the form of old planted estates, are now marketing their substantial crops at high prices. It is reasonable, too, I think, to conclude from the figures given that an acre of rubber now six years old which to-day earns a profit of £84 per acre will, as the result of its increasing yield, earn as large a profit ten years hence with rubber only yielding 2s. per lb. profit, as against 7s. per lb. to-day. One has only to study and rightly understand the economic position of the industry and the facts stated above to be proof against temporary setbacks and the uncertainties of market manipulation. The planters of the Middle East and the leading spirits of Mincing Lane and the Stock Exchange are confident that the blossoming time of the rubber market still lies far ahead, and the true rubber boom has yet to arrive.

Two years ago it was a proud boast that the wild cat company was unknown in this market. But the unscrupulous promoter has been making hay while the sun of rubber prosperity was shining, and Carey Street will be kept busy for a very long period before all the wreckage is cleared away. Unmarketable shares of rotten companies, unfortunately, form no inconsiderable portion of the shareholdings of the undiscriminating investor; and there is, I am afraid, in the rubber market, as in the mining market, a "graveyard" group of companies which have entrapped shareholders who cannot get out, and will never attract outsiders who have no wish to get in. Any great revival in this market will again set going the wily promoter, and the public must exercise extra care and vigilance. Fortunately, most of the recent new issues have been failures so far as the subscription lists were concerned, the underwriters being heavily landed in many cases.

My recent comparative tables of prospective dividends have been so well received that I have compiled a further list based, as before, on the sum total of the dividends which an investor may reasonably expect to receive over a series of years upon the assumption that the present output of each estate will gradually increase until there is a maximum harvest of 500 lbs. of rubber per acre from the area now under cultivation. The price of rubber is fixed to give a net profit of 7s. per lb. for the present year, 6s. for 1911, 5s. for 1912, only 4s. for 1913, and 2s. per lb. thereafter. Seeing that contracts at 8s. per lb. and over are already being signed for 1912 and 1913, my table must be regarded as excessively cautious, with a very large margin on the price of rubber, and also a very substantial underestimate of the amount of rubber harvested per acre. As I explained last week, the Lanadron gets 300 lbs. per acre the first year of tapping, and 400 lbs. per acre from the second year's tapping, with every prospect of exceeding 500 lbs. from third year tapping.

A shareholder in the Batu Tiga, for instance, may expect to receive on the basis of such figures total dividends of £5 5s. during the next six years, and a total of £12 for a period of twelve years from 1910 onwards. As the present price of the share is 5¾ one can expect to get a return of capital twice over within twelve years, apart from the ruling value of the shares at the end of this period. This is a splendid investment return, and Sungei Way, Shelfords, Harpenden, and Inch Kenneth also appear cheap; while Kuala Lumpur and Kamunings both command a longer price, due in some measure, no doubt, to the fact that they both enjoy a freer market and Kamuning has other sources of revenue. By the way, why are Kamuning fully paid "B" shares quoted lower than the 1s. paid "A" shares?

A Suggested Basis for Sound Investment.

Readers who look farther into a rubber prospectus than the front page have probably observed that the professional valuer in making his report invariably bases his estimates of the value of an estate upon the profits which may be expected within a given period, ordinarily from five to seven years according to zone, soil, and condition of the property. The addition of working capital and other expenses to the capital do of course increase the number of years' purchase which the shareholder must reckon to pay; but the investor who wishes to make money out of rubber will save money if he keeps a vigilant eye on the number of years which stand between him and dividends. The principle underlying these valuations has stood the test of time for tea, coffee, and cocoa as well as rubber, and it is much to be deplored that the columns of financial journals and of the pseudo-technical press should teem with statistical nonsense which, whatever its intention, can only delude credulous investors to surrender both their intelligence and their money. Some rubber "valuation" tables which have lately appeared are based upon an assumed price for rubber from the present time up to the year 1960 and thereafter. Now I care nothing what the price of rubber may be in 1960, the practical rubber planter probably cares less, and the investor may well be spared these efforts to pierce the mists of far-distant futurity. These amateur statisticians should realise that statistics have their illusions as well as rhetoric, and that fallacies lurk behind arrays of figures just as well as behind showy metaphors. A view which limits itself to a period when an estate will be in full bearing, say, at the outside, ten years hence, is quite distant enough for all practical purposes. The following table which I have prepared, while not put forward as in itself an absolute and self-sufficient basis for sound investment, yet may serve to correct some prevalent erroneous impressions about rubber estates. This table is prepared to show the future price at which the shares of the leading companies would give a yield of 10 per cent. (and I do not advise my readers to accept less) when the present planted area is yielding 500 lbs. of rubber per acre, selling at a net profit of 2s. per lb. The coming boom period must not be taken as normal, and if this table errs, it errs on the side of caution, leaving substantial margins to avoid disappointment or delay.

cent. dividends, and no less than fifteen should yield over 100 per cent.—and this, too, from their present planted acreage alone. The table, in one sense, is hardly fair to those concerns whose development programme has not yet been completed, and whose dividend-paying capacity will increase as their planted area expands. Nor does it do justice to P.P.K., whose principal revenue is derived from tea, which has not been taken into account. It has 400 acres of tea, which commodity, as most readers know, is expected to experience a bumper year during 1911. The Prye Rubber and Cocoanut Company is excluded, as it is only making profits from sugar at present, and a substantial dividend is due this month from this source alone. Vallambrosa, Anglo-Malay, Cicely, and Kualas look rather dear on a 10 per cent. basis; while Travancore, Merlimau, Nilambur, Glen Bervie, and Asiatics appear extremely cheap. The Nilambur figures are more than satisfactory, and the recent report shows that the board has adopted an excellent policy of expansion which is not shown in my estimates. These tables must be taken as supplementing those given in Truth of April 13 and May 4, and will be followed by others dealing with the speculative group of wild rubber shares which will be a feature in rubber history during the next twelve months.

The Crude Meeting—Taiping Rubber.

The Crude Rubber meeting was a great success, and the shareholders who have weakly been throwing away their holdings during apathetic markets will regret their unwisdom. Both the chairman and manager showed the wonderful progress of the company, and after August, when the output should be twelve tons of clean rubber daily, very big profits will be made, exclusive of those arising from the agencies and sub-sales of foreign rights which are now being negotiated. Undoubtedly these are about the cheapest speculative shares in the market, and should rise to double figures by the time the first balance-sheet is issued. A careful study of the chairman's speech will emphasise this view.

One of the best estates in the Federated Malay States will be offered to the public at the end of the week, and should prove a sensational success. Its title is the Taiping Rubber Plantations, with a capital of £210,000 in 2s. shares, to acquire 5,332 acres of some of the best planted land in Perak. The board is a strong one, including directors of the Kuala Lumpur and Bukit Mertajam, with Col. Ivor Philipps as chairman. Although there will be a great rush for the shares, and they are already called 3s. 6d.-4s. in the market, I do not advise a purchase over 5s. unless shareholders are prepared to wait for the 50 per cent. dividends, which may be reached in 1914-15.

MINES.

Forced Selling from Germany—The Outlook—A Rhodesian Contrast—Crown Mines Dividend—Mexicans.

Yet another spasm of weakness arising from forced liquidation has been experienced by the mining markets, and it made itself felt just when the worst seemed to have been experienced. During the past week there was heavy selling from the Continent of South African descriptions, and other mining sections suffered more or less from the same cause. It was chiefly German selling, and is understood to have been brought about by the continued slump in Yankees, which has hit very hard some speculators abroad. At the end of the week there was a turn for the better in South Africans, but whether the liquidation is really at an end remains to be seen.

The only thing that is certain is that prices in not a few cases have been forced down regardless of intrinsic merits. Although it requires courage to buy when markets are depressed, some speculative investors have been taking advantage of the opportunities afforded them quite recently of acquiring cheap shares, and there is no doubt that they will reap their reward later on. So much stock has come on the markets lately out of weak hands as to make one doubtful of a sustained recovery in the near future, because of the likelihood of some of the "wreckage" coming out directly there is a moderate rally. But the speculative investor who pays for the shares he buys and exercises patience will feel like patting himself on the back eventually, providing, of course, that he pays due regard to merits when making his selections. The buying mood will come over speculators again "as sure as eggs are eggs"; it is only a question of time. But those who wait for a definite lead will, of course, have to pay more than their wiser confrères who buy when things are weak. To buy cheap and sell dear one must not run with the crowd. As I have suggested before, my readers should take a leaf out of the book of the finance houses. They acquire stock in weak markets and let it out at enhanced prices when Tom, Dick, and Harry get the speculative fever and rush in to buy.

The mining "shops" have been taking back a good deal of stock lately. Some of them perhaps have absorbed more than they really desired, but have been practically obliged to take it to prevent their particular market from breaking to pieces. Naturally they will endeavour to bring about a recovery—unless the professionals or the public kindly do the business for them. It does not follow, however, that prices will regain all the ground recently lost. This remark applies chiefly to the Rhodesian section, where there was a boom a few months ago. As I pointed out at the time, prices were then rushed up to giddy heights quite regardless of merits. Not unnaturally, the subsequent fall has been severe in such shares. Some recovery is not improbable, but I should not care to buy them for a rise to the former high level. Appended is a list of Rhodesian descriptions, with prices showing how the present position compares with the recent boom level:—

It will be observed that the share which makes the best—or least unsatisfactory—showing is Globe and Phœnix, of which I wrote at the end of March that on carefully considering the position and prospects of the company "I have lost the surprise which I first felt when a market optimist described Globes to me the other day as nominally the highest-priced but actually the cheapest Rhodesians going." When that was written Globes were £8 (the equivalent of £2 on the present basis), while other Rhodesians were materially above their present prices.

Crown Mines was rather late in announcing its dividend for the half-year just ended, and when the declaration was made it aroused some comment. The rate is 65 per cent. (6s. 6d. per 10s. share), the same as was paid for the second half of 1909, and that corresponds with the official prognostication made when the amalgamation was proposed. It would appear, however, that in declaring this amount for the past half-year the directors are dividing profits right up to the hilt, if indeed they are not drawing upon reserves. The earnings announced for the five months, January to May, amount to £470,000, not allowing for deduction of profits tax. What the June profit is I am unable to say at the moment, as it is not announced up to the time of writing, but unless the amount is greatly in excess of the May profit the company's net earnings will evidently be well below the amount required for the dividend—namely, £611,000. Of course, there are extenuating circumstances; the company has been handicapped by shaft troubles and labour shortage. The probability is that before very long it will be able to make up for the recent comparatively poor returns. Although the shares have come down recently with other Kaffirs, I notice that the price of Crown Mines is still above the level at which they stood when I devoted a special article to the concern last April.

The activity in Mexican gold shares has been fairly well maintained, and after experiencing a relapse on profit-taking, prices have rallied. Some influential people are reported to be interested in this group, and the market is hoping for an expansion of public business. A French expert has been sent to report on the Carmen property, and further development news from the Mexico El Oro is expected shortly. On the information so far available it seems to me that the present prices of the shares discount possibilities a good way ahead—a not uncommon experience in the speculative markets.

Mining Publicity—Globe Agitation Initiated—Shareholders' Grievance—Surprise Next?

Globe affairs have been the subject of much discussion in market circles during the past week. There was heavy selling of the shares a few days before the issue (on the evening of the 29th ult.) of an official circular, and rumour was rife that milling was to be suspended for a time, but that before or after the stoppage more of the richer ore would be treated in order that dividends need not be reduced. There was talk of an accident to the shaft in explanation of the suspension of milling. The official circular (the issue of which was foreshadowed by market rumour) gives as the reason for the suspension of hauling and milling the danger that would be entailed to the workmen by hauling while retimbering and laying heavy rails in the main shaft. It is estimated that this work will take about eight weeks. It will be seen, therefore, that market rumour was very near the mark—not for the first time in connection with Globe affairs. For some time past the market has been kept better informed than the shareholders, and I am glad to see that at last steps are being taken to bring the fact home to the directors that they are not the sole owners of the mine. Mr. F. A. Mitchell Hedges, of 108, Bishopsgate Street, E.C., who is largely interested in the Globe, has sent a letter to the press asking the other shareholders to co-operate with him. Shareholders are entitled to be kept regularly informed as to the mining position, but the Globe and Phœnix directors seem to think that occasional scraps of information are quite enough. The official circular which they issued last week gives "the latest development news received by cable," but the date of the receipt of the cable is omitted, and the news is incomplete. This is the first record of developments issued since the letter from the mine dated April 19. Did no information reach the company's London office from the mine between the letter and the cable? If the answer to that is in the negative, the London management is at fault for not seeing that it is kept more closely in touch with the mine; if in the affirmative, what right had the directors to keep the information from the shareholders? The Globe directors are:—Admiral Sir A. H. Markham, Captain W. N. Lister, and Messrs. T. B. Reynolds (chairman), H. D. Bishopp, J. D. Hope, C. F. H. Leslie, and L. C. Phillips.

I hope that the attempt that is about to be made to stir up the Globe directors will be well supported by the shareholders, and that the agitation will lead to attempts being made to bring other Rhodesian companies to book. As I have pointed out in previous Notes, the Surprise is an offender in regard to the important matter of keeping its shareholders fully and regularly informed as to the progress of work at the mine. This company's shares, it will be noticed, make about the worst showing in the table given in another column. There are two reasons for this. The high price was the result of speculative enthusiasm at a time when merits were disregarded, and, of course, when a price is carried much above what is justified it is bound to have a fall sooner or later. In addition, the reticence of the management as to the result of development work in the mine has given rise to a feeling of distrust, and the weakness of the shares has thus been accentuated. If the fullest possible information were given to the shareholders they might not like the nature of it, but it were better they should have the whole tale told them than it should be known to only a select few. The Surprise directors are Sir J. C. Willoughby, Lieut.-Col. A. W. Jarvis, and Messrs. H. Wilson Fox and G. R. Saunders.

INDUSTRIALS.

Sewing Cotton's Wonderful Figures—Telephone Deferred—Anglo A—Mexican National Packing Scheme—Nitrate Consumption.

The feature of the week in the industrial market has been the extraordinarily fine exhibit made by the English Sewing Cotton Company. According to the preliminary statement, the net earnings for the year ended March 31, after providing for depreciation, debenture interest, and fees, amounted to £346,400, showing an advance of no less than £206,400 over the total for the previous year. The dividend has been raised from 8 to 10 per cent., while the allocations include £75,000 to general reserve, £50,000 to reserve for equalisation of dividends, £25,000 to reserve for contingencies on stocks, and £10,000 to pension fund. No appropriations to these funds were made a year ago. The balance carried forward is £92,000 against £55,600. To a very large extent, the improvement has been due to the better results achieved by the American Thread Company, in which the English concern has a controlling interest. The former's net earnings rose from £101,000 to £350,500, and the dividend went up from 4 to 15 per cent. The figures naturally had a good effect upon Sewing Cottons, and indeed upon textiles generally.

The National Telephone Company is maintaining the dividend on the deferred stock at 6 per cent., but is setting aside £175,000 against £150,000 to reserve. The deferred stock has been in demand on the idea that it is worth a higher price under the terms of expropriation by the Government, and allowing also for a distribution of accumulated reserves. Anglo A has been an erratic market. At one time the stock was let down to nearly 23, on the rumour that the proposed "deal" was finally off, but immediately the fall occurred the stock was rushed up to 26. Anglos have for years been a profitable speculative counter for certain insiders, but such movements as those seen lately make the stock anything but a desirable holding for those outside the charmed circle.

The reorganisation scheme published in the last few days on behalf of the Mexican National Packing Company is a reminder of one of the most scandalous company promotions of recent years. The company, which was formed under the laws of the State of New Jersey, U.S.A., had a bond and share capital of £7,000,000. This it is now thought necessary to cut down to £3,750,000, and of this reduced amount £1,000,000 represents new money which will have to be found. The proposal is to sell the property to an English company, which will be provided with working capital through a new issue of £600,000 five per cent. first mortgage bonds, part of £1,000,000 created. The issue will be underwritten by a syndicate at a price which will net 80 per cent. for the company. The 6 per cent. Rastro debentures of the old company are to give up all their special rights and to take in exchange 60 per cent. of 6 per cent. second mortgage income debenture stock and 40 per cent. of new 6 per cent. preference stock, while holders of the old 6 per cent. first mortgage bonds are to be given an equivalent amount of 6 per cent. preference. It is a ruthless scheme, but whether the bondholders by holding out will be able to do better for themselves is open to question. They must take what comfort they can from the fact that they are not being asked to put up more money.

For holders of nitrate shares the results of the past year have disclosed an interesting position. While there is little likelihood of any renewal of the nitrate combination which terminated in March, 1909, the low prices that followed the free production seem to have gone a long way, by stimulating consumption, towards providing the remedy that the companies need. The increase in consumption has been 23 per cent. or a total of 2,242,000 tons, the most notable advance being in the case of America, where the demand has gone up by 171 per cent. since 1902. The importance of the growth lies in the fact that farmers, once they can be got to adopt the use of nitrate, never give it up, but the inborn prejudice of the agriculturist against new methods makes him slow to adopt the artificial fertiliser.

OIL.

The Outlook for Spies—The Drop in Oil at Baku—Struggling Bibi-Eybats—Kerns—The Board's Confidence.

Oil shares remain out of favour with the speculator, and of late what business has been passing was confined strictly to one or two big dividend-payers, notably Shell Transports. At the Spies' meeting a lucid statement of the outlook was made by the chairman. The output last year was 14,641,000 poods, and in the current year it may be 16½ million poods. But the company's profits at Grosny will be substantially affected by the drop in the price of oil at Baku. The present quotation is now only 14⅝ copecks, against 23 copecks a year ago. The company is under contract for the first 10,000,000 poods which will be taken at 16 poods, but on the balance production the loss will be heavy, amounting to £70,000 if the price of oil continues as at present. This loss will, however, be mitigated by the profit made over the sale of part of the company's interest in the Maikop Spies Company. Since the meeting the outlook has, moreover, been improved by the news just to hand that a fountain has been struck on one of the company's plots. At the meeting of the Bibi-Eybat the chairman did not take a hopeful view of the outlook, and in referring to the redemption of debentures in November stated that it was evident that unless some unforeseen good fortune occurs the company will again have to approach the debenture-holders with a request to allow a further postponement of interest payments. The chairman pointed out (what I several times reminded my readers of when the public was buying Bibi-Eybats during the late indiscriminate boom) that the company is weighed down by royalties. The total royalties payable to the Russian Government amount to 40 per cent. of the production. Kerns, after a period of flatness, were inclined to pick up on the statutory meeting. The board is very confident, and expects to declare a substantial dividend in the first year and increase it considerably in the next year.

SOUTH ATLANTIC TRADING FIASCO.

Recent inquiries from shareholders have recalled my attention to the South Atlantic Trading Company, Limited, which was formed a couple of years ago to acquire from one Thomas Caradoc Kerry the steamship Pandora and an exclusive licence to exploit the guano deposits in three islands in the vicinity of Tristan da Cunha. The prospectus published in March, 1908, was adorned with the names of two admirals, and "anticipated" a net profit of £300,000 a year (the nominal capital of the company being only £100,000) from the guano; but these glittering lures failed to attract the required minimum subscription of £40,000, and the money received had to be returned to the applicants. Later in the same year a second attempt was made to float the company, and on that occasion the promoters and directors opened their mouths much less widely, the minimum subscription for allotment being sweepingly reduced from £40,000 to £2,000. Even then the issue was a miserable failure, and to supplement the ordinary subscriptions the company sought to obtain capital from young fellows applying for employment on an expedition to the islands—a proceeding upon which some strong comments were made in Truth at the time. In February, 1909, the statutory report showed that 7,103 shares had been allotted for cash, that the amount received was £6,334, and that out of this over £6,000 had been paid "on account of purchase" of the Pandora "and fitting out the ship and expedition expenses." By that time the two admirals had disappeared from the board, and the directors were Messrs. Thomas Rowland Meakin, Samos Road, Anerley; Francis Parkes, solicitor, Carlton House, Regent Street; Wm. H. Vipan, Dudley House, Dorking; and Harry Rowland Meakin, solicitor, 30, Margaret Street, W. No information has been communicated to the shareholders since the statutory report, and inquiries directed to the secretary, J. O. Phillips, have been unanswered. Some months ago a shareholder interviewed Mr. H. R. Meakin, one of the directors, who seems to have taken a very active part in the business of the company. He excused the negligence of the secretary on the ground that he was unpaid, and stated that the Pandora expedition never got to the islands. He added, however, the comforting news that the concession owned by the company was worth about a million pounds, and that it was hoped to sell it in a few weeks to a wealthy firm. In giving evidence in a case in which the company was involved last February Mr. H. R. Meakin also stated that it had assets which put it in an excellent position. Despite Mr. Meakin's optimism, however, I think it will be foolish of the shareholders to expect that they will ever get back a penny of the money which they put into this undertaking. What they ought to do is to insist upon an inquiry into the circumstances connected with the formation of the company and the conduct of its affairs, and I trust that this course will now be taken.

BUCKET-SHOP KEEPERS AT THE OLD BAILEY.

A couple of niches in the Truth Cautionary List (Nos. 330 and 355) will be vacated through the conviction at the Old Bailey last week of Caius Thomas Vincent and Francis Dawson. Vincent masqueraded as McPherson, Brady and Co., also Reid, Anderson and Co. and the Stock Market News Agency, at an office in Basinghall Street, E.C.; Dawson as Bruce Desmond and Co., at Finsbury Circus Buildings. These two men were close associates, if not actual partners, and the frauds for which they have now been sentenced to six months' hard labour were carried out by identical methods. The circulars "guaranteeing" huge profits in return for remittances for deals on the cover system were couched in language so preposterously absurd and unbusinesslike that it is a little difficult to understand how the greenest of greenhorns could suppose that the firms were genuine "stock and share dealers" or anything but common swindlers. It is clear, however, that there are a great number of people for whom no pretences of this kind can be too extravagantly silly, and the evidence at the trial showed that within twelve months Bruce Desmond and Co. obtained £1,462, while the payments to McPherson, Brady and Co. in less than two years amounted to £4,904. Neither Vincent nor Dawson ever actually bought or sold any shares. All the so-called deals were mere bookkeeping entries of bets on quotations made under such conditions that the fools of customers could invariably be told that they had lost their money, the "guarantee" being, of course, quite worthless. Some bucket-shop harpies of this class do occasionally pay out profits either in order to use the recipients as decoy-ducks or else to provide themselves with some sort of material for their defence if they are ever prosecuted. But Vincent and Dawson were too greedy to adopt that dodge. Among all their hundreds of customers only two or three got back a penny of their money.

I congratulate the City Police on having brought these two rascals to justice. It has not been an easy job. Very often I hear complaints that the police do not exhibit more activity in suppressing bucket-shop frauds, but it is one thing to know that frauds are being committed and quite another to procure the definite and conclusive proofs required to satisfy the requirements of the criminal law. One difficulty is the extreme reluctance of the victims to come forward as witnesses; they naturally dislike having to proclaim their own folly and stupidity. In the present instance I know that the police, to whom I was able to give a little assistance, would have prosecuted Dawson and Vincent nearly a year ago if it had not been for this difficulty. Now that they have been satisfactorily disposed of, I trust that attention will be given to the doings of other gentry in the same line. At the same time it is hopeless to expect that bucket-shop swindles will ever cease to be perpetrated so long as dupes can be found so readily.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

Scientific Investment Illustrated.

More Scientific Geographical Distribution of Capital! A correspondent writes me to know what he ought to do regarding his holding of 5 per cent. first mortgage debenture stock in the Sunderland District Electric Tramways, Limited, a concern which has just gone into receivership. "You may be interested to know," he says, "that the Investment Registry advised and bought these debentures for me in January, 1909, at 83½, knowing I was a very small capitalist and to whom capital safety was the first consideration." My correspondent is by no means the only person who has to thank the Investment Registry for this latest triumph of its science. Last year the wonderful wizards of Waterloo Place were very busy urging the public to buy these Sunderland Tram debentures, frequently at the expense of parting with other stocks that they happened to be holding. The Investment Registry put the public in at 83½ and 84, and within a little over a twelvemonth the tramway company is in the hands of a receiver. The last quotation I saw for the debentures was 58⅜, but recently the quotation has been removed altogether from the official list. Moreover (and this at least ought to interest that world renowned library and those world renowned financial experts at 2, Waterloo Place), the company "had been carrying on business for the last eight years and always at a loss." I am quoting from a report of the speech of Mr. Micklem, K.C., who appeared for the plaintiff in the successful application made a month ago before Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady for the appointment of a receiver. Reader, just put side by side with that phrase in italics the following sample of letters which the Investment Registry addresses to the public. "As a result of this discovery [the principle of Geographical Distribution of Capital] our company has extended its sphere of action, and so organised its efforts that the stocks of the whole world are classified and reduced to a basis where it is possible to test and arrive at only those securities which are representative of each particular section, and are the safest, cheapest, and most remunerative of their kind." It only remains to say that the Investment Registry has lately circularised the people whom it put into these Sunderland Tram debentures with a view to "protecting their interests." For screaming farce I prefer No. 2, Waterloo Place, to the Apollo.

A Study in Simplicity.

No doubt I am very simple, but it is possible to strain even my simplicity too severely. Included among a hundred odd letters which reached me one morning last week were two containing flattering suggestions that Truth should devote attention to lumber investments. One purported to come from an admirer of mine at Smethwick, the other from Bristol. By an unfortunate oversight, however, both letters had been unmistakably produced by the same typewriter on precisely similar sheets of paper, and each was enclosed in an envelope of the same pattern and posted at the same time at the same post office at Bristol. Some one seems to be making an appropriately wooden-headed attempt to stimulate interest in lumber shares.

Anglo Malay Investment Trust.

Even in the midst of the recent company-mongering orgy the public occasionally displayed a little discrimination. A case in point is supplied by the statutory report of the Anglo-Malay Investment Trust, Limited. Towards the end of March this concern invited subscriptions for 200,000 ordinary shares of £1 each and 100,000 shilling deferred shares. The public were feeding voraciously at that time, but only 14,618 of these ordinary shares and 4,368 deferred were swallowed. Notwithstanding the comparatively paltry amount of the applications—under 7½ per cent. of the capital offered—the directors proceeded to allotment, with the result that down to June 17 the company had received £7,063 3s. 6d. from the shareholders, and paid no less than £5,094 7s. 6d. to the promoters for preliminary expenses! One of the directors is Sir William B. Hudson, K.C.I.E., whose name has lately figured on a good many prospectuses, and the others are Messrs. Edward Howard Hale, J. Barr Robertson, and Robert Summerside Simpson. The present position of this precious Investment Trust as disclosed by the report is certainly a strong confirmation of the good judgment of those investors who resolved to leave it alone.

Oil and Ozokerite.

A still more remarkable instance of persistence with a big enterprise on a small subscription is furnished by the Oil and Ozokerite Co., Limited, whose statutory report has been handed to me by an anxious shareholder. This company, which was formed to acquire certain properties in Galicia, came out in February with an offer of 950,000 preference shares of £1 each and £800,000 6 per cent. debenture bonds. Having thus asked for £1,750,000, the directors actually received applications to the amount of £29,212, of which £2,205 was for debentures. By the date of the report £10,127 had been paid for preliminary expenses, commissions, etc.; but at the statutory meeting the chairman, Mr. William Evans (who acted as agent of the vendor, and who joined the board after the appearance of the prospectus), sought to justify the decision to proceed to allotment on the ground that £500,000 of capital had been assured by an agreement with two firms in Paris. He counselled the English shareholders to exercise patience. Of course, they will have to do this, but they are naturally rather uneasy in view of the facts disclosed by the statutory report.

Mid-Oxfordshire Gas Light and Coke Co.

I am glad to see that the audacious effort to secure a quiet interment of this company by means of a voluntary winding-up has been frustrated. A compulsory winding-up order has now been granted, and there will consequently be a much-needed public investigation of the methods by which inexperienced investors were induced to subscribe for the shares and debentures of this rotten undertaking. It is one of a class against which my readers have frequently been cautioned.

Options on Oil.

There is a touch of the sublime in the faith of the Equitable Exchange in the credulity of its dupes. For the purpose of its latest flat-catching device this bucket-shop has discovered "the great boom in oil shares"—a boom not very apparent at the moment to ordinary observers of the market. In the place of the more familiar bucket-shop "deals" in shares the Exchange exhorts all and sundry to buy call options on fine petroleum—"£2 10s. controls 2 drums fine petroleum for 30 days." The present price is put at £3 15s. per drum, but "we are of opinion" that it will shortly be doubled (!), and in that event a handsome profit will be secured. Well, if there is anybody at large to whom this appeals as a gamble, I have no desire to deter him from staking his money—indeed, I am sure that it would be useless to attempt to reason with him.

NEW ISSUES.

Applications are invited for £770,000 5 per cent. first mortgage fifty year gold bonds of the Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway at the price of £90 per £100 bond. Principal and interest are unconditionally guaranteed by the Lake Superior Corporation. The bonds, which will be redeemable at 105 per cent., will be a specific first charge upon the railway, terminals, and docks of the company, and a general floating charge upon the rest of the company's assets and undertakings. The issue represents part of a bonded debt of $30,000 per mile in respect of 225 miles of railway now under construction to connect with the main line of the Canadian Pacific.

Particulars are published for public information only (no shares being offered for subscription) of the Hay Gold Mining Company, Limited. The company has been formed with a capital of £155,000 to acquire 126 claims in the Mazoe district, Southern Rhodesia.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of TRUTH.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

RAILWAYS.

JOB.—Not a thing I care to recommend.

LOWKO.—It is passing through a lean time just now, but the line is a valuable one, and well-managed, and with better trade conditions should soon recover the lost ground. I would not part with the shares at their present price.

MINES.

ASHITE.—A purchase of the shares named would be an absolute speculation, and, in my opinion, you could make a more promising selection. ABACUS.—Interest in them has died down again. I would not buy more.

BOLDIE.—1. Exchange into something more promising. 2. Hold. 3. See Rule 2. BREEMIE.—1. Hold. 2. The company you mention was taken over by another concern, and the latter has been dissolved.

COLUMBUS.—I think the shares named will have some recovery later on, but suggest that you should spread your risk by putting the additional money into another selection. The smaller of the two estimates refers solely to the outcrop portion of the company's property.

DRAMATIC.—Interest in them has died down, but may revive again later on. Holding must be regarded as an absolute speculation.

EIGHTDURLEY.—Of the shares named I prefer Abbontiakoons.

FEAT.—Since writing you have doubtless seen the official announcement that more money must be raised or work suspended. I do not care to recommend a further purchase just now. FRANCO.—I am not attracted by them.

HAWKS.—1. Sell on a moderate recovery. 2. I do not care much for these. 3. Hold. HAWFINCH.—Keep them for the present. HILL.—1. See Rule 2. Better sell 2 and 3 in the event of a moderate recovery. HAMMER.—I see no reason at present to expect much improvement in any of the shares mentioned.

JIM.—You may get a somewhat better price by watching your opportunity.

MOUNTAIN.—Take advantage of a moderate recovery to realise.

NOSTAW.—All very speculative, but may have some recovery in sympathy with better-class shares when business in South Africans revives.

PROGRESS.—1 and 2. I see no reason to expect much advance. 3. Hopeful as a lock-up. PRETORIA.—1. I see no reason to advise a purchase. 2 and 3. Cannot trace these.

SANDS.—Snatch a small profit in each case should the opportunity occur. SLIENIA.—1. Take advantage of a moderate recovery to realise. 2. You had better be content with less than you suggest.

VULCAN.—I think there is a fair chance of your being able to realise to better advantage later on, but would put the additional money into something else. VENEZIA.—A rather speculative lot, but I should be inclined to hold in hope of some improvement when markets revive.

MIXED SECURITIES.

ALGOMA.—1 and 2 I see no reason to anticipate much recovery. 3. It is a poor holding, and whether the shares will ever have more than a waste-paper value I cannot say. ABBEY.—The prospectus of the oil company read well. Better hold and await developments. Take your profit on the bonds. ABERDEEN.—1. They appear fully valued. 2. I know of no reason for advising a purchase. 3. Results in the last year or two have not been brilliant, but the bank is one of high standing, and its profits should improve under better trade conditions.

BLOB.—1. Sell. 2. Appear fully valued on present prospects. 3. Not at present.

CUM. I would not buy the shares of either concern. COMA. 1. The market will probably provide opportunities for quick turns for speculators prepared to face big risks, and to keep a very close watch upon it. Prices are jumping about so erratically now that I must confine myself to a general observation. 2. You do not properly indicate which concern you refer to.

DIAMOND.—You might make better investment selections. See recommendations of last week. DON CARLOS.—1 and 2. I think you will get somewhat better prices by waiting. 3. No; the stock is a very fair investment amongst high yielding stocks. DOCKS.—1. At present only a gamble. 2. In view of the uncertainty as to whether the money required will be forthcoming, holding the shares can only be regarded as an absolute speculation.

EVOH.—1. The company has had a good record, and the shares strike one as a fair industrial holding. 2. The market is unlikely to be settled for some time time yet, but after the recent severe drop the shares look a reasonably hopeful purchase for ultimate improvement.

FRAGILE.—1. Prospects very speculative. I should be inclined to sell on a moderate recovery. 2. Sorry, but it is not a concern with which I am familiar. 3. Hopeful speculative lock-up. Dividends should not be far off now.

GOLFIE.—1. Please note Rule 2. Hold 2 and 3. GUTHRIE.—1 and 2. Hold both for better markets. 3 and 4. Sound industrials, but I can predict no early rise in either.

NEW RECRUIT.—1 and 2. Sell. 3. The concern has yet to show what it can do, but if you thought the shares good enough to go in for it seems early days to talk about selling.

PORTENI.—I have not a high opinion of any of the mining shares named. Rubber inquiries should be made in a separate letter. PANSY.—No. 2-6. Of these I prefer Nos. 2 and 5 as speculative lock-ups.

QUEER.—1. Sent. 2. I do not look for an immediate recovery, but there is a speculative prospect of some improvement later on. 3. United Rhodesias are talked higher, but a purchase would be an absolute speculation.

RIP.—1. Not particularly attractive at present. 2. I have not much information as to this concern, and do not care to recommend a purchase of the shares. 3. Thanks. Rumour is a lying jade, and I do not worry myself about such untruths.

SISYPHUS.—1. You may get a somewhat better price by waiting. 2. No. 3. Take no notice of it.

TAFFY.—1 and 2. The companies have not reached the dividend-paying stage, but the shares appear hopeful speculations from the lock-up point of view. 3. See article on 5 per cent. investments in last week's issue. TEZA.—1 and 2. Worth holding. 3. At the present price they look a fair speculative purchase.

OIL.

A. B.—Better realise.

CADER.—I dealt with the scheme two or three weeks ago. As the alternative is to forfeit all interest in the concern, I should be inclined to join the reconstruction.

G. W. B.—See reply to "Cader."

DAECHICK.—The shares look high enough for the present, but the company has wide possibilities in connection with its own developments, and those of its Persian subsidiary, so that ultimately the shares may see a higher level.

J. M., Dublin.—I do not recommend either.

KIRETON.—No shares of the kind are safe. But as a speculation you might retain your interest in the concern.

LINCOLN GREEN.—Results must be awaited. The company starts with the advantage of practical management, and its properties have doubtless been carefully selected.

MAITLAND.—These shares might as well be realised. MINTING.—The company is under excellent auspices, and the shares should be held if you are prepared to wait a year or two. MIME.—I do not care for the company and would sell the shares.

NEWBATTLE.—1. You bought dear, and I can promise no early improvement on your price. Much depends upon the result of the developments now taking place at depth. 2. Worth holding.

ROBERTA.—Nos. 1 and 2 are worth holding, but better sell No. 3. I do not advise you to add to your risks at present.

SLOW.—Nothing since the prospectus, which read favourably. As a speculation the shares might be held. SIDMOUTH.—Better hold.

TREATY.—You bought dear. Sell 1 on a moderate recovery. The others might be held for developments, but it is too early to obtain any final view of their value. TUNGO.—1. Looks a fair speculation, not an investment in the strict sense. 2. If you can take such a handsome profit better do so.

U. O. U. (Birkdale).—Low price of oil at Baku explains the low price. Development work is understood to have been satisfactory. The shares should improve when conditions for the local oil trade take a turn.

VENTURE.—A concern already adversely criticised in TRUTH. Leave the shares alone. VENTURES (W. H. M.).—I have a poor opinion of all three.

RUBBER.

ASKING.—1. Enjoys a guaranteed dividend until the estate comes into bearing. Should be kept. 2. An unsatisfactory concern. 3. No dividend before 1914. Sell 2 and 3 if you ever get a favourable opportunity. AMSTERDAM.—Hold both for recovery. AUSTRIAN.—Worth holding for guaranteed dividend. Will ultimately stand much higher. ABERFOYLE.—All the shares in your list should be kept for recovery; you will probably see a good profit on all of them during the next twelve months. ALE.—Do not sell any of them, at all events this year. AJAX.—I should not dissuade you from buying, but I prefer Kinta Kellas. ALPHA.—You may safely buy a at present price, but I do not recommend b and c. The last is rather highly capitalised. ALTITUDE.—1. I should wait for a slight advance on the present price before selling. 2. Keep for investment. 3. Hold these for recovery, but sell should the quotation approach the price you gave. ABBEY.—Yes, hold for recovery. A1.—Should move rapidly in the near future. Average now. ARGYLL.—Do not buy them. AFTON.—1. Hold for a profit. 2. This is a good rubber investment share, which may safely be held for a good profit, or permanently. 3. Be content with a smaller profit than that you suggest. A. R. M.—I. Said to be going better; see reply to "Lutterworth." 2. Think you could do better. 3. Yes, average. ARONA.—You would be running extreme risks, and I cannot incur the responsibility of advising dealings with money so borrowed. A. B. C.—1 You must ask the secretaries for exact dates. 2. Stand aside from the committee and wait for their report. ACCOUNTS.—The Gula Kalumpong is one of the best recent issues, and I hear that the price in Hong Kong is over £3. As an investment the shares, at present price, seem a good purchase. ACTON.—You may buy 1 and 2 at present prices, and hold for a substantial profit. 3 is more doubtful; be content with a small profit. ABSCA.—1-3. You may safely average now. 4. All ordinary shares are speculative until success has been proved by the payment of a good dividend. AMPLITUDE.—I think that they will go higher. A MURMUR FROM BURMA.—You want to make a temporary investment of £50 in "something safe, a paying and reliable concern," with the idea of selling out at a clear profit of £40 or £50—only that and nothing more! I am afraid I do not know of anything which will meet your modest requirements. I wish I did for my own sake. Seriously, if what you tell me as to your circumstances as a pensioner is correct, you ought to keep the £50 in the P.O. Savings Bank, and make provision for your wife and child by insuring. ASMODEUS (Cardiff).—1. Certainly not shares which I should recommend. 2-3. Notwithstanding this, my opinion is still unfavourable.

BRIDLINGTON.—1. Hold for recovery. 2-3. You should see a good profit on these before the end of the year. BRAINTREE.—1-2. Not recommended by me; cannot suggest selling limits, but advise you to get rid of them during the autumn. They may advance a little in any pronounced market activity. 3. This is in a better class, and the price may rise to double the present value. BROOMSTICK.—Hold 1 for a good profit, and sell 2 on a recovery. 3 is an unsatisfactory concern, the shares of which should be sold at the first opportunity. BOX.—Sell both and buy shares recommended in my Notes. BARNILLY.—1, 2, 4, and 5. You can get a quotation for the companies in question by writing to one of the Eastern banks. Try the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, 32, Bishopsgate Street Within, E.C. Dealing being so exceedingly difficult, I could not give a general recommendation to purchase the shares even of the best of them. 3. Your price expected to be reached shortly. Hold for several shillings profit. 6. Will become one of the best. You should see at least 50 per cent. profit in the next twelve months. BEXHILL.—1. 200. 2. See page 1571, in the issue of June 15.

CDMAC.—1. Hold for recovery and further appreciation, and read the chairman's speech on Monday last. 2. Yes. CRAIGLEE.—Take your profit during the autumn. CELESTIAL.—1-3. Average at any price below 3. See report of chairman's speech at meeting. COOT.—You may safely buy all three at present prices. CROQUET.—Retain all three for recovery, averaging 2 and 3 should they fall below present prices. CHERRY.—As you must sell something I advise you to part with your shares in the following order: first, No. 3; second, No. 2; third, No. 1; and the remainder in the order in which the lowest loss would be incurred. CANTAB.—All good to hold for recovery and ultimately for dividends. CAMDEN.—Expected to go much better in the near future. Do not sell. CHOB.—Do not buy at any price. CROFT.—You have a splendid list, all of which, with the exception of 7, are exceedingly good rubber investments. As you require to raise money, sell in the following order: 7, 1, 2, 4, 9, 10, 12, 8, 3, 5, 11, and 6. In selecting this arrangement I have studied merits and purchase price, which, in such a uniformly excellent list, cannot be ignored as you suggest. CRAIGPARK.—1. Yes. 2. A good list. Those shares which do not show a profit may safely be averaged now. CARABINIER.—1. My selling limit is £1 premium. 2. Yes, all good to buy now for a profit before the end of the year. 3. See my Notes last week and this. COCKEREL.—1. Yes. 2-3. No. CHRYSO.—Hold for recovery. CONCILIO.—1. Hold for higher prices than you gave. 2. Quite likely. 3. I regret that I cannot give you much comfort regarding these shares, but possibly you may have a better chance of getting rid of them in the autumn. CROCUS.—All are good to hold for higher prices, but I do not expect 2 or 5 to rise much. CLONMEL.—Hold until the autumn, when the price should go better. CRAVEN.—I advise you to wait for a slight recovery, then sell and reinvest in some of the shares recommended from time to time in my Notes. COMPASS.—Read the report of the meeting and see Notes this and next week. COSSACK.—See reply to "Compass." CECILIA.—I am still of opinion that no official dealings should have taken place in the shares at 1 premium, and should be very interested to learn the date of the contract and the name of the broker by whom the shares were bought. CYMRO.—Thanks for your most interesting letter. I have an unfavourable opinion of the outlook for this company, and advise you to sell when you can.

DODI.—I do not regard any of these as "sound." Do not buy them if you have not already done so. DALKEY.—Hold all your shares for recovery and write to the secretaries regarding dividends. DOUGLAS.—Not one of my recommendations. I do not advise you to cut your loss yet, but I would not buy more. DAISY.—1. Hold for investment. 2. I would not buy these; they will become quite unmarketable. 3. Yes. DABEHICK.—1-2. Yes. Sell during the autumn. DARESBURY.—Hold 1 for, say, 35s. to 37s. and 3 for £8 or £9. Do not sell 2 for less than £20. DOUBTFUL.—You may buy 2, but I am not keen with regard to 1. DISPONENDO.—You have a good list of shares which should turn out well in the autumn. There is no object in exchanging Malacca Ordinary into Preference unless you can do so at a profit. The Preference will get 1s. 6d. per annum more dividend. DOLT.—Kuala Lumpur paid a dividend of 4s. for 1909, and has this year paid an interim dividend of 6s. per share. At least 6s. more should be paid, but some sanguine market men expect 9s. See Notes and table this week.

ELDER.—1 and 2. Hold both for recovery, but do not increase your holdings just now. 3. Should not dissuade you from purchasing these. EXON.—I do not think well of either, nor can I advise you to average. ESSEX.—1. It is just possible that the price may improve slightly with harder markets, but I should be inclined to cut a loss. Watch my Rubber Notes for reinvestment. 2. Hold your Merlimaus for a good profit, but sell the others on a recovery.

FAIRFAX.—1-2. Good to hold for recovery and investment. 3 and 4. I would not hold these. 5 and 6. See Rule 2. You should have written these inquiries on a separate sheet. FRASER.—This estate is badly situated in Ceylon and I do not consider the outlook promising. Sell on a market recovery. FOX-HUNTER.—You cannot do better than retain the shares you hold. They will ultimately give you a handsome return; the lower-priced ones might not. FALAISE.—1. I should select (b), (e), and (g). 2. Retain these for recovery and further improvement. FIDES.—You have a good list, and as you are not in a hurry will doubtless attain your object. FRANCISCUS.—1 and 2. Two very good properties going better. Advise waiting. 3. A Borneo concern. Take your profit and exchange into something more assured. 4. This estate is in a very good district, and should do very well. 5. The Malacca output will increase substantially from now onwards, and the market expect a considerable rise in share values. Malacca, Linggi, Batu Caves, Federated Selangor, and United Serdangs are all in the front rank, and will do well during the next year. 6. Merlimau, Kinta Kellas, and Sungei Bahrus are a good selection among the younger companies. 7. A revival appears likely during August, and prices now seem tempting. FAR.—1. Certainly hold for dividends and much higher values in the future. 2. Hold as a good permanent investment. 3. Retain until next year, when the company will be producing; then write again. FRISK.—1. Yes, average now. 2 and 3. I have a good opinion of both of these. Hold for recovery and a profit.

GOLFIC.—1-3. Weak speculators had to sell at the special settlement. Market now healthier. Buy more on any fall. Write to the secretary regarding dividend. GUTHRIE.—Expected to go to £2 within the next year. GARRON.—Yours is a fair list, but I should sell 1, 2, and 5 at the first favourable opportunity, and buy more marketable shares. GREBE.—I do not look upon this as a promising share. GOYA.—The dividend was disappointing, and many sold their shares. I advise you to hold yours for recovery. GLEDHOW.—1-2. Yes. 3. No. 4. Repeat your inquiry, giving the full name of the company. Do you mean "Java Rubber Plantations" or "Java United Plantations"? 5. Yes, but you must write to the secretary for an estimate of production for this year. GERTRUDE.—1 and 2. Write to your broker, and ask whether "a" or "b" shares were bought. The "b" are fully paid. 3. You should either pay for the shares on account day or instruct your banker to pay on delivery, advising your broker accordingly. GERTRUDE (Dollymount).—1. You ought to see a fair profit on these by the end of the year. 2. You may safely buy at present price, and hold for a profit. GRESHAM.—You will no doubt see a profit on the shares which you have taken up, but I cannot advise you with regard to your carry-over speculation. GREENBACK.—Hold all for recovery, averaging 3. GAP.—3 is a good share, but I would not buy 1 or 2. You do not say whether you have already bought them. GREEN GINGER.—1. Yes. 2. I have no information at present about this. GHURKA.—My views are that it would be most unwise.

H. C. W.—I regret that I cannot trace the company by the description you give. If you can obtain the correct name of the concern I shall be happy to help you if possible. HARSTON.—From the commencement of this company's history I have regarded it as an unsatisfactory concern, and have consistently advised sales. As, however, the price is so very low, it is possible that there may be a slight recovery when market conditions generally improve. HAMMER.—1. A fair estate, but very little market for the shares. 2. Only the first named. 3. Not one. 4. A good rubber investment. 5. See Notes last week. 6. Probably, but at the time of writing the price is higher. HOLMWOOD.—I have a poor opinion of 1 and 2, but think you may do better by waiting a few weeks before selling. 3. May be kept for investment. HARRINGTON.—You had better retain the shares you hold. HOPE.—1. Certainly take all the Cluny shares that you can secure as this estate will be under the same excellent management as the Lanadron. 2. See fifth reply to "Franciscus" and write the secretary about dividends. 3. The 25 per cent. dividend just declared has put these shares better. You may safely hold for £12. HIGHLAND LADDIE.—1 and 2. These are doing very well. Your limits will probably be reached before Christmas. 3. It is impossible to mention every share in my Notes every week, and I am waiting for the meeting of this company and particulars of its rubber shipments before making further comments. You need not be impatient as it is in strong hands. 4 and 6. May be held although not a free market. 5. A promoter's gambling counter which should be sold on a revival.

IVY.—1. Has paid a small dividend for many years. The market opinion is favourable. 2 and 3. Both good concerns. Hold for recovery and further appreciation. IVOR.—I have a poor opinion of this concern, and advise you to exchange into another share when you can.

J. T.—1-4. Hold all these for recovery. 5. I fear that I do not quite understand your inquiry. All calls up to the special settlement are paid by the allottee, and refunded by the buyer at the settlement. 6. Retain for recovery. J. E. (Liverpool).—1. An unsatisfactory company. Have nothing to do with it. 2. Both are good to buy now, but as they represent two totally different classes of companies they cannot be compared. J. S. C.—Hold all for recovery to the prices paid. I do not, however, expect that you will see a profit on 1 and 2 this year. J. M. B.—The date of the settlement has not yet been fixed, and at present the market is a limited one. As to the circular, avoid dealings with the sender and all such outsiders. J. A. W.—The contingency you mention could not arise. Having sold for special settlement you would be bound by your contract until released by an official declaration by the Stock Exchange that all bargains were cancelled.

LEDA.—Keep all three for higher prices, but sell 2 when you can see your money back. LEX.—I have never favoured this concern, and I think you would do well to exchange into another share when you can do so without much loss. LEMBERG.—I do not care to fix a selling limit in this share. I should sell on any rise. LEX (Wigan).—You may average with a view to getting out at an early date. L. D. B.—1. Do not buy. 2. Retain. Although there is not much market for this share, it should prove to be a sound rubber investment. LUTTERWORTH.—1. It is rather dangerous to put all your money into Ceara yielding estates. The best of the German group are Kamna and Muhesa. I should not touch any of the others now. Hold Kifuru for a premium. 2. Take a premium, but do not sell immediately the allotments are issued; wait until the date of the special settlement approaches. LEE.—Have you seen my recent Notes about Linggis? The market talks them to double their present quotation; you will not do wrong to buy now. See Notes with regard to cheaper shares. 2. This company is under good management, and the labour question need not cause any anxiety. 3. This is not a company favoured by me, but do not sell now. You should choose an active time to exchange.

MIMI.—1. Do not be nervous. You hold one of the best shares upon which you should ultimately obtain a good profit. 2. Hold these for recovery. M. A. F.—Yes. Worth applying for. MONARA.—Worth holding for the guaranteed dividend. MICK.—1. I do not recommend this. 2. Should eventually do very well. MIME.—The outlook for each of these shares is good. M. S. Y.—Do not exchange, at all events, until the close of the year. M. M.—1. Retain for recovery. 2. Both good to hold for dividends. 3. These should be kept for investment. MON.—I have an unfavourable opinion of both. Sell when you can. MONKEY.—I. This should eventually show you a good profit. 2. See Rule 2. MOSCOW.—1. Hold for recovery and a small profit. 2. This exchange should prove a profitable one. 3. Yes. MAY.—A bucket-shop circular which should be disregarded. 2. Yes. MUNSHI.—1. Yes. 2. Write to the secretary. 3. Should go much better before the end of the year. MAX.—1. Do not exchange from Brieh, as the company is now producing. 2. As you have a good profit you might sell half of your Mabiras and buy Madagascar Preference as you suggest. Hold your other shares and see reply to "Compass." Please correctly number your queries in future. MAVINKERE.—There are a great number of machines in existence and you need not be anxious that a new one has appeared. See reply to "Compass," and retain your shares. MIRANDA.—1. You will do much better by waiting, for a revival is certain to occur in the autumn, and these shares are very strongly held. 2. As this is a trust company, it is quite arbitrary to fix a selling limit before the first balance-sheet has appeared. 3 and 4. Concerns that I have never favoured. Sell at any profit. 5. See third reply to "Highland Laddie." 6. Malaccas, Madagascars, and Merlimaus. MAJESTIC.—See reply to "Compass." MUGGINS.—A meeting will be held shortly. The drought is ended and production is coming along rapidly. The board is satisfied with progress, and confident of success. MERCI BIEN.—These shares have fallen to nominal quotation of par; not officially quoted, but Financial Times list includes it. There is a rumour of dissension among directors, and doubtless the next meeting will be a stormy one. Try and clear out if you can.

NAUTICUS.—1. Yes. 2. As the contract note is dated before the dividend was declared you are entitled to the payment. 3. No. 4. Perhaps within a year. 5. There is no advantage, and it is never done intentionally—at all events by members of the London Stock Exchange. NOVELIST.—I think it would be more satisfactory for you to address these questions to the secretaries of the respective companies. NETEE.—The tips of your well-meaning friends are not likely to result in your making a fortune. Hold 2 for the guaranteed dividend. Do not cut a loss on 1 and 3 until the price improves somewhat. NOMADIC.—1. Yes, fully paid. 2. Yes. 3. Possibly within the next twelve months. NETTYWINKS.—This is a very extravagant promotion, the vendors asking for £62,000 in cash, besides heavy promotion expenses. I advise you not to apply, as I feel sure that the market will have nothing to do with it. NILBUR.—Thanks for enclosures. I shall give a special notice in a future issue. Wait for better markets. NOLE (?).—I hope that I have deciphered your pseudonym correctly. Your shares are worth holding for 30s. NONENTITY.—See reply to "M. A. F." NITH.—1. You do not appear to understand that they enjoy a guaranteed dividend of 5 per cent. during the next four years. 2. See third reply to "Hope." 3. The very small capital militates against marketability. I have no special information regarding the prospects of the company, which is almost unknown on the Stock Exchange, and cannot advise. NEIRB.—Do not get nervous. You have three good shares which should eventually show you a good profit. Read Notes this and next week. Thanks for the information contained in the last paragraph of your letter.

ONYX.—1. I do not recommend this. 2. See shares mentioned in Rubber Notes last week. OCEAN.—1. Sell half now and the remainder in the autumn. 2. This estate is developing well, but do not put too many eggs in one basket. The price will doubtless stand much higher next year. 3. Buy the shares mentioned in Rubber Notes last week and this. OLLENIC.—Retain for recovery and further appreciation. The financial year ends in August and the report is presented in December. OPTIMIST.—See fifth reply to "Franciscus" and write to secretary, re dividend.

PATERFAMILIAS.—1. This is one of the best trust companies. Hold your shares for investment. 2. Apply for the shares. PARIS.—If you particularly desire to buy this share I should not dissuade you, as I believe that the estate is a good one. There is, however, little market for the shares, and although 5 per cent. is guaranteed during the next three years, the price is not likely to show much improvement during that period. The shares are 1s. paid. PANSY.—1. The shares are of £1 each. Not advised. 2, 3, and 4. All good to buy at present prices. PROGRESS.—All in the front rank. I do not care to fix a limit to be reached before the date you mention, but they should all be quoted then at a higher price than the present. PIANO.—1 and 3. I still have a good opinion of these. Hold for higher prices. 2. Does not appeal to me. Take a small profit when available. PAN.—1. See Notes. 2. I have an unfavourable opinion of both. PHONO.—1. Buy the F.M.S. You will find them quoted in the Investors' Chronicle each week. 2. Yes. Try a limit of 385. PETER PAN.—1. Worth keeping for the guaranteed dividend. They should eventually stand much higher. 2. Expected to recover to your price in the near future. PATIENCE.—1-3. No. For purchase required see Notes last week and this. PANTIYA.—1. Should recover after the very heavy fall, but you will have to wait a long time for dividends. 2. No market for this, but if one is made take the opportunity of selling. 3. Hold for guaranteed dividend and appreciation. PUZZLED.—1 and 2. Retain; do not recommend the exchange suggested. 3. Quoted in the Financier.

QUADRANT.—The Crude meeting was held on Monday. The other will not take place until the end of the year. QUILL PEN.—You have a good list of rubbers. Do not sell any of them, as they should all recover, and some of them show a handsome profit during the next year.

ROSE.—1. Should go better during the next few months, but I do not advise it as a permanent investment. 2 and 3. These may also recover somewhat before the close of the year; if they do they should be sold. REGENT.—1. Hold for recovery, which is due shortly. 2. Yes. 3. A very cheap share. RALI.—I regret that I am unable to endorse your good opinion of these three companies. I would not hold the shares of any of them. REEFER.—Hold both for recovery. REVENGE.—Should prove a good investment. Buy more on a further decline. RAFFALE.—Keep the debentures until the end of the year, then write again. RATHKEALE.—Certainly. RUBBER.—Hold your shares for a decided revival. See reply to "Compass." RATTLESNAKE.—The F.M.S. year ends on May 31, and my figures were for the eleven months of the fiscal year. The total output for the year was 287,350 lbs. The balance-sheet is due in October. RHUBARB.—Do not be nervous. All your shares are doing well. The Madagascar Company is shipping another 1½ tons of rubber this month, and the Vine is issuing its first subsidiary this week. Your broker's figures of the cost of production only apply to wild companies not using machines.

SHWEGA.—1. Write to the secretary. 2. Retain for recovery. 3. The financial year ends December 31. A dividend will probably be earned this year. SLAINTE.—London Asiatics at present prices, but all three should improve considerably during the autumn. SHERINGHAM.—1. You had better keep these in the hope of seeing a rise of, say, 2s. 2. May go to 7s. 6d. in the near future. 3. An excellent rubber investment. SENATOR.—1. I do not anticipate any recovery in the price of this share on the merits of the company, but possibly with harder markets generally the quotation may advance. Sell then, and buy the shares mentioned from time to time in my Notes. 2. Yes. SANDOWN.—It is for you to say whether you care to face the loss shown at present or to hold on in the hope of an improvement. I cannot see any prospect of an advance in this share. SHEIKH.—All should be held until the end of the year, when conditions may be different. The only doubtful share in your list is 7, and you are not likely to make a great loss on that. It is very refreshing to have your honest confession of the motive which actuated you when buying. SEARCHER.—1. You have made a good selection. Limits have been given in previous issues. 2. Probably the preference shares will move more rapidly. SHERRYWOMAN.—1. You will see by last week's article that a revival is expected. 2. You have a first-rate list of shares, upon most of which substantial dividends will be paid during next year. See fifth reply to "Franciscus" and watch my Notes each week. Of your list I prefer Selangors, as they have already declared a dividend of 1s. 6d. per share in respect of the new year, and the market is looking for a total dividend of at least 15s. See table. SPUG.—See reply to "Compass." SAFFRON.—Your list is a very satisfactory one. Hold all the shares until the end of the year. Selling limits will be given in future issues. As to 7 see Rule 2. SLIEMA.—All good to hold for a good profit. STACEY.—As Anglo-Malays were quoted ex-dividend on April 29 and you sold on April 21 you are not entitled to the dividend. As, however, the buyer was not registered in time to receive the dividend from the company, it was quite correct for the broker to deduct the amount when paying you. SION.—1. Jerams were quoted ex-rights to new shares on the 10th ult. 2. The special settlement took place in 1909. 3. Yes. These shares will prove a sound rubber investment.

TENNIS.—1-3. A very promising company, the shares of which are likely to prove a remunerative investment. Hold for recovery. TAVY.—1. These are talked much better, but I have never been able to see anything very attractive in the outlook. 2. I cannot advise you regarding "other good producers" without knowing their names. Some good producers should be retained for permanent investment, but it is possible that you may hold shares which should be sold while the price of rubber remains above normal. Repeat your inquiry, mentioning the names of all the companies whose shares you hold. THIBET.—Of your list, 2 and 3 may be regarded as promising rubber investments. 1, 5, and 6 should be exchanged for others at the first favourable opportunity, and 4 is the most unsatisfactory share of all. TOP KNOT.—Your best plan is to retain both for recovery and further appreciation. TURUSH.—Take the underwriting. TYLTYL.—As London Asiatics were quoted ex dividend on May 27 you are entitled to the 2d. per 2s. share, which is, of course, equivalent to 2s. 6d. on each share before the splitting. Claim the dividend of your stockbroker. TOBY.—1. Take up the shares and hold for a good profit. 2. Hold these for improvement, but sell the last-named at the first opportunity. TORTOISE.—1. These are good to hold for recovery, and ultimately will become a profitable investment. 2. I should not repurchase. 3. I should certainly keep these until the autumn. TURBIE.—1. See fifth reply to "Franciscus." 2. See reply to "Compass." TRAVAIL.—1-2. I do not think well of this company, and should advise you to sell when you can. TORQUAY.—Ceylon Cocoa have more than doubled in price since I advised them, but do not sell until the rubber market becomes more active. I cannot give a favourable answer with regard to your second company. The shares are saleable at a small premium, and I advise you to take it.

U. P.—A promising concern, in which you should make a good profit. 2. Take a small profit on this when you can. UNCERTAIN.—If you cannot pay the call, write to the secretary asking for an extension of time. All these companies are doing well, and I advise you to wait for a revival.

VENTURE.—Early rise expected. You had better average. VINES.—1. Hold for recovery and further improvement. 2. Prefer Kinta Kellas. 3. Not permanently. 4, 5, and 6. I should not hold these. VIATOR.—1-5. All these are good rubber investments which may be bought now, but they do not all enjoy a free market in London. 6. You must write to the secretary for this information.

WILD RUBBER.—1. Sell on a market recovery. 2. 12s. 6d. 3. See reply to "Compass," also Notes next week. WINDJAMER.—Hold all for recovery. WINKLE.—You may safely buy 1, 2, and 3 at present prices, but I do not recommend the others. WONDER.—1. 20 per cent to 25 per cent. is expected the first year. 2. Sell at about 14s., which should be obtainable soon. 3. The interview with Mr. Lampard in the Financial Times of Saturday last answers your query about rubber substitutes. WILTS.—See fifth reply to "Franciscus." Asiatics and United Serdangs should go better. You may safely disregard the opinion of the scribe you mention, as he evidently has no knowledge of the rubber industry.

X-RAY.—I should not cut my loss now, as there is a good prospect of some improvement in both before long. I would not, however, think of holding either for permanent investment. XUBBER.—I should hold all these for recovery. XENOPHON.—1. Recovery expected in August, when the machines should be on the property. 2. Yes.

YELPER.—See third reply to "Gertrude." As your broker has money to your credit for payment of shares not yet delivered, he cannot reasonably object to your withholding the cheque for the second lot pending delivery, if you choose to adopt this course. I doubt very much, however, whether it is good policy on your part to take a high-handed course with your broker, who is probably doing his best to obtain delivery. YORK.—1. Considering the great amount of clerical work thrown upon the company by the large number of transactions in the shares, one month is not an unduly long period in which to register the transfer and issue the certificate. You might write direct to the secretary and inquire for the date when it will be issued. 2. Yes, but it may not be paid until September. 3. See first reply last week to "Oleo." YANG. (a) I should take a small profit when I could. 2. Should be worth holding for dividends. 3. Retain as a permanent investment. YORKSHIRE.—Hold both for recovery. YAHOO.—See article this week; also reply to "Compass." A revival seems due now.

ZEBRA (Belfast).—You may buy this or any of the shares recommended in this and last week's Notes. ZERO.—There is no further liability, the shares being fully paid. Hold 1 and 2 for a good profit, but sell 3 when the quotation approaches the price at which you bought. ZERO (Clevedon).—I cannot notice every company in the small space at my disposal. See reply to "Compass," also article next week.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ANTHRAX.—1 and 2. Prospects for both well nigh hopeless. Better take what you can get for them. ALLY SLOPER.—(a) It is a question for the company. (b) They would presumably not trouble so long as you paid. It would be necessary therefore for you to distrain. (c) This inquiry should be made separately for an answer under "Insurance." AJAX.—None of them shares which I should hold as an investment. Sell when you can do so at a small profit. AMIT.—It is a case in which the directors ought not to have gone to allotment, but I am afraid you can neither recover what you have paid nor escape the liability for further calls. See note in another column. AD REM.—See replies under "Insurance." ARGYLE.—Probably they would pay, but these three monthly gambles are extremely foolish from the point of view of the bucket-shops' customers.

BOUNDARY.—1 and 2. I think you can rely upon the firm's statement, but no doubt they will tell you where you can verify it if you question it. 3. No. B. C. (Cheltenham).—The company is a well managed concern, and I see no particular reason why you should hurry to sell. If, however, you wish better security, exchange into the newly-issued 5 per cent. debenture stock. BATH.—They might be held, but it is scarcely a case for averaging. BETTINA.—Apply to Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 31, Threadneedle Street, E.C.

CYMRO.—1. No recent information. You should be able to get a price from your broker. 2. You might take an early opportunity to secure your profit. 3. They are a likely speculation. C. D. G.—Constant warnings against the London Scottish Stock Exchange, the United Stock and Share Corporation, and similar concerns have been published in TRUTH.

DREADNOUGHT.—I can only advise you to sell, if you can find a purchaser. DARESBURY.—The company may turn out a success, but it is as yet in its infancy, and it is early days to prophesy. D. G.—Numerous warnings against Duncan, Forbes, and Co. have appeared in TRUTH. As to the others, I advise my readers to avoid dealings with them or any other firm doing business on the same lines. DAWLISH.—For reasons which I have so frequently explained I do not recommend dealings with this outside broking concern. Ask your bankers to introduce you to a good firm of brokers who are members of the London Stock Exchange.

FRASER.—Not either. FALAISE.—Worth holding.

GEORGE.—I do not know what the scheme is, but if you fancy it will not involve further outlay of a material character it might perhaps be worth while joining. You are probably aware of my general opinion of the outside concern. See Note this week.

H. E. C. (Croydon).—The debentures may turn out all right, but the security is rather second-rate, and the price the public were asked to give made them look dear. You might pay up the call and take an early opportunity to sell. HOME RULE.—I would suggest that you buy Irish Land Stock.

IGNORAMUS.—Very little to go upon at present, but if the shares are unsaleable, there is no need to ask my advice as to what you should do. INVESTOR (Preston).—No. 1 is the pick. I do not recommend the others. Read last week's recommendations. INNOCENT.—1. No. 2. If you have reason to doubt the correctness of the price you are entitled to ask for a verification of it by reference to the dealer. It does not by any means follow, however, that the price charged you is incorrect because it differs from newspaper quotations which are only approximately correct. This is especially the case in connection with rubber shares, the prices of which are constantly fluctuating throughout the day.

JUNO.—1. Sell Law Car and General Insurance shares. 2. Realise these shares also. J. J. A.—Thanks; I will make inquiries.

KAFFIR and LUMBER INVESTOR.—See note in another column. KOOKIE.—It is the organ of an outside broking firm, which I have frequently criticised on the ground that the advice it gives to customers cannot be regarded as disinterested. See articles in TRUTH of June 22 and previous dates.

MAUD MERRY.—This lottery tout has already been dealt with in TRUTH. B. MACDERMOT.—National Freehold Land and Building Society, 25, Moorgate Street, E.C.

NOBBY.—Not very attractive. I should prefer Paquin preference. See Notes last week.

NANCY STAIR.—Have nothing to do with this or any other bucket-shop firm.

PADDY.—A deposit with the National Freehold Land and Building Society, 25, Moorgate Street, E.C., would be a suitable channel for the money. PINTATO.—I should be sorry to answer for the trustworthiness of any foreign lottery touts. If you wish to take tickets in the lotteries you must run the risk of being cheated.

RITA.—I. Thanks. 2. Am afraid prospects still very poor. R. A. C.—An institution which I cannot recommend. RATHFRINLAND.—I know nothing as to the criticisms in question, but I recommend you not to deal with this or any similar firm of outside brokers. Obviously the advice given in their publication cannot be regarded as disinterested.

SALOP.—1. It is, of course, a very fine concern, but the present price is extremely high, and I should not be inclined to dissuade a holder from selling at a profit. 2. These might be realised. SAVOY.—Yes, marked ex div. on April 15, so that the seller claimed the dividend. S. R. T.—It does not seem to call for a notice. SOLDIER.—I advise you not to purchase rubber or any other shares in that way—indeed, it would be foolish to do so. The company whose shares you mention does not yet pay any dividends whatever. SUN.—1. See answer to "Bettina." 2. I advise my readers not to gamble in that way, and I cannot recommend any firm.

TITAN.—1. Inquire price of your broker. 2. Sell. 3. A good exchange. TWEEDSIDE.—The company has been moderately successful since the reconstruction about five years ago, and the debenture stock ought to be a fair speculative investment.

UNFORTUNATE.—Sorry, but I must stick to the rules. There is a chance of your being able to minimise your loss by waiting a little, but I do not look for any early return to the figure you paid. UNCERTAIN.—1. Will be answered under "Insurance." 2. I do not recommend any firms of that description.

WIGGIE.—Both high-class investments, but look fairly valued. WIDE AWAKE.—I know nothing against them, but I should advise you to arrange through your banker for the delivery of the shares only on payment of the cash.

ZOROASTER.—Of course, Duncan, Forbes, and Co. are not members of the London Stock Exchange. Surely you do not suppose that members are allowed to issue flat-catching circulars of this kind? As a matter of fact, they are not allowed to issue circulars of any kind, except to their own clients.

INSURANCE.

Disappointing Bonuses—University and Royal.

My normal mood in connection with insurance matters is one of optimism. I know how sound the system of insurance is as carried out by the best companies, and it is impossible for me, or for anybody else, to over-estimate the security afforded and the benefits conferred. From time to time, however, disconcerting occurrences take place which are extremely disappointing, and show that offices which ought to do thoroughly well seem to be doing very indifferently.

I have just received the report of the University Life Assurance Society for the year ending April 30 last. It contains the results of the valuation for the last five years. The gist of the matter is that the society gives its participating policyholders a reversionary bonus which increases the sum assured by £1 10s. a year for each £100 of assurance. Three valuations ago the corresponding bonus was £3. At the old rate the policies of this society were extremely good; at the new rate they are entirely indifferent, not to say bad. With anything like effective handling of the business of this society their bonus ought to be persistently at a high rate. To some extent it is a class institution for past or present members of the Universities and of recognised public schools. Its board consists of gentlemen of intense respectability and of some distinction. Its secretary is a man of genius, to whom the actuarial profession is under considerable obligations. Its financial position is one of unusual strength, and yet, with all the advantages which it appears to possess, its affairs are being muddled, its latest results do not rise even to mediocrity, and the extinction of the society as a separate body appears to be imminent. The one word "stagnation" epitomises its record for many years past, and it is an office which ought not to stand still or to retrograde in the way that it is doing. The chief cause in the big reduction in the bonus is depreciation in the value of its Stock Exchange securities. This depreciation amounts to £50,000 in five years, which is something like 12 per cent. of the assets of this class, and suggests a lack of competence in connection with investments. The life assurance fund is decreasing, and the premium income is more or less stationary. The falling off of the bonus is likely to have an adverse effect upon the society, and to make advisable, if not necessary, its absorption by some more enterprising office.

Such a termination to a career of eighty-five years would be regretted, and it would be advantageous all round if it could be avoided. Class offices of high character ought to be beneficial to the particular sections of the community for which they cater, besides which their continued existence constitutes a distinct leaven of decency and high conduct among insurance companies, which would suffer as a whole if the business sank into the hands of purely commercial enterprises. There is no need at all for offices of the character of the University to depart from the high standard they have been accustomed to conform with, and with reasonable ability in management they should be more than able to hold their own with mere commercial companies. Cannot the University take in hand in serious fashion the reorganisation of its business on enterprising lines, and secure for its policyholders the advantages which appear to be within its reach? It would seem that it must either do this or must go under in the struggle for existence. It is far too good a society to go under in this way, and it would be little less than a calamity for life assurance as a whole if the University and other offices more or less similar were to disappear. The course that I recommend is possible, and should be successful. It means an effort and a possibly inconvenient stirring up of lethargy, but it can be done, and I very sincerely hope it will be done.

Now let me turn to the report on the valuation of the Royal Insurance Company for the five years ending December 31, 1909. Nobody can accuse the Royal of not being vigorous, and enterprising, and commercial; in fact, if any accusations are to be cast at anybody it would be that the Royal is too commercial, and too aggressive, and too disposed to ride roughshod over all competitors. As a fire office it is huge and vigorous, and—perhaps to its own detriment—world-wide in the sphere of its operations. For merit as a life office it is simply nowhere when compared with the best life assurance companies. For a great many years past it has given its participating policyholders a reversionary bonus at the rate of 30s. per cent. per annum calculated upon sums assured only, and this bonus is repeated on the present occasion. Taking the premium rates of the Royal into account, this bonus is, to say the least of it, extremely unattractive. I do not think there is a single life assurance policy issued by the Royal that could not be obtained to much better advantage from some other office. I am not altogether prepared with an explanation of the inferiority of this important company in this respect, but mediocre and unattractive the life assurance policies of the Royal most undoubtedly are. It may be that the Royal is run principally in the interests of its shareholders, and that they take too large a proportion of the surplus to permit of the profits of the Royal comparing anything but unfavourably with the results of the best life offices. Shareholders are, of course, perfectly useless from the point of view of the policyholders in a life office. The life assurance funds of the Royal exceed £9,000,000, and this sum is abundant security for the assured. The position is made no safer by the existence of share capital, and the bonuses are less than they would otherwise be in consequence of the payments to shareholders out of the profits of the life department.

Here, then, we have a significant contrast. There is a sleepy, unprogressive office like the University, which apparently possesses all sorts of intrinsic advantages, which is attractive on account of its past records and of the character of its directors and its actuary, but which, on the basis of its last declaration of bonus, is quit otherwise than attractive to policyholders.

On the other hand, in striking contrast, we have the Royal. Big, energetic, prosperous, and commercial to the extreme of commercialism; but as indifferent as and, on the record of past years, greatly inferior to the University. Pursuing methods that seem diametrically antagonistic, both are comparative failures from a life assurance standpoint. Both are unquestionably safe and financially strong; both would appear wonderfully good were it not for the fact that there are many life offices which are greatly superior. Highly respectable lethargy fails. Aggressively enterprising commercialism equally fails. Where, then, is success to be found?

Happily, it is to be met with in life assurance companies of various kinds. There are some quiet-going societies whose rate of growth is very slow, but which yet succeed in giving particularly fine results to those who are assured with them. On the other hand, there are some big, enterprising companies which are steadily and rapidly increasing their funds and their premium income, and who also give returns to the assured that are phenomenally good. While as a class, mutual life offices are perhaps better than proprietary companies, it is abundantly manifest that some of the proprietary companies are as good as any mutual office in existence. There is proof of merit in big companies and small ones, and in both mutual and proprietary societies. We cannot—at least, I cannot—discover any one definite characteristic that makes success of the highest order certain. Happily, this is to be found in many diverse circumstances, and the important thing for people

Answers to Correspondents.

Adrem.—I entirely disapprove of the company and its methods and should not advise you to pay any more. You had better try if you can obtain any surrender value for your bond, but I am doubtful of your being able to do so. Honest Dan.—You should certainly subscribe for the Post Magazine, (1d. weekly), 9, St. Andrew Street, E.C. Perhaps also the Policyholder, (2d. weekly), 44, Lloyd Street, Manchester, and the Policy, (1d. weekly), 85, Fleet Street, E.C. Postage to China extra. Lex.—No difficulty whatever about the insurance you want. Try Ocean, United Legal, or Lloyd's. Liveb.—The company is respectable, but far from being in the front rank. It is safe for fire insurance for the present, and may get stronger. Caudebec.—Yes, the company is quite good. M., Durham.—Obtain prospectuses of this class of policy from the Norwich Union Life Office, and the English and Scottish Law Life Office, and choose what suits you best. Gertrude, Clontarf.—Your policy is a thoroughly good and satisfactory one in every way, the society is perfectly safe, and you should certainly keep on the payment of premiums. The amount of the bonuses is somewhat uncertain but likely to be good. Colonist.—(1) About £10 14s. (2) The first two offices you mention are quite satisfactory, so is the Confederation Life. (3) Apply to Commercial Union for particulars. Amicus.—Have nothing at all to do with the society with whom you have been in correspondence.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

CRUDE RUBBER WASHING COMPANY.

Favourable Prospects.

The statutory meeting of shareholders of the Crude Rubber Washing Company, Limited, was held on the 4th inst. at Salisbury House, London Wall, E.C. M. Louis G. Schlesinger, Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur (the chairman of the company), presided.

The Secretary (Mr. W. F. Scott Armstrong, F.C.S.) having read the notice convening the meeting,

The Chairman said : I am sure you will be pleased to hear that the transfers of the patents mentioned in the prospectus have been completed, that the purchase consideration has been fully satisfied, and that we shall be in a position to proceed with the erection of our new factory on completion of the purchase of our recently acquired freehold at Edmonton, which our lawyers tell me will take place this week. Before proceeding further on this subject, I wish to make a few remarks as to the progress of our company since our incorporation, and as to its position in the rubber world. As you are aware, we have undertaken to develop an almost new field, and from the present outlook I think I can safely say that we will be able to accomplish our objects with no small degree of success. Our business, as you know, consists to a large extent in the removal of foreign substances and impurities from crude rubber, the annual production of which is estimated at 25,000 to 30,000 tons, that is, over one-third of the world's total rubber production. In order to obtain a large and rapid output of cleansed crude rubber we have secured what we consider the two best types of rubber washing machines, the "Guiguet" and the "Murac-Dessau." It is not my intention to explain in detail the operations of these machines, as we have with us here our manager, Mr. Dessau, who will deal more fully with this subject. I may say, however, that on several occasions both my colleagues and myself have witnessed the machines in operation at Edmonton and at Lyons, and, having studied the workings of various other types of machine, we are firmly convinced that no other machine can do the work in as thorough, rapid, and efficient a manner, or with such profitable results. The board, and particularly myself, would gladly take the shareholders into their confidence as to the commercial side of our business and the profits we are obtaining, and which we hope largely to increase in the immediate future; but for trade reasons, which every shareholder will readily understand, it would be unwise at the present moment to disclose the details of our operations. It will be sufficient to say that your directors are fully satisfied with the results so far achieved, and are confident of the future of our enterprise. You will, yourselves, be able to make deductions from the figures which I shall quote further on, and you will conclude that our company is doing exceedingly well. I have heard it said that our present success is largely due to the conditions actually prevailing in the rubber market. This, gentlemen, is not the case; and, paradoxical as it may seem, I wish to tell you that the lower the price of rubber the greater our percentage of profit. In order to illustrate this better, allow me to cite an example. If rubber costs, say, 5s. per lb., with a washing loss of 33 1-3 per cent., it will cost us 7s. 6d. per lb., and even at the high rates now prevailing we could not count on more than 8s. per lb., which means less than 7 per cent. profit; but if the same rubber should drop to 2s., our cost would be 3s., and we could easily dispose of it at 3s. 6d.—that is, over 16 per cent. profit. And you must not forget that with rubber, as with most commodities, high rates tend to diminish and low rates tend to increase the difference in price, according to quality. The margin between impure and cleansed rubber would be considerably increased, with lower prices for rubber generally. This is indisputable, and it is equally certain that lower prices would considerably stimulate consumption, and consequently largely increase our sales. But for the moment it is sufficient to state that a possible variation in the price of rubber cannot, to any considerable extent, affect our business. And here, gentlemen, we have one of the reasons why our enterprise has deservedly met with great favour from the public—namely, that we are practically independent of the fluctuations of the rubber market, and that our future development and success is not linked with the maintenance of the high prices now ruling. Amongst the many other reasons for our popularity I may point out that, although participating in all the possibilities of large profits common to enterprises dealing with rubber, our undertaking is essentially a European industrial business and free from the difficulties, dangers, and risks inherent to distant management in more or less uncivilised countries. Another of these reasons is to be found in the fact that out of a total capital of £250,000, £200,000 will be available for working capital. In this respect, let me call your attention to the fact that a considerable part of the unissued capital has been called, and you will be pleased to note that the number of shares that have now been allotted wholly for cash is 180,800. This not only has enabled the board to make the periods between calls longer than we originally anticipated, but also, by taking advantage of all favourable opportunities, to gradually accumulate the stock which is necessary to insure constant regularity in our output without being at the mercy of the market. This object we have now fully attained. Our sales of cleansed rubber have only been limited by our production. We are indebted to our friends, the British Murac Syndicate, Limited—two of their directors being directors of this company—for the very effective manner in which they looked after the interests of this company during the period which preceded its final organisation, and for their liberal interpretation of the existing agreements as to stocks, pending contracts, etc. All these factors have combined to already produce an estimated profit of somewhat over £15,000. You are, no doubt, aware that our present plant consists of a small installation, quite incapable of dealing with the company's volume of business. As I mentioned before, we have purchased a freehold at Lower Edmonton, with favourable conditions as regards building, water, railroad siding, etc., and which, when completed, in a few months, will be fitted with two or three Guiguet machines and a like number of the Murac-Dessaus, with a total estimated output of at least twelve tons per day, whereas we now can only produce about four tons per week, thus representing an increase of nearly twenty times our present output. I believe that when our installation is completed no finer similar plant will be found anywhere, and, subject to the consent of my colleagues, I propose to set aside three days for the shareholders of this company to inspect the new works, and to show them the very interesting operations which our rubbers undergo in the cleansing processes. You will be pleased to know that we have agreed to act as the purchasing agents for the Murac Company of North America, a company now in the course of formation. This contract should yield our company a profit of at least £2,500 per year. I wish to call your attention to the fact that we possess foreign patents, which the company may be able to dispose of to considerable advantage. We wish to deal in this respect only with such corporate bodies, groups, and persons, who, by reason of their influence and standing in their respective countries, could give effective support to our subsidiaries, and start them on a prosperous career. In this direction, you will be pleased to know that negotiations are favourably progressing with a combination of very influential Continental gentlemen, who, I may say, have been allied with the rubber trade for many years, and whose names and standing in the rubber world are exceptional. I am not allowed to say more for the moment, but I promise you when the negotiations are completed to acquaint you with the terms, which will be of a character that will not alone yield this company a large immediate return, but will insure it a considerable yearly income. Although we are quite independent of any other company or group, we are, however, I am pleased to say, on very friendly terms with some important houses, and amongst them with the other companies who are operating the Guiguet machines and the Murac-Dessau machine, and we shall thus always be able, although we have not entered into working arrangements or agreement, to act in conjunction for the benefit of our common interests. I know that my colleagues—in fact, every one connected with this company—take a personal interest in its welfare, and it is very satisfactory to me to be its chairman. Allow me to remind you, again, that we have hitherto been operating on a small scale. We have been, so to say, working at high pressure, and under the circumstances our output has been indeed satisfactory. When, with our larger installation, we shall turn out proportionately larger quantities of rubber, we expect to be able to meet you with returns that will be of a very satisfactory character. And now, in conclusion, let me venture a word about the future of rubber. Many of us are sanguine that we shall see, year by year, larger consumption, and personally, and from my own knowledge of tropical countries and long experience both in the exploitation of forest rubber and in the cultivation of rubber, I do not think that for many years to come the production will ever exceed the consumption, even if, as I heard it said the other day, it should "rain rubber." The total available output from plantations is so far insignificant as compared with the world's production, and whereas the plantation output is likely to increase very considerably, on the other hand the collection of wild rubber in many countries—and not the least important producers—has been, and is becoming, more and more difficult, and especially more costly, so that lower prices would immediately result in a considerable decrease of the supply from these sources and outweigh by far the increase of production from plantations. On the other hand, and calculate as we may, we must make allowance for the constantly increasing wealth of the world, the desire for commodities, and especially the daily increasing number of motor-cars. Leaving aside the enormous use of pleasure cars, there is a daily increase in commercial cars sufficient to consume a whole month's rubber production of a few years ago. Has this production increased by any considerable ratio? I think not; and, on the other side, I venture to state that in scarcely any article in which rubber was used ten years ago the rubber has been replaced by another material.

It will be said that the use of reclaimed rubber and rubber substitutes is likewise increasing, but they only meet a fraction of the increase of consumption. I feel, therefore, that for many years to come the consumption of rubber will be on the increase, and those who take this view and put it into practical use will encourage the promotion of sound propositions, so as to keep the supply of rubber equal to its daily increasing demand. I say this for good reasons, and in the interest of you who are shareholders in our undertaking, because if we do not contribute to the supply directly, we do so indirectly, by giving good value both as to quality and as to price, and specially by endeavouring to establish uniform and constant standard qualities. Those who are interested or associated with the rubber trade and industries will readily realise the great importance of this. There are, in our business so many ways open for development, and which seemingly invite success, that it is not easy to restrain from spreading out in too many directions, but we must always bear in mind the future, and collect our strength, so that every step shall contribute to the final success of our enterprise. I do not wish my words to appear too optimistic, nor to convey the impression that everything in the future will be couleur de rose. We must foresee set-backs, and so far as we are able to, we intend to provide for any contingency. But, gentlemen, I am hopeful that my words will be justified, and that when we next meet we shall be able to render a good account of our stewardship, and all reap the benefits which we anticipate.

Mr. Morland M. Dessau (manager of the company) then gave technical details of the working of the machines in dealing with the rubber under treatment.

RHODESIA GOLD MINING CO.

In pursuance of Section 59 of the Companies Ordinance, 1895 (Southern Rhodesia), a general meeting of the Rhodesia Gold Mining and Investment Company, Limited, was held on the 29th ult., at the offices of the company, Threadneedle House, 28-31, Bishopsgate Street Within, E.C., Mr. C. F. Rowsell presiding.

The Chairman in the course of his speech said: The policy of the board is to acquire promising properties in Rhodesia, with a view to their further development and eventual flotation when, in the opinion of the company's consulting engineers, they are sufficiently proved to justify that step. So far, only one company has been placed upon the market, viz., the Lonely Reef Gold Mining Company, Limited. This company, in which your company holds the largest interest, has, as you are no doubt aware, been most successfully floated, and met with a highly favourable reception on the market. This property, before its acquisition by your company, in association with Messrs. Rothschild and Sons, the Consolidated Gold Fields of South Africa, and the African and European Investment Company, Limited, was examined and reported on by several leading consulting engineers, including Mr. A. H. Ackermann (the consulting engineer of the Chartered Company), Mr. C. B. Kingston (your own consulting engineer), and Mr. Leopold Weill (the consulting engineer to Messrs. N. M. Rothschild and Sons), and all of these mining engineers formed highly favourable views of the property, and strongly recommended the purchase in which your company took the leading part. I think we have every reason to feel perfectly satisfied with that purchase, and I am glad that the first introduction made by your company on the market should have been so thoroughly sound and promising a proposition as is the Lonely Mine. The Chairman went on to refer in detail to the important properties in which the company was interested, and said that the future of Rhodesia as a great gold mining country is now assured.

LONELY REEF GOLD MINING CO.

In pursuance of Section 59 of the Companies Ordinance, 1895 (Southern Rhodesia), a general meeting of the Lonely Reef Gold Mining Company, Limited, was held on the 29th ult., at the company's offices, Threadneedle House, Bishopsgate Street Within, E.C., Mr. C. F. Rowsell presiding.

The Chairman said: The Lonely Mine, before it was acquired by your company, was worked by its former owners with extremely satisfactory results, and produced from 16,556 tons of ore no less than £88,789, an average recovery of £5 7s. 2d. per ton. In addition to this we have the slimes, which were not treated at the time but stored on the property. It is estimated that these amount to some 6,000 or 7,000 tons, of an average value of about 9 dwts. to the ton. From this you will see that the ore treated by the late owners contained very high values; but it is not so much the richness of the ore body as the remarkable regularity of the deposit and the absence of faults and dislocations which combine to render the Lonely Mine so satisfactory a proposition, and it is upon these conditions that Mr. Leopold Weill founds his view that the prospect of the reef continuing in depth could hardly be greater than it is. At the time when Mr. Weill visited the property the development had only reached the 3rd level, or a depth of 300 ft. Since then the shaft has been sunk to the 4th level, and a considerable amount of driving has also been carried out. At the time of his visit Mr. Weill estimated the profit on the ore already blocked out, and probably to be met with down to the 3rd level, at £125,000. This, of course, has been considerably increased by the work since carried out upon the property The present scheme of development is to sink the main shaft down to the 6th level, increasing the distance betwen each level from 100 to 125 ft., and to push on the driving of the levels as rapidly as possible, blocking out the ore by means of winzes. . . . In the opinion of our consulting engineer, the developments carried out since we have taken over the direction of the mine have confirmed in depth the excellent results obtained in the upper working of the mine, and I think we may regard the present position of the property as entirely and eminently satisfactory.

ASPREY AND CO., LIMITED.

Mr. George Edward Asprey presided at the first ordinary general meeting of the shareholders, held on the 29th ult. at 166, New Bond Street, W., and, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, expressed the directors' pleasure that their anticipations of increased prosperity had been fully realised. The period dealt with was fifteen months ended March 31, 1910, of which period the first six months were under the old partnership and the remaining nine months under the new company. The trading profit for the purposes of comparison with the annual profits shown in the prospectus amounted to £28,564 for the fifteen months, whereas the amount for the previous twelve months was £20,233. The extra three months being much the slackest period of the year, it would be evident that the increase was a very considerable one. Whilst it was too early to prophesy about the results of the new year's trading which began on April 1, it was highly satisfactory to note that each of the two months already completed showed a large increase as against the same months of 1909 in the amount of business done, notwithstanding the lamentable death of His Majesty King Edward VII., which would naturally be expected to have an adverse effect upon this business. The directors proposed to continue the policy to which they considered the success of the business to be due—viz., unceasing effort to have always the finest stock at the lowest possible prices and reliance upon the recommendation of satisfied customers for increase of business, and not upon advertising. The balance of trading account, after providing for all depreciations, was £28,564 14s. 5d.

Mr. George Kenneth Asprey seconded the resolution, which was unanimously adopted without discussion, and a final dividend at the rate of 12½ per cent. per annum on the ordinary shares for the three months ended March 31, 1910, making with the dividends already paid 12½ per cent. per annum for the nine months ended on that date, was declared.

GUAYULE RUBBER COMPANY, LIMITED.

The statutory meeting of this company was held on the 30th ult. at Winchester House, Mr. Arthur Gorton Angier presiding.

The Chairman said the company was incorporated on April 6. The shares which were offered to the public on the issue of the prospectus were very largely over-subscribed for, and the issue was therefore a successful flotation. There was undoubtedly an almost unlimited demand for the Guayule, even although the prices of the other classes were to fall to the low level reached in 1907. An original trade sample of the rubber was submitted to Mr. William Perkins, the eminent authority on hydro-carbons in this country. The report was that the sample contained over 70 per cent. of pure natural elastic rubber, which made it equal to some of the best brands of rubber in the market, and the fact that it found a ready market in America and elsewhere, where it had become known and been appreciated for some years, proved that it fulfilled and supplied all the requirements of the manufacturers both as to elasticity and vulcanising properties. The chairman proceeded to state that the company had made forward sales of about 115 tons at 5s. 3d. per lb., which compared with the prospectus estimate of 2s. 6d. per lb. On the question of supply he called attention to the fact that under the present contract owned by the company, they had the sole right to collect the Guayule shrub from the huge area of about 6,000,000 acres. They had a most exhaustive report on these lands by Mr. Valdespino, who was one of the leading authorities in Mexico, and from this report it was clear they need have no anxiety as to the supply of raw material. The information and reports from Mexico as to the result of the company's trading since they took over the business showed the profits, estimated on a conservative basis, as fully equal to those anticipated in the prospectus, which indicated an available sum sufficient to pay 25 per cent. per annum on the total capitalisation of the company. The auditors had been instructed to prepare a statement of profits for the period from April 15 to June 30, with a view to the early payment of an interim dividend. The directors had come to the conclusion that they would be able, as soon as the audit was completed, to pay such a dividend; and they congratulated the shareholders on the fact that the first year was likely to more than prove the anticipations of the prospectus. The chairman added that the board had received two cablegrams from their auditors, Messrs. Deloitte, Plender, Griffiths, and Co., who had their own offices in Mexico, and who were auditing the accounts between the old company and this one. The first cablegram was: "Will not be possible to arrive at figures or periods mentioned; will make every endeavour to obtain figures from March 1 to April 30, and from May 1 to May 31, by to-morrow. June figures only available at plantation." That wire came in yesterday. That morning they received the following: "Guayule: Approximate profits disclosed by Mexico City books is as follows, subject to verification of rubber consignments, and in transit, provision for depreciation of plant and machinery, and for bad and doubtful debts, verification of capital expenditure and outstanding liabilities. March 1 to April 30, $231,180 Mexican"—this dollar is roughly about 2s.—"May 1 to May 31, $123,400; total, $354,580." That worked out at about £35,458. The dividend foreshadowed in the prospectus at 25 per cent. amounted to £100,000 per annum. At the rate of the figures just given it worked out at about £140,000; so far these profits had been made on the old contracts, which were taken over from the previous company, when the sale price was some 3s. per lb. only.

QUEER STORY.

ABSENT HURT.

A Tale of the 'Varsity Match.

STRANGE things happen sometimes at cricket. The incident related in the following story is said to have happened in connection with the Inter-'Varsity match a good many years ago.

This annual struggle at Lord's was a more important affair then than it is now—regarded, at any rate, from the purely cricket standpoint. As county cricket has developed, 'Varsity cricket has gone back—or, at best, has remained stationary. There is even a disposition in some critical circles to look upon it as hardly up to first-class form. When the strongest counties play Oxford or Cambridge nowadays, they are prone to treat the contest rather in the nature of a holiday match, and to take the opportunity for resting some of their cracks. Forty years ago it was quite different. 'Varsity cricket pretty generally included the best amateur talent in the country. The Gentlemen's eleven against the Players would be mainly recruited from that source. The strongest of the county clubs thought it a feather in their caps to lower the colours of either of the rival Blues. But, now, Ichabod! The 'Varsities' doings in their trial matches attract less notice from the man in the street than the doings of Somerset or Derbyshire. And the inter-'Varsity contest, once of supreme interest to all cricket lovers, is becoming every year more and more of a social picnic.

There would sometimes be heavy betting on the match in the old days. The writer has more than one occasion in his mind when four-figure cheques changed hands over a single wager. It was so, for instance, in 186—, when Bob Rockleigh laid Tommy Grimwade two monkeys, even money, on Cambridge.

Tommy Grimwade was what is commonly known as a "character." He was chiefly distinguished by two things—by the almost truculent ferocity of his Toryism and by his inveterate belief in the vast superiority of Oxford over Cambridge. This belief was both personal and traditional with him. He had been educated at "The House," and so had all his forebears for immemorial generations. His own son, then only a child of ten, already had his name down at the same college. To hint to Tommy that anything that came out of Cambridge could, by any possibility, compete for excellence with anything that came out of Oxford was to set him off breathing scorn and defiance. Bob Rockleigh, of course, knew this, and I have little doubt that he was trading upon it for his own ends when he took occasion to draw Grimwade on the subject of the forthcoming 'Varsity match.

"I rather think our fellows are going to pull it off this year," remarked the still youthful ex-Cantab, with a well-satisfied smile.

Tommy Grimwade's face went pink. His eyes shot sparks.

"Don't you be too sure," he retorted.

"Well, it's only my opinion, of course," pursued Rockleigh, placidly. "But I've played against both teams, and I'm bound to say I see no comparison. To be sure, you've got Sylvester. He's a class bowler, I allow; but one good trundler can't carry a match on his shoulders, when all's said."

"Pooh! He'll rattle your lot out like ninepins," declared Tommy Grimwade, with defiant scorn.

"It may be so," smiled the other. "All the same, I'd be very happy to have a few hundreds on Cambridge at reasonable odds, if I could find any one to take me."

The words themselves, still more perhaps the tone in which they were uttered, drew our truculent Oxonian with some effect.

"Odds be damned!" he exclaimed, fiercely. "I'll take you, at even money, to any tune you please."

"You mean it?"

Rockleigh's intonation was surprised—even slightly incredulous—as though he doubted whether he could have heard Grimwade aright.

"Of course I do. Why the deuce shouldn't I?" ejaculated Grimwade, with considerable heat. "Don't look at me as if you thought I was a lunatic, hang you! I know what I'm talking about. How much do you want to lay?"

Rockleigh suggested a monkey.

"Make it two," answered the old Oxonian, glaring defiance at him.

"Oh! If you wish, by all means," smiled Rockleigh, as he produced his betting book. "I really think, however, I ought to give you the market odds," he added, pausing, pencil in hand, before he made the entry.

"Exceedingly kind of you," sneered Grimwade. "But evens is quite good enough for me, thank you."

"As you please, of course," replied Rockleigh, and he booked the bet.

That was just a week before the great match. Two days later began the last of the Dark Blues' trial games against the M.C.C. at Lord's. Rockleigh was playing for the club, and was entrusted with the task of skippering the side.

He was fortunate enough to win the toss, and, as the wicket was hard and true, he naturally took first knock. The Oxford bowling, with the exception of Sylvester, their fast left-hander, was pretty mediocre. And since Michington, the Dark Blue skipper, was anxious to save him as far as possible for the more important fixture, he only utilised his services sparingly. The consequence was that the M.C.C. batsmen, who were a hottish lot, easily collared the distinctly moderate attack, remaining in possession the whole day. When stumps were drawn the score stood at 430, with three wickets still to fall. Thus matters looked somewhat doubtful for the Dark Blues; the more so that the wicket (as was the manner of Lord's wickets in those days) was wearing none too well, and had already begun to bump a bit awkwardly.

"Looks like our having a lively time with Muskett to-morrow," said Michington to Sylvester, as they came into the Pavilion together.

"You're right," nodded Sylvester, with an expressive grimace.

Muskett, it may be explained, was the fastest express-trundler of his day — generally known to cricketers as the Loamshire Terror. The sobriquet was deserved. On anything like a fiery wicket he was a terror indeed; more especially as he had a pestilent trick of dropping 'em a bit short on the leg-side and picking off the ribs of the unfortunate batsman. His trundling career, however, was short-lived. Drink, the curse of the professional cricketer in those days, soon played havoc with him. On this very afternoon, of which I am writing, he had been beguiling the waiting hours while his side was in at an adjacent "pub," with various admirers. The result was that by the end of the afternoon he was so tipsy that young Purvis, of the ground staff, good-naturedly anxious to save him from getting into trouble with the authorities, smuggled him quietly home in a cab.

Next morning, when play was resumed, Sylvester was put on to finish off the M.C.C. innings. But luck was against him. Stopping a hot return he had the misfortune to injure his bowling hand, and was obliged to retire. Presently a substitute came out to field for him. When the players returned to the Pavilion at the conclusion of the innings they found him looking rather woe-begone, with his left hand bandaged and in a sling.

"I say, old man; I hope it's nothing serious," exclaimed Michington.

"It's my two middle fingers. The doctor says I've sprained them rather badly. You can't see the knuckles, they're so swollen. He's afraid I shan't be able to use 'em for some little time," answered Sylvester, in rueful tones.

"What? Does he mean you won't be able to turn out against Cambridge on Monday?" ejaculated his skipper, in blank dismay.

"He doesn't think there's a chance—confound it," said the unfortunate bowler

The ill news spread quickly. In five minutes it was all over the pavilion. Expressions of condolence poured in upon Sylvester from every quarter, Rockleigh being among the foremost to give utterance to his sympathy. While he was in the act of doing so, Tommy Grimwade came up.

"Well, of all the sickening luck!" he exclaimed.

"Yes, isn't it?" struck in Rockleigh. "I almost feel as if I ought to let you cry off that little bet of ours, under the circumstances, Grimwade."

"Rot!" snapped out Tommy. "I'm not taking favours of that description from any man. Besides—don't you be so sure, Rockleigh. The glorious uncertainty of cricket is proverbial. A match is never lost till it's won, after all."

"True, O King," replied Rockleigh, with playful good-humour. "Still, win or lose, I'd much rather the match had been fought out on its merits than with your crack bowler hors de combat. A victory, under such circumstances, is precious little satisfaction to any one, is it?"

Grimwade's only rejoinder was an inarticulate snort. Although he would not admit it, you could see by his glum expression that he knew Oxford's case without Sylvester to be pretty hopeless.

By Sunday, however, he was observed to be looking more cheerful again. Better reports of Sylvester had reached him. The sprain had proved to be a good deal less serious than the doctor had thought. The swelling had already subsided, and Sylvester could use his fingers without much pain. It was on the cards that he might be able to bowl against Cambridge, after all. Monday morning confirmed this hopeful prognostication. Sylvester appeared in the pavilion duly changed for the fray. His hand was now of normal dimensions, and though still a little sore and discoloured, it hurt him to use it scarcely at all. In order to make sure, he bowled a few experimental overs at the nets beforehand; and the result was entirely satisfactory. His pace and spin were as great as ever. He made the ball whip back with all his old devil. Michington, the skipper, could almost have stood on his head with delight, and all the Oxonian contingent were jubilant. They gave Sylvester a great reception as he came out with his side to field (Michington having lost the toss); and the cheers were renewed when they saw him take the ball, measure his run twelve paces back from the nursing wicket, and mark the limit with a strenuous dig of his heel. "Play!" called the bowler's umpire. And the match began.

If any match ever deserved to be associated with the name of an individual player, that was Sylvester's match. The hard wicket, slightly inclined to be fiery, suited him to a T. The cross wind assisted his natural swerve. To borrow a modern slang metaphor, then unknown, he made the ball talk. The Cambridge innings consisted mainly of a procession, with brief interludes. 105 was the total. And 8 for 39 was the left-hander's useful little bag.

He also did his share in the run-getting line when Oxford appeared at the wickets. Going in seventh wicket down, with the score at 120, he assisted to add a highly serviceable 67, of which his own share was 35. Eventually the innings closed for 201, leaving Oxford with a lead of 96. This concluded the first day's play. The wearers of light blue left the ground looking somewhat depressed. Rockleigh's expression was particularly morose. Naturally, he was thinking of his £1,000. Grimwade's expression was correspondingly jubilant. He was not thinking of his £1,000. The honour and glory of a prospective victory for his beloved Oxford was the one thought that filled the capacious bosom of that good patriot.

Cambridge did rather better at their second venture. A good deal of rain had fallen in the night, and next day being cloudy and sunless, the wicket was slow and easy, so that it gave no assistance at all to Sylvester's express deliveries. His analysis was no better than 3 for 89, the Cambridge total reaching the respectable figure of 271. Oxford were thus left to make 176 to win. Fifty of these were obtained for the loss of two wickets before the drawing of stumps. The balance was hit off next morning for the loss of five more batsmen; the Dark Blues gaining the victory just on lunch time by three wickets. Though Sylvester had done little in the later stages of the game, every one recognised that it was his superb bowling in the first innings that had won the match for his side. He had another tremendous reception when he came in to the pavilion.

"I'll send you along a cheque for that thou.," said Rockleigh to Grimwade, striving hard to conceal his mortification under an extremely sickly smile.

"No, you won't," answered Grimwade, curtly. "For one thing, you can't. For another, I wouldn't touch your dirty money, if you could. Yes; don't put on that air of injured innocence. I know all about it, Rockleigh. As it happens, your worthy confederate, Muskett, gave you away, in his cups, to young Purvis on the first day of the M.C.C. match. You hadn't forgotten that though Sylvester bowls left he bats right; and so you bribed Muskett to make a point of picking him off on his bowling arm, knowing very well, of course, that when Muskett does that to a man on Friday or Saturday, there won't be much sting in his victim's trundling on Monday. Now you know why Sylvester made so much of a trifling mishap, and why he was "absent hurt" when our fellows went in to bat on Friday. I think that's all I have to say to you. Stay, though. There's one thing more. I don't want to have to bring your name before the Committee of the M.C.C. So, if you'll take my advice, you'll send in your resignation to-morrow."

And Grimwade turned on his heel and walked away.

BOOKS.

I KNEW once a poor railway shunter who had had both his legs chopped off in the course of his work by no fault of his own. When he came out of hospital and asked the goods manager of the line for a job, that worthy, with a pleasant glance at his two wooden legs, said, "Nay, you're nobbut fit for firewood nah!" This might serve as a parable of our bearing towards whole races and classes and towards an entire sex—towards Jews, Nonconformists, and towards women—whom we first disqualify, and through the disqualification incapacitate and then mock at their incapacity! We closed for centuries against the Jews every business except that of usury, and then turn round upon them for being unconscionable and incorrigible usurers. Having for centuries shut out women from every practical and rational profession, we turn round upon them for being unpractical and unreasoning. And I am reminded by Mr. Joseph Crouch's interesting, suggestive, if not wholly convincing, "Puritanism and Art" (1) that the Nonconformists having been shut out by an "Act of Uniformity," by a "Corporations Act," and by a "Test Act" from all public careers and even from the Universities, were then reviled for their lack of culture! In the preface to "Culture and Anarchy" that very superior person Matthew Arnold, who had been, it will be remembered, for a quarter of a century inspector of Nonconformist schools, sneers at what he calls the "undesirable provincialism of the English Puritans and Protestant Nonconformists." But at whose door lies this "undesirable provinciality"? Surely at that of the party of "sweetness and light" which shut the Nonconformists out from all higher education till the middle of the nineteenth century. Even allowing, then, the Nonconformists to be such Philistines as they are represented by the devotees of sweetness and light, these superior persons themselves are chiefly responsible for the Philistinism. But this Philistinism, as Mr. Crouch shows conclusively, has been extravagantly exaggerated by its natural enemies—and because they were its natural enemies—the men of light and letters, who, having the ear of the public, could prejudice its judgment without fear of contradiction. To take, e.g., the case which Mr Crouch cites of the Elizabethan playwrights. They were allowed to exercise their art only if they wore the livery of a royal or noble house, and their very livery, therefore, bound them to take royal and aristocratic, i.e., anti-Puritan views, moral, political, and religious. Shakespeare himself, I have no doubt, was thus biassed by the livery he wore, and hence his aristocratic scorn of the people and his aristocratic hatred of the Puritan. Mr. Crouch, however, acquits Shakespeare as well as Spenser of these prejudices, while with good reason attributing them to Shirley, Massinger, and the other Court poets of the period. Later you find such a bigoted and bitter Protestant even as Charles Kingsley accepting the fable that New England Puritan mothers were prohibited by the Blue Laws of Connecticut from kissing their babies on the Sabbath—these so-called Blue Laws being an impudent fabrication of the Rev. Samuel Peters, a Tory who had been expelled from New England for disloyalty. Whether you consider Puritanism is essentially antagonistic to Art depends upon the breadth or narrowness of your definition of Puritanism and of Art. A broad definition of Puritanism would include within its pale such supreme artists as Plato, Michael Angelo, and Rembrandt, but the Cromwellian Puritan would certainly be horrified to find himself in such company. He at least regarded Art as an appeal not to the soul, but to the senses, and because it had been used in the idolatrous service of Rome he could never after dissociate it completely from the Scarlet Woman. Swift has hit him off best in "A Tale of a Tub" as Jack who, because Peter had, contrary to their father's will, overloaded his coat with ornaments, stripped his own absolutely bare.

The most interesting part of "Helene von Racowitza's" autobiography (2)—her account of Lassalle's infatuation with her, a mutual and amazing passion which, through its occasioning the early death of the great social democrat has probably deflected considerably the history of the German people—has already appeared; but the extraordinary story was well worth re-telling. Worth telling also was the whole of this adventurous lady's eventful life from her precocious infancy to to-day. Was there ever such a precocious infant? Johnson thought it wonderful that he remembered something that happened when he was two years and a-half old; Dickens thought it wonderful that he remembered something that happened when he was two years old, but Princess Helene von Racowitza's earliest recollections go back to her seventh month! She can distinctly remember, she says, incidents that happened when she was seven, nine, and ten months of age! But, indeed, the princess needed an extraordinary memory, if only for the names and nationalities of her suitors, of her lovers, and, I had almost said, of her husbands. Her frenzied infatuation with Lassalle did not prevent her marrying immediately after his death the rival who shot him; and he, dying soon, was soon succeeded by an actor whom the princess speedily divorced as a husband, but retained as a dear friend. Finally, she married, this time "for good," an accomplished young Russian rejoicing in the name of "Schewitsch." As for her lovers they were legion, but, as she tells you, she chose them herself, and was not chosen by them, allowing herself all the moral liberty men without loss of reputation permit themselves. In a word, the princess showed herself throughout a consummate mistress of what she calls "the great art of life—to enjoy to the full the scent of the roses and all other gifts of nature, whilst carefully avoiding the thorns."

Very different is the autobiography of Mr. John Wilson, J.P., M.P., "Memories of a Labour Leader" (3), with a difference suggested by the forewords to the volume. For this autobiography of a Primitive Methodist preacher and a Radical Labour Leader is prefaced by an introduction by the Dean of Durham and by an appreciation by the Bishop of Durham! And the striking testimony of these Anglican dignitaries to the worth of this Nonconformist preacher and trade unionist agitator and organiser is borne out amply, however indirectly and modestly, in the autobiography itself. I could not help contrasting this life with that of another rolling stone, Mr. Wells' protégé, George Meek: Bath Chairman; for Mr. Wilson is so far from attributing the privations of his childhood and the poverty of his youth to fate and fortune and the general cussedness of things, that he confesses it was altogether to his own ill-steerage that his life in those days was fast bound in shallows and in miseries. You feel even impatient of the moderation with which he speaks of the monstrous class selfishness which in his early days sent labourers to seven years' penal servitude for any attempt to combine, and sent sailors (for Mr. Wilson has been before the mast) to drown in coffin ships for the sake of the insurance. I do not remember ever to have read so modest a record of so manly a life as this autobiography.

Mr. Addison Powell's "Trailing and Camping in Alaska" (4) suggests that there is really no exaggeration in his statement that "Alaska is richer in mineral wealth than all the States of the American Union put together." The book, besides, is a most interesting record of adventures of all kinds with Indians, grizzlies, etc., and of escapes no less thrilling from falls down precipices or crevasses or from being starved or frozen to death The one drawback to the book is the continuous striving of the author to be funny at all costs, often at the cost of intelligibility. If "gaiety without eclipse wearieth," how much more forced and far-fetched smartness!

The unfortunate poet Davidson just before his suicide described Cornwall as "an infernal invention of the Great Western Railway," and judging from Mr. Hugh Walpole's extremely clever "Maradick at Forty" (5) there really must be something uncanny in that county. The effect of the genius loci upon Mr. Walpole's characters seems to be the transformation of the commonplace into the romantic, of the romantic into the idyllic, and, at the same time, of the villainous into the diabolic. Mr. Walpole himself, too, the genius loci has inspired in his exquisite descriptions of this eerie region. Mr. Frank Bullen is not, perhaps, at his best in his three dozen sketches "Told in the Dog-Watches" (6), but he is still Mr. Frank Bullen, the ablest expert we have both practically and with a pen upon his fascinating subject.

Dr. J. Charles Cox, the editor of Messrs. Methuen's well-known series of "Antiquary's Books," is himself the author of the latest volume, "The Parish Registers of England" (price 7s. 6d. net). It embodies the results of researches begun half a century ago, and with the scholarly and accurate treatment of the subject which the author's name assures it presents a vast amount of information of general interest. Many ancient parish registers are not confined to mere records of births, marriages, and deaths, but abound in entries throwing light on the life, customs, and events of the period, and Dr. Cox gives a great number of quaint, curious, and instructive extracts. In a final chapter on the dates and conditions of the registers he refers to the reprehensible carelessness which is still shown by some of the clerical custodians of these invaluable historical documents.

The success of Mr. E. Keble Chatterton's volume on "Sailing Ships and Their Story" has naturally encouraged him to produce a complementary one on "Steamships and Their Story." No doubt there is around the sailing ship a more alluring halo of romance, yet the story of the invention, progress, and development of the steamship is quite as wonderful and interesting, and Mr. Chatterton sets it forth in the most attractive way for the general reader. The book, which is fully illustrated, is published by Messrs. Cassell and Co., price 21s.

Mr. E. Norman Gardiner, M.A., has written a volume on "Greek Athletic Sports and Festivals," which will be issued shortly in Messrs. Macmillan's series of Handbooks of Archæology and Antiquities. The intimate connection of athletics with the whole life of the Greeks should make this work of interest to students of Greek history and art, and in addition it will present an object lesson to those who are concerned about the exaggerated athleticism of the present day and the intrusion of commercialism into almost every branch of sport. The volume will be well illustrated.

Two anthologies which will be especially welcomed by a host of travellers have recently been published by Messrs. Methuen—"The Charm of Switzerland," by Norman G. Brett James, and "Skies Italian," by Ruth Shepard Phelps. Mr. James has made his collection of prose and poetry on Swiss scenery from a wide range of books, old and new, some of them classics, others more or less unknown. "Skies Italian" is a selection of poems about Italy and Italian things and personages, by authors ranging from Dante and Boccaccio to Andrew Lang and Mrs. Meynell; and the quotations are arranged to follow the lines of an imaginary journey from the passes of the Alps to the Plain of Sorrento.

Recent developments in the arts of town planning and house designing at the Hampstead, Esher, Romford, and East Hyde (Hatfield) Garden Suburbs are dealt with in a shilling volume published by Mr. Fisher Unwin. Entitled "Garden Suburbs: Town Planning and Modern Architecture," it contains contributions by Mr. H. H. Baillie Scott, Alderman Thompson, Professor S. D. Adshead, and others, and is profusely illustrated with photographs, plans, and drawings.

Two of Mr. A. C. Benson's works, "The House of Quiet" and "The Thread of Gold," have now been issued in Murray's Shilling Library, and another recent addition to that excellent series of cheap reprints is "The Painters of Florence," by Julia Cartwright (Mrs. Ady).

MUSIC.

THE report that Covent Garden may add Massenet's "Thaïs" to its repertoire before the end of the season is interesting. The work stands fairly late in Massenet's list, having been first produced at the Paris Grand Opera in 1905 with Mme. Alice Verlet, whom we have recently been seeing at His Majesty's, in the title part. It is based on Anatole France's novel, and deals with the conversion of a courtesan by a monk, who, however, accomplished his task, as the unregenerate would put it, not wisely but too well, since having induced her to see the error of her ways and to take the veil he himself falls in love with her, only to find her proof against his pleading. The music is in Massenet's best style, though not characterised by much variety, consisting mainly of dialogue between the two leading characters. Mlle. Destinn will, it is understood, take the title-rôle when the opera is given at Covent Garden, and the part ought to suit her well.

"Les Huguenots" is a work which is falling emphatically into the sere and yellow, and it only survives on account of the fact that it affords opportunities for those "star" casts which rejoice the public almost irrespectively of the particular opera in which they are heard. Last week's performance of the work at Covent Garden was not quite so notable in this respect as some which have been heard in bygone days, though still quite a good one. Among the ladies Tetrazzini and Destinn divided the principal honours (the latter getting the more opportunities of distinguishing herself as Valentine), while Mlle. Edna de Lima deserves a word of praise for her singing as the Page. Among the men Mr. Murray Davey and Mr. Edmund Burke both did well, but Signor Zerola as Raoul was hardly so happy. On Saturday Melba was to have been heard in "La Traviata," but indisposition on her part gave an opportunity instead to Mlle. Lalla Miranda, who in the circumstances acquitted herself very creditably.

At His Majesty's the latest addition to the list has been Strauss's "Die Fledermaus," which was given on Monday. The work is a famous one, which has afforded much enjoyment in its day, but it is beginning to date rather badly now, and matters were not improved by the fact that the performance was by no means so good as most of the others which Mr. Beecham has given us. A heavy British atmosphere instead of one suggestive of Viennese gaiety and mirth obtained, and such wit and humour as the work still retains evaporated in the process of its presentation. Still, for the pleasure of its music alone many will doubtless be glad to have the opportunity of renewing acquaintance with the work. Miss Muriel Terry, Miss Beatrice La Palme, Miss Carrie Tubb, Mr. Joseph O'Mara, and Mr. Walter Passmore took some of the principal parts, and Mr. Hamish McCunn conducted.

While "Feuersnot" has been duly licensed and the date of its performance definitely announced, I understand that it is not yet so certain that "Salome" will be equally successful in running the gauntlet of the Censor. I am told that, though it is hoped that the work may be licensed, no actual decision has yet been come to. Under the present dispensation the Lord Chamberlain himself plays a much more active part than formerly in the decision of doubtful points, and it may be hoped that Lord Althorp may be disposed to adopt a liberal-minded attitude in this particular case.

Recent concerts have not been very remarkable. For his Chopin centenary concert on Saturday Herr Backhaus had a large audience, and played as brilliantly as ever some of the most famous numbers in the master's list, but there is nothing new to be said regarding either the works or his playing of them. A new tenor, calling himself simply "Rafael," who appeared on Friday, proved hardly worthy of his romantic name. On Thursday Mme. Clara Butt made one of her too infrequent appearances in London to introduce a curious song-cycle to words adapted from the Song of Solomon, entitled "Among the Lilies," by Annie D. Scott, of which it is impossible to speak very favourably.

The announcement that a well-known firm of music publishers propose to enter the operatic field by giving a season of opéra comique in the autumn has been received without any particular surprise. Formerly it would have been regarded as a piece of news of the first importance. To-day it is taken quite as a matter of course, so quickly have we become accustomed to the notion of such seasons. Hardly a month passes nowadays, indeed, without the announcement of some such project, though not all of the schemes so projected actually mature. Still, there is reason to believe that in this particular case those behind the project really mean business, and some interesting engagements, including that of Mme. Clara Butt, are already talked of.

I was glad to see a sensible article the other day in the Times—whose Saturday articles on music are, by the way, always worth reading—protesting against the unwritten law whereby all soloists nowadays feel compelled to play and sing from memory. The custom is a very foolish one, in so far as it is made a cast-iron rule, and is responsible not only for an immense amount of totally unnecessary strain on the artists, but also is largely responsible for the lack of variety characteristic of modern concert programmes. Performers play the same works over and over again because they know them, whereas if they played from the notes their field of choice would be enormously extended. It is not the artists only, therefore, but audiences as well who suffer from the present system.

From the New York Musical Courier:—

June is the favourite month for brides and for Mendelssohn's "Da———da———de, da—da—da—da."

But more frequently nowadays it is a case of Wagner's "Da———da———da-da; da———da———da-da."

THE THEATRES.

"Priscilla Runs Away," at the Haymarket.

I AM one of those who have never read the stories by Elizabeth Arnim dealing with Elizabeth and her German Garden, so I went to the Haymarket without any preconceived opinions. I came away thoroughly delighted with Miss Neilson-Terry's youth and charm as the heroine, but mildly wondering why a management which started with such great and non-mercantile ambitions should devote so much energy to staging this pretty-pretty romance and superficial comedy. Priscilla, the charming, wayward daughter of the Grand Duke of Lothen-Kunitz, feels that she is being hustled into a marriage with the Prince of Lucerne. She accordingly runs away with a foolish old tutor and a petulant maid to an English village, where she tries to play the good fairy, and, having made a fearful muddle of things through indiscriminate philanthropy, she goes back and marries her royal lover. That is all that there is in the play, though this little is set forth pleasantly and pithily, with a considerable amount of artless humour. The German scenes irresistibly remind you of "Old Heidelberg," but "Old Heidelberg" is a masterpiece compared with "Priscilla Runs Away," while the two acts in which we see the fascinating Princess now charming and now shocking a number of village types are distinctly thin though amusing enough in a simple way. The authoress, indeed, has written a play which is beautifully adapted for schoolgirls, and I have no particular fault to find with it. My only grievance is that I think Mr. Trench, with his resources, might very well give us something a little more in the modern movement. Having chosen a trifle, though, it is only fair to say that he has presented it in the best possible manner, with an admirable cast. Mr. Charles Maude in the small part of the lover conveys just the right Teutonic touch, and Mr. C. V. France's elderly Grand Duke is excellent. Miss Sydney Fairbrother gives a clever study of the old woman upon whose cottage Priscilla descends, and Miss Agnes Thomas contrives to give a little touch of unconventionality to the hopelessly conventional part of the acrid wife of the vicar. The play rests, however, almost entirely on the capable shoulders of Miss Neilson-Terry, and she is a delight to watch. She is grace personified, amazingly proficient in her art, and at present utterly unspoiled. I fancy that much of the enthusiasm on the first night was appreciation of this clever daughter of a clever house, but there may be a big public for sentimental romance of a rather watery order.

"Miss Elizabeth's Prisoner" at the Lyric.

"Miss Elizabeth's Prisoner," by Robert Neilson Stephens and E. Lyall Swete, was produced originally at the beautiful Imperial Theatre some six years ago. It is not at all a bad little romance, and I hope Mr. Waller will do well with this revival, though I am still hoping that one day he will find a new and good play which will obviate his perpetually falling back on revivals. Of course, there was an enthusiastic "send-off" the other evening, but I have seen so many of these scenes of wild enthusiasm followed by very prompt changes in the programme that I am beginning to doubt their value. Miss Titheradge (the new Miss Elizabeth) is a pretty Loyalist at the time when the soldiers of King George are trying to subdue the American "rebels." Her clash of arms comes with Mr. Waller, who is Captain Harry Peyton, of Lee's Light Horse, and in that capacity wears a very attractive blue uniform. Mr. Waller, having lost his horse, stops at Miss Titheradge's manor house and annexes her favourite steed. He rides away on it despite her indignation, but, being wounded very shortly afterwards, the horse trots home, bringing Mr. Waller helpless on its back. This is Miss Titheradge's chance for revenge. The gallant captain is made her prisoner, and being a vindictive little fury she will have him cured and tended in order that she may hand him over in fine condition to the British hangman. She is not one of those ministering angels who would tend friend and foe alike. When she sees a blue coat she "sees red," and the sands of poor Mr. Waller's life are running out very fast when he adopts a desperate expedient. In half an hour a British force will be at the manor, and the noose will be round his neck. How shall he employ that half-hour? Why, he will make passionate love to the pretty, merciless little devil who is so bent on his destruction, and then her heart may soften. This is what he does with splendid effect, for when the soldiers burst in Miss Titheradge hides her captive, and swears that he has escaped! "Was ever woman in this humour wooed, was ever woman in this humour won." The lady, however, is not won yet, because she learns very soon that Mr. Waller's passion was but feigned, and decides to turn the tables on him and avenge her outraged pride. So the game of cross purposes goes on, but as each by this time is genuinely in love with the other you soon see how matters will end; in fact, you have seen from the very first. No one could be more gallant and ardent than Mr. Waller. The army of maidens in the pit pant with desire to be made love to thus fervently. His splendid conviction carries him triumphantly over many a perilous patch, while Miss Titheradge plays up to him well, though she is not quite strong enough for the big dramatic moments. It is rather a pity that the one British officer in the play, Major Colden, the girl's erstwhile betrothed, should be such a sorry knave. He is a despicable coward, who denies his uniform, strikes unarmed men, and even refuses to draw his sword to avenge a slur cast on his lady, but, after all, this serves to show up the admirable qualities of the American! Mr. Herbert Jarman now plays the elderly farmer who has buried two wives, and hopes, "please Heaven," to bury a third, but as this third is to be Miss Lottie Venne I hope he will be long in so doing, because Miss Venne's middle-aged ingénues with matrimonial proclivities are always delightful. She can put more expression into a single word than almost any actress on our stage. In the end, of course, she is a prisoner, too—bound, like Miss Elizabeth's Prisoner, in love's toils. This trite phraseology runs off your pen when you are dealing with pretty and thrilling but still trite romance of this order.

* * * * * *

Mr. Herbert Sleath has for the moment gone over to the halls, and, supported by Mr. W. F. Grant and company, is appearing at the Tivoli in a sketch called "The Littlest Girl." If you have tears you must prepare to shed them when you see this trifle, and I saw a whole flood being shed. Mr. Sleath plays the Hon. Jimmy Leyland, and it is his business to soften the heart of a stern parent and make him receive into his arms the little daughter of an erring wife. The child is playing a fairy in a pantomime or something of the sort, and Mr. Leyland Sleath, taking pity on her youth and innocence, carries her off to the house of the stern parent, who will have nothing to do with her because of her mother's sin, and pleads so eloquently for her that the father gives in and weeps, and if you are susceptible you weep also. The sketch you will perceive is very slight, but Mr. Sleath manages to compress a good deal of feeling into it.

* * * * * *

Miss Fannie Ward is appearing at the Palace in an amusing trifle called "An Unlucky Star." Here you have what appears to be at first an entirely conventional one-act melodrama dealing with the eternal trio—husband, wife, and lover. Matters are progressing well, and the lover is standing with a revolver waiting to pick off the husband as he breaks in upon them, when an excited gentleman stands up in the auditorium and roundly abuses the actors for letting the situation drop. He is the "author," and, regardless of the audience, he persists in making the actors go back and take the big situation over again. In the end all lose their tempers, the play is never finished, and the curtain falls on the stage hands clearing the stage. This is quite the latest thing in dramatic sensations, and it delights the house, as glimpses behind the scenes, whether real or pseudo, always do. Mr. Arthur Prince is still in the bill, and is a deserved favourite, for he is a marvellous ventriloquist; while I was glad to renew acquaintance with those wonderful dancers Mlle. Anna Pavlova and M. Michael Mordkin.

* * * * * *

"Society" is the latest of the Robertsonian revivals at the Coronet, and for this Mr. Edward Sass, Mr. Arthur Wontner, and Mr. W. G. Fay have joined the already excellent company. This season, I am glad to see, has proved an enormous success.

* * * * * *

I had known for some time that Captain Robert Marshall's health left no ground for hope of his recovery, but I record his death with very keen regret, for we have not too many writers of witty comedy. He sprang into fame with that delightful extravaganza "His Excellency the Governor," written, I believe, when he was aide-de-camp to the Governor of Natal. He followed this up with "A Royal Family," "The Duke of Killiecrankie," and "The Second in Command," which were all very successful, and though a subsequent play or two lacked the wit and spirit of these, one hoped much from a new piece upon which he was at work. He was only forty-seven, and will be most sincerely mourned by a large circle of friends.

SPORT.

NEWMARKET AND SANDOWN PARK.

THE hollow defeat of Lemberg in the Grand Prix shows that the three-year-olds are not the wonders which some puffing writers have proclaimed them to be. The running in our own races has not been calculated to strengthen the theory that the various winners are animals of the most superlative excellence. Every season there is a chorus of jobbing eulogies about the three-year-olds. It is announced that since his defeat at Longchamps Lemberg has been backed for the St. Leger at 2 to 1, which was the price reported to have been taken about the Derby winner after Ascot. The backer must be a most infatuated noodle, for Lemberg's stamina can only be regarded as exceedingly doubtful after his collapse in the Grand Prix. If his defeat were really due to the fact that he cannot do any good on heavy ground, then surely it will be only common prudence to wait until the St. Leger day before backing him, as the course at Doncaster may be a swamp. The price alleged to have been taken about Lemberg is altogether preposterous, for the St. Leger now appears to be a very open race.

It has been funny to notice the complacent fatuity with which a number of gobemouches appear to have accepted the French assurances that their three-year-olds are a wretched lot, and that they had no hope of winning the Grand Prix. I have seen this kind of trash in print over and over again. Any person must be deeply sunk in gullibility who pays attention to any French discourse which has to do seriously with les affaires. Alexandre Dumas defined any kind of real business as "les affaires, c'est l'argent des autres." This was described by a cynical Englishman as really meaning that business is other people's money, and business aptitudes signify the systematic processes by which A makes the money of B his own. Another year less importannce may be attached to the unfavourable reports which are always sent over from Paris about the French three-year-olds.

A sporting writer, referring to Greenback, states that Lord Villiers is the grandson of Lord Jersey, who owned Bay Middleton, whereas he is his great grandson.

Another writer states that the owner of Bay Middleton "was a son of the heiress who eloped with Lord Westmorland." Lord Jersey was not the son of the heiress, but her son-in-law. He married Lady Sarah Fane, the daughter of Lady Westmorland, and she inherited the immense fortune of her grandfather, Mr. Child. Lord Jersey died in 1859, and his eldest son (who married the daughter of Sir Robert Peel) survived him only for a few weeks. Sarah Lady Jersey (the heiress) died in 1867.

One of the sporting papers goes into hysterics about "King George's first winner" when referring to the success of Royal Escort at Sandown Park. Only a mooncalf would indite such balderdash. King George had no more concern with Royal Escort's race than King Alfred. The horse is leased for the present season to Lord Derby, and it would have been just as reasonable to have described Minoru's Derby as "Mr. Hall Walker's race." Under the circumstances it is a piece of stupid impertinence to write of Royal Escort's race as "the first success of the new King," for any one would suppose that the horse had run in the Royal colours, and that Lord Derby's lease is all moonshine.

There was only a poor field for the July Stakes, and the race was principally notable for the defeat of three animals full of the very best running blood, for which extravagant prices were paid last year. Romeo, by Flying Fox out of Glare, who cost 3,300 gns. as a yearling, again disappointed his friends, but he ran better than at Ascot, and he will improve on this form later on. Lælia, by Gallinule out of Edmee, who finished third, was purchased last July for 4,100 gns. Unplaced was Porphyrio, by Gallinule out of Flair (her first foal), and his price was 3,500 gns. These animals all came from the stud of the late Sir Daniel Cooper. St. Anton, who won for Mr. L. de Rothschild, had ran badly for the New Stakes at Ascot, and he was not fancied for the July Stakes. I expect that before the season is over two of the animals which were beaten by St. Anton will prove themselves to be superior to him. I had expected that Persephone would win the July Stakes, but Lord Derby's filly has been amiss, and she is to be reserved for the Mersey Stakes at Liverpool on the 20th., and she will probably run for the Rous Memorial Stakes at Goodwood. If Seaforth starts for the Mersey Stakes he will have to give 17 lb. to Persephone. Cellini, who was beaten at Ascot, was a great Newmarket tip, but it was decided to reserve him for the £5,000 stake at Sandown Park on the 16th. Porphyrio evidently wants time, and the best policy would be to reserve this colt for the Middle Park Plate, instead of knocking him about in races in his present backward condition. Wise Virgin's next engagement is the Richmond Stakes at Goodwood, but she cannot be properly fit so soon, and it would be more advisable to keep her for the Gimcrack Stakes at York.

Bridge of Earn must be in great need of a rest, and it was foolish in the extreme to make him favourite for the Hare Park Handicap so soon after his severe race in the Northumberland Plate and considering that he was clearly overweighted. King's Champion won easily at the finish, and Lord Ellesmere's uncertain horse gave his best running on this occasion, whereas at Ascot his performance in the Visitors' Handicap was a very poor one.

Perrier won the Duke of Cambridge Handicap cleverly enough from Orphah, but there was but little merit about the performance, as the first and second were greatly favoured in the weights. Perrier was receiving 17 lb. from Electra, 16 lb. from St. Victrix, and a stone from Perseus III. This is the first race which Perrier has carried off since he beat Jonathan for the Newmarket Biennial at last year's Craven Meeting. Every one must remember the persistent manner in which Perrier was written up for the Derby in the spring of 1908, when all kinds of mendacious nonsense was printed about him. Truth correctly described him as a very moderate animal, during the same week in which one of the papers audaciously asserted that he was considered by the stable to be better than Persimmon!

Sunstar, who was heavily backed for the New Stakes at Ascot, started favourite for the Exeter Stakes, and won with something in hand from Canvas Back, while Borrow was unplaced. Sunstar did not appear to run kindly, and he seems to have a temper like some others of the Sundridges. It will be interesting to see how Sunstar gets on in the Lavant Stakes at Goodwood if he meets St. Nat, Night Rider, and Wrinkler in that race.

The Princess of Wales Stakes was apparently a good thing for the Netheravon stable, and Ulster King won in a canter, improving vastly on his Ascot form, as in the Prince of Wales Stakes Greenback gave him 5 lb. and a clever beating. It was a very hollow race, and Ulster King won in the same easy style as did Dark Ronald last year. Admiral Hawke was much fancied, but it was chimerical to expect him to win over this severe course, and he was giving Ulster King 8 lb. Great Peter was a strong Newmarket tip, as the best judges there would not hear of Admiral Hawke, considering (very rightly) that he could not stay the course. Moscato secured second money, which was not a difficult achievement in such a poor field.

It is funny and instructive to read the croakings about the decline in the Princess of Wales' Stakes having commenced when the Jockey Club decided to exclude three-year-olds from that race. When this most idiotic alteration in the conditions was made Truth was alone in pointing out that the change must seriously injure the race in every way. On the other hand, the sporting papers brayed a chorus of applause in accordance with their almost invariable custom when noticing Jockey Club so-called "reforms." The exclusion of the three-year-olds simply smashed the race, which afterwards excited no general interest whatever, but a large sum has been wasted on it every year which might have been better employed.

The harum-scarum admirers of Sunbright, who described him in the spring as probably the best three-year-old of the season, must have been painfully disconcerted by his public performances. It certainly seemed inconceivable that St. Victrix could give Sunbright 21 lb. in the Ellesmere Stakes, but the three-year-old palpably "turned it up," and I suspect he wants a long rest. Sunbright has not been cleverly managed as a three-year-old, and in the autumn he ought to be kept for mile races, as it is evident that he cannot stay. There was a fine race for the Princess Plate and Pietri justified my anticipation that he would soon improve on his Ascot form by beating Nerestan, who had finished second to Seaforth for the New Stakes, and he was now regarded as a good thing. Pietri is not yet at his best. Mr. L. de Rothschild has an excellent prospect of winning both the Richmond Stakes and the rich Prince of Wales' Sweepstakes at Goodwood.

Lord Derby has a very nice colt in Bridge of Allan, own brother to Bridge of Canny. He was engaged in forty-four races as a yearling. Bridge of Allan is at present backward, and I do not expect he will be seen in winning form before Goodwood, where he is engaged in the Rous Memorial Stakes, or he may very likely be kept for the Gimcrack Stakes at York.

Montreal is a good-looking colt who was very backward when he ran in the spring. He is half-brother, by Gallinule, to Polar Star, so he certainly ought to race. Montreal has accepted for the Eclipse Stakes. Mr. Prentice, however, may prefer to keep Montreal for the St. George Stakes of £2,000 at Liverpool, as his colt has an allowance of 10 lb in that race. Lemberg is not likely to be sent to Liverpool, and if he did start he would have to give 22 lb. to Montreal.

There was much vituperative braying against the Manton stable after the Ascot Stakes because Elizabetta, who started favourite, was third, while Declare, their other candidate, won in a canter, his price being 100 to 8. The howlings on the subject are perfectly idiotic. The two horses belong to different owners, and they had not been tried together. There are a great number of people connected with racing who think that every arrangement in life, let it be made in what way it will, is really made with the intention of getting the better of somebody. There is an amazing idea that it is the duty of owners and trainers to make public all the details of their business arrangements for the benefit of the great herd of backers. However, it is inconceivable that any owner or trainer endowed with one grain of common sense would pay the very slightest attention to these crazy complaints, which are wholly unjustifiable and absolutely unworthy of notice. Owners pay all the expenses of racing, but it appears to be thought that their sole object should be to run their horses in accordance with the calculations of the betting public. There are some sporting writers who appear to be in full sympathy with these fantastical illusions.

Next week will be divided between Newmarket and Sandown Park. There is not much of interest in the Second July programme. There are sixty entries for the Soltykoff Stakes on Tuesday, and St. Nat ought to win, for he can surely beat St. Anton. Mr. S. Joel's colt will have much the worst of the weights with maidens, but the race is run over a very easy course. There are only forty entries for the Chesterfield Stakes on Thursday, the conditions for both this race and the July Stakes being hopelessly antiquated, and they ought to be altered. Night Rider will be able to give 7lb to Romeo. The Dullingham Plate of £1,000 is not likely to bring out Bayardo, and Apache or Royal Realm may win. Lemberg certainly will not start for the Zetland Plate, which should be won by Decision or Charlemont. Charles O'Malley can win the Midsummer Stakes, and in his absence Admiral Hawke may be able to stay the B.M.

The Eclipse Stakes at Sandown Park on Friday may bring out Lemberg, Neil Gow, Ulster King or Placidus, Perseus III., Mirador, Santa Fina, Rochester, San Antonio, and Merry Jack. I expect that Neil Gow will win this race if he is all right on the day. Lord Rosebery's colt meets Lemberg at even weights. The original entry for this race fills nearly eight pages of the Book Calendar, and it included Bayardo and Fils du Vent. St. Nat and Night Rider are both left in for the Great Kingston Plate. There are sixty-six acceptances for the National Breeders' Produce Stakes, of £5,000, on Saturday, and the best representative of public form is Cellini, who has been twice beaten, but he was very highly tried. This colt is half-brother, by Cyllene, to Electra and Siberia. He has been in reserve for this race since Ascot. Last year Neil Gow was a really good thing for this race, but Sun Angel started favourite.

CHAMPIONSHIPS AND HENLEY.

After this week there will be a lull in championships. Golf, lawn tennis, running, and Henley with the rowing have been keeping the lover of outdoor sports busy, especially between the April showers last week. The crews training for Henley should have come on a great deal in their watermanship. There have been strong head winds, and plenty of water has been coming down the river. This experience must have proved invaluable to the younger oarsmen, especially to those who are used to the sluggish waters of the Cam. And yet quieter weather would have improved oarsmanship. Certainly the last ten days of practice have been as persistently wet and rough as any that have ever been known. For the sake of the regatta one can only hope that it will be brighter and calmer than when one is writing. To go to Henley during the final week of practice would do those folk good who are for ever gibing and jeering at Leander for commandeering oarsmen. They would discover that only in their journalistic imagination is this villainy committed. But this imagination has had such a long run that to many it has become an accepted fact.

Despite its traducers Leander has done and will do a lot for English rowing. It is the club that unites old university oarsmen from Oxford and Cambridge. To them the doings of the club crew is a matter of greatest interest. Nor, indeed, are metropolitan crews less interested, even though their interest has been at times tinged with a little jealousy. But Leander does more than provide a crew. The club provides coaches. During the past fortnight at Henley the best coaches have been taking college crews from both universities impartially. The old Oxonians (C. K.

Phillips and W. F. C. Holland) have been primarily in charge of Pembroke, Cambridge, and Leander; Captain Willis, the old Etonian and Leander coach, has, with them, been helping other college crews. The best of the old brigade are drawn together by the fine headquarters Leander has established. They are the teachers of the best traditions of English rowing, and but for Leander they would be missing during these days of practice at Henley. College crews go to learn oarsmanship at Henley, and the much slandered Leander teaches all, including metropolitan crews, if they need help. But the latter crews cannot get to Henley in time. They need good coaching badly. Tradition alone compels London to send a crew for the Grand. One admires their sportsmanship and deplores their oarsmanship. Thames have been watched for some time by the Belgian, Mr. Van Waerden. They are not a Belgian crew. They have proved themselves very fast for the half distance, but Magdalen will hold them and row them down. St. John's, Oxford, at the end of the practice showed promise of return to last year's form.

The extra day's racing is a tremendous strain on the exiguous finances available for the authorities. And yet I cannot help thinking those very authorities are somewhat to blame. True they have to compete with club enclosures. But a guinea subscription gives an entrance to the enclosure for all four days. This is cheap, and if properly advertised this advantage should be a source of revenue. Some drastic measures will be necessary to put money matters on a sound footing. The public expect everything for nothing, and power will have to be obtained to charge gate money for those who use the river. It is for the pleasure boats that the stream is boomed. That is where the expense comes in. The public in their skiffs and punts give nothing to Henley Regatta funds. They expect everything for nothing, and they have not sufficient sporting spirit to subscribe voluntarily. They are very patriotic about British rowing. To show their social superiority they cheer madly for Eton. But as for sending a subscription to the regatta funds, that is a very different matter. They never have done so and never will do so. But they show they are well connected. They blame Lloyd George. He is their excuse.

The lawn tennis finals at Wimbledon were spoiled by the weather. As was generally anticipated, Wilding, aged twenty-seven, beat a man sixteen years his senior by three sets to one, and by a majority of twelve points only in those four sets. It was age that told its tale. Wilding has beaten Brookes. In this year's competition at Wimbledon he beat Wright. He does not lose his head when things are going against him. He has learned the strategy of tennis, and he has realised what a drain on a man's resources five hard sets are. The tennis was as good as one could wish to see. Gore's driving earlier in the match was terrific. He also volleyed more than usual. Here was a man who had played against the Renshaws and Pim defending his title with a vigour that would have told a different tale had the game been three sets instead of five. His vigorous recovery in the first set might well have upset a player with less experience than Wilding. Wilding played brilliantly. Gore played as finely as he has ever done, perhaps better. In his forty-third year, he is the finest English player, and probably the best player in the world has only just beaten him. Wilding had had a terrific match with Beals Wright. Then his stamina and strategy had pulled him through; he forced Beals Wright to play himself out in the first three sets. Wilding certainly deserves his championship. He followed this success up by partnering Ritchie and beating Gore and Roper Barrett, an ancient pair whose joint ages are nearer ninety than eighty. The losers utterly failed to show any combination, and were easily beaten. The winners had had all their work cut out to beat the Powells in the earlier rounds. The final of the All England Plate was finished in a downpour of rain, Gobert beating Davson. And so ended another interesting Wimbledon spoiled by rain.

The Eton and Harrow match promises to be very interesting this year. Harrow have done well in their matches. They have seven of last year's team, a good fast bowler in Earle, and a medium-paced bowler in Hillyard. Monckton is quite a fair wicket-keeper, and their fielding is good. Eton have a promising new bat in Holland, and Clark's lobs and A. I. Steel's (son of A. G. Steel) leg breaks may easily upset the other side. The bowling of both teams is above the average.

Considering the vile weather, there was a good attendance at the Amateur Athletic Championship meeting at Stamford Bridge. But of all the depressing grounds in the kingdom it is about the worst. The empty banked-up seats and tiers for football matches and the absence of any place where one can get about to see old friends makes the place cheerless and comfortless. It looks like a deserted arena. However, on the heavy track some fast times were done. The inside berth in the Quarter and Two Hundred and Twenty was rather a disadvantage, the going was so heavy. Ramsdell, the American, won the sprints in good time by inches from Walker, the South African, and Haley, of the Herne Hill Harriers. The winner is a huge man over 6 ft. 2 ins. high, and weighing over 14½ stone. He is certainly the heftiest sprinter that has ever been seen on a cinder track. The other racing was interesting. Baker, the Cambridge miler, ran with bad judgment, as he ran himself out in the last stretch. Voigt, of Manchester, won. Reed thoroughly deserved his win in the Quarter, and in the Four Miles Hill upset a warm favourite in Scott. Anderson, the Oxford hurdler, did even time on the sodden ground, and beat Healey, of the Blackheath Harriers, by inches. Except for Horgan's win in the Weight, the field events were miserably poor. Something must be done to stimulate this branch of sport. The Hammer was won with a throw just over 117 ft., and the High Jumpers failed to clear 5 ft. 9 ins. A Hungarian and Belgian were first

At Sunningdale, Mitchell, the artisan golfer from Ashdown Forest, won the Golf Illustrated Gold Vase—open for amateur competitors—with two very fine rounds on a day when the wind was upsetting the play of many of the cracks. Captain Hutchison failed in his putting, and Hilton's chances were spoiled by a couple of bad holes. The winner, who is a very long driver, was chosen for England this year, and got into the semi-final in the championship. Angus Hambro, M.P., five strokes worse, was second, and Hilton third. Mitchell's scores were 74 and 76. There were over seventy entries, and Mr. Garden Smith, the editor of Golf Illustrated, is to be congratulated on the admirable way in which he arranged affairs, being well supported by the club officials. After all he has written about the purity of the amateur golfer I wonder his paper should have given such a valuable trophy. Surely a five-pound pot would have been sufficient to stimulate competition, and I have no doubt these amateurs were genuinely shocked at helping to advertise a paper.

A YACHTING SONG.

(After the manner of Swinburne's "Winter in Northumberland.")

Here we go roaming
O'er the seas foaming,
On till the gloaming
Rests in the air:
Here we go darting
While the wind starting
Spoils all the parting
Once in our hair.
Yet, though we hurry
Through the sea's flurry:
Cease we to worry,
Sailors can steer.
Wild winds are wailing,
Still we go sailing
Safe o'er the waves with the speed of a deer.

Now the trained eye sees Far on the high seas
White froth that rises
(Some o'er the boat);
These are sea horses,
Ocean's wild forces,
Like the old Norse's,
Sea Kings afloat!
Down in a hollow
See the yacht follow
Swift as the swallow—
Come! let's go in!
Home to the headland
Back now to bed land,
Cheerful, but weary—and drenched to the skin!

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

THE Daily Mail is to be congratulated once again on its enterprise in offering another £10,000 prize for aviation prowess. Naturally the conditions imposed this time are more arduous than on the last occasion, and I fancy that even a year hence it will take the prize-winner some considerable time to complete such an extensive "course," extending over 1,000 miles altogether, as that which has been mapped out. The conditions seem to provide, however, for a thoroughly sporting contest, with plenty of opportunities for passing and repassing, and if the event does not awaken rare excitement in July next it will be matter for surprise. Every one will hope that this time a British aviator may prove the winner.

It supplies a somewhat curious comment on the recent Home Office order permitting drivers of taxis to smoke on the box even while carrying a fare that the men themselves have been passing resolutions against the rule, and undertaking not to avail themselves of the altogether unnecessary licence accorded. That the drivers should be allowed the solace of a pipe or cigarette while waiting for custom is reasonable enough, but that passengers should be compelled "by administrative order" to swallow their tobacco smoke is another matter altogether, and the aforesaid action of the men would seem to show that their sense of the fitness of things is more acute than that of the official who was responsible for the order.

Foreigners never tire of praising the traffic management of the London police, but observation suggests that, while excellent in some respects, it might easily be improved in others. Take for instance the preposterous amount of latitude allowed to slow traffic. In a really well-regulated community traffic of this sort would not be allowed in certain streets at all. This is the rule adopted, I believe, in New York, where slow-moving carts and vans are absolutely excluded from the leading thoroughfares required for fast traffic. In London slow traffic is not only allowed to use the busiest thoroughfares, but it is not even required to conform to the most elementary rules of the road when doing so. Only the other day I witnessed a heavy motor-van with a trailer attached blocking the whole westward traffic of Regent Street. Motor-'buses, taxis, cars, hansoms, and other vehicles endeavoured in vain to pass it. A demoniacal chorus of horns summoned the driver to give way, but his only answer was a grin of amusement. Evidently he regarded it as the hugest joke imaginable. If the police had done their duty he would not have been permitted to indulge his sense of humour in this misguided fashion.

The episode served incidentally to illustrate two other capital defects in our existing traffic arrangements. The first is the practice of allowing carriages and carts to stand outside shops in such streets as Regent Street and Bond Street, where the traffic is so heavy, and where every inch of space is required for vehicles on the move. Vehicles required to wait should be made to do so down the nearest side street, whence they could be easily summoned when needed. As it is half the congestion in such thoroughfares as those named results from the presence of these stationary vehicles, not one of which ought to be permitted to stand longer than is necessary to put down and take up. The other defect is that involved in the retention of that old bugbear of all traffic reformers—the electric lighting standard in the middle of the road, the effect of which is simply to convert one good wide road into two poor narrow ones. This result was peculiarly well shown on the occasion which I have referred to. If the speedier vehicles could have taken a slight sweep to the right they could have got by the offending motor-wagon easily enough. As it was, the standards rendered this impossible, and so the whole traffic was held up.

The recent decision in the Scottish Appeal Court justifying a motorist who, in approaching a corner turning to the left, moved out to the centre of the road to get a better view of the road he was turning into, seems quite in accordance with common sense. Nominally, he left his own side of the road, but as he was better placed in consequence to deal with any traffic which might be approaching, the Court seems to have wisely held that his action was justified, even though an accident actually followed. The case is one in which the strict rule of the road may be with advantage departed from. Otherwise, the more rigorously the rule were observed the greater would be the danger involved—clearly a reductio ad absurdum.

A somewhat amusing discussion has been proceeding in the correspondence columns of the Autocar, arising out of a complaint of a chauffeur to the effect that he recently put on a Stepney wheel for three lady motorists whom he found in distress by the roadside, and got no tip for doing so. The ladies explained, apparently, that they had "no change," but the chauffeur indignantly asks (or rather his master does for him) why they could not have taken his name and address, and sent him along a trifle afterwards. The suggestion, however, has not commended itself to others, and automobilist Sir Galahads have vied with one another in denouncing the paltry spirit which would look for a material reward in such a case, where, as one gallantly puts it, "a word of thanks and a smile" should be sufficient recompense for any properly constituted male. If therefore both master and man do not now feel properly ashamed of themselves they certainly ought to.

Yet another device has been brought out for the purpose of giving warning of a deflated tyre. The North British Rubber Company, makers of the Clincher tyres, are the sponsors in this case, and the device forms an integral part of the valve apparatus itself. By a clever arrangement of springs and valves a whistle is caused to sound when the air pressure inside the tube falls below a certain predetermined point, and thereby gives warning to the unhappy motorist that he must tarry awhile and look into matters. That whistle would never be a welcome sound, but better this than to run deflated and fling figurative sovereigns into space. To continue under these conditions is emphatically a case of where ignorance is not bliss.

Messrs. Clement Talbot, Limited, may be forgiven a little crowing over their recent successes at Saltburn. Five firsts, three seconds, five cups, and eight medals made up certainly an excellent bag for one morning's work. Moreover, the company add: "On examination the three seconds showed that in two of these cases it was a 15-h.p. Talbot behind a 32-h.p. competitor, a difference in horse power which leaves the Talbot with honours even in defeat."

WOMAN.

THE TELEPHONE GIRL AT WORK.

THERE is a story of a telephone girl in a big office who went to a doctor with a complaint that her nerves were out of order. "I have got to such a pitch," said she, "that when I kneel down to say my prayers at night I begin with 'Are you there?'" A good deal has recently been heard about the nervous strain on the operators in the exchanges. There is no doubt, on the one hand, that much strain is involved in the work, nor, on the other, that there has been a great deal of exaggeration in the reports circulated. I had the privilege the other day of being shown over the G.P.O. Central and City Exchanges, with a view to finding out exactly what are the conditions of work. One may begin by saying that the Post Office looks after its operators with downright fatherly care; that everything is done, in the first instance, to select fit and suitable girls, and, in the second, to keep them fit and make them expert, and what remains of nervous trial is just so much as it is hardly possible to obviate.

On the top floor of a great building in Carter Lane is a school fitted up with model switchboards, etc., at which for two months girls between sixteen and nineteen are trained to the work of telephone operating. They are not chosen by competitive examination, which is often the means of selecting the minimum of physical fitness at which the doctor will give a certificate; they are selected by the simple means of choosing out from those who apply the girls who seem most suitable. On the same floor with the school is a large restaurant, with windows overlooking a glorious panorama of London. The food served is varied, excellent, and very cheap; the walls, in the small space which is not window, are hung with good photogravures and Oriental plaques; there are flowers on the tables, and the general effect is one of light, air, and cheerfulness. The well-arranged kitchens and sculleries are on the same floor, fitted with every possible modern convenience. About 1,700 meals are served daily, and the money received for them pays for the staff of about fifty and the food itself. The rest is done by the Government.

Underneath is a long L-shaped room, well lighted and ventilated, which, as the door opens, sounds like a cage full of twittering birds. This sound is made by the girls' voices, all saying gently and continuously: "Number, please;" "Gerrard 34567?"; "Gerrard 34567"; "You're through"; "Have they answered?"; "Have you finished?"; "I am very sorry, I can get no reply," and so forth. The girls sit in front of a high switchboard, riddled with little holes, with a mouthpiece strapped on their chests and receivers over each ear. Their hands are occupied incessantly in putting pegs attached to electrical cords into the holes to make connections. With practice they learn in an almost miraculous manner which hole means which number, and their movements are of lightning quickness. No bells ring; the operator is informed of a call by the glowing of a little opalescent lamp; and the progress of that call is conveyed by various combinations of little lamps. The three minutes' limit is automatically registered, and when the lamps go out the touching of a little key records the call of the subscriber in one place downstairs, and in another its place in the number of calls dealt with by the operator. Incidentally, the operator is thus guarded from overwork, for when she receives more than 150 calls in a minute the supervisors begin to watch her; when she gets up to 200 they watch her still more closely; and at 220 her business is divided with somebody else. On another side of the room sit the girls who are taking calls from other exchanges. Their work is lighter, for they are dealing with experienced operators instead of the public, and there are not so many combinations of little lamps to watch.

In other parts of the building are the rest-room, a pleasant and quiet place of easy chairs; the sick-room, where cases of faintness and illness are attended to; the register-rooms, which are a marvel of complicated wiring; and so forth. It takes as long to build an exchange as it does to build a Dreadnought, and costs about £100,000.

In the matter of pay, salaries start at 7s. while the girl is in the school, and go up to 28s., at which she is a supervisor—that is, she walks round the exchange room helping and over-looking the operators, taking on any truculent subscriber, relieving any girl who is feeling ill or is overworked, and so on. There are also one or two posts from £150 to £250 a year for chief supervisors. The hours are forty-eight in the week; that is, eight and a-half daily, with a short Saturday. An hour is allowed for lunch and a quarter of an hour for tea. To the lay mind it seems nothing short of a miracle to see how thoroughly the operators are at home with their big switchboards and their little lamps, and the way in which they will watch four or five calls at once, and throw the pegs unerringly into the right little hole. This is, of course, a matter of practice almost entirely, and becomes mechanical, but there is no doubt that it must fray the nerves more or less to sit in the same position, unable to turn round or look up, for three hours at a stretch, listening to little voices, watching little lamps, and deftly making communications all the time. Consequently the telephone operator's nerves ought to be good to begin with.

On the whole, the girls were suitably and even prettily dressed; nearly all were neat, and the majority had beautifully tended hair, with that look of vitality in it which does not remain long if there is anything seriously wrong with the health. Many were rather pale, but none of them seemed languid. As a matter of fact, some of the operators get very keen on their work, and one of them, who could not make an important connection recently, was so upset that she broke down—a fact which in itself proves that the nerves are apt to get a little out of control.

There are, however, a great many occupations which try the nervous system. That is the inevitable drawback of modern wage-earning, and will never be wholly evitable. The mechanical exchange which has been tried in America, Sweden, and Germany, by means of which the subscriber himself gets into communication with the number he wishes to ring up, will, no doubt, when perfected, solve the question of the telephone girls in the rather drastic manner of throwing them out of work; but that will not be yet awhile, and in the meantime one can say that for those who are not neurotic the life of a telephone operator has many advantages, and she is looked after and cared for as few workers are. A committee has been investigating the whole question of the conditions of work, and Mr. Herbert Samuel says that the suggestions they have made are being carefully considered. Consequently the hours of service, intervals of rest, and so forth will probably be rearranged, thus removing still more of the so-called grievances.

TO VERA:

Bidding her gang her ain gait.

Of old, my Vera, I would meet you proudly,
  Could scarce repel the pleasurable tear;
And as I watched you, quoted, often loudly:
  "Vera incessu patuit, the dear!"

For in your walk lay something calm and splendid,
  Something suggesting 'presence"—and a swing.
No words of mine can tell how beauty blended
  With pride and grace and all that sort of thing.

Where now the feet that moved in measured ripples?
  (Just one more hop; you nearly reached me then!)
I see you come, a cripple among cripples,
  Tied to the wheels of "Fashions—1910."

Enough, your plight, to move some modern Perseus,
  With whom Distressful Beauty disagrees,
To grasp his sword (for which there's many a worse use)
  And cut the knot that grips you at the knees.

Till that bright day forgive me if I'm surly;
  I cannot feign a gladness I have not;
And for our next appointment, oh! come early,
  Taking a taxi to the very spot!

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Tuesday.—To go or not to go, that was the question, and Nita solved it by saying that as her sojourn in the East had deprived her of the pleasure for two years she must be taken to the Theatrical Garden Party. And taken she was, regardless of expense, for we investigated everything and as many people as we could possibly manage in the time. We had tea and strawberries at three tents, joined the eager crowd round the hat-trimming competition, where Mrs George Alexander proved herself a judge—and "a good judge, too"—in a hat of black net, satin-hemmed and garlanded with black iris; watched the cricket matches, and yielded to the strenuous persuasions of Brandon Thomas to be introduced to "The Pick of Oakum." On our path to these pleasures we met every guiding star of the stage. There was Phyllis Dare, looking sweet in a hat with pink roses, and Gertie Millar, in a dress of grey cretonne veiled in ninon, with a broadly turned-up brim to her hat, which was lined with black rucked satin. Zena Dare wore a pearl grey coat, with purple flowers at her waist and in the front of her black hat. Emmie Wehlen was selling post-cards the while she exploited a little cap of pink frilled with lace and tied under her fascinating chin; while Nina Sevening had selected green for her hat and her dress, and Marie Löhr was a bewitching circumstance in white with a crinoline cap with pendant strings and a bunch of erect feathers at one side; and Pauline Chase was severely "simple with a dimple," in navy blue and white striped serge and a fitting black cap.

I saw a promising scholar in the dramatic school, who had evidently taken her dress degree, in a frock of pale pink, with broadly embroidered hems and bodice, piped with black satin over a little chemisette of Cluny lace Her belt was of patent leather, and her hat of pink crinoline, garlanded with roses and lined with black satin.

It was a brave and merry show, and whetted our appetite for the theatre, so that it was impossible to resist the Haymarket in the evening. Here, as I watched Miss Neilson-Terry, I thought how often I had heard Sir Henry Irving describe her aunt, Ellen Terry, as "a God-gifted creature"; and that is what this girl is, delightfully beautiful the while, and amazingly clever.

Her prettiest frock was the first one, made in white, and held in about the knees with glittering beads, with lines of the same bordering the little low berthe. Her hair was a mass of curls low down at the back, with a plait straight across the front whereon rested a diamond coronet. The coat in which she does her running away with such amusing results was made of grey cloth, with a large square collar of cloth and satin, and her hat was of pale dull pink, trimmed with wings of grey, pink, and mauve. All these were hall marked "Paquin," and reminding me that the sale there commences July 4 and is amongst the opportunities to be grasped firmly.

The house was full of the old brigade watching with interest this newest and most adorable recruit, and Miss Julia Neilson was a proud mother in an excellent black gown. The hall resounded afterwards with the verdict, "Isn't she delicious!"

There was a beautifully dressed woman who cloaked late and amiably stood with her back against the wall so that I might fully observe the details of her very novel gown, which was of grey charmeuse, with the top part of the skirt and the bodice in black satin, the whole veiled with grey chiffon bordered with white satin, and further embellished with grey and mauve embroidery, mauve satin encircling the waist.

At the theatre.

Wednesday.—I took Virginia to tea at the Club, and met Sydney, who had come from the wedding of Basil Foster and Miss Brogden, where Father Vaughan had preached persuasively that divorces were not made in Heaven, and had drawn tears of sympathy from the guests, who included every famous and lovely dancer and songstress in musical comedy.

Later I went into 39, Dover Street to investigate Paquin's bargains. I found much to verify that description. A thickly ribbed ivory redingote dress of shantung well braided and with sleeves showing a touch of green, and a blouse of chiffon beneath its deep revers, was a noble sacrifice; another was a black kilted voile with globular gold buttons, and yet another was a prune-coloured linen with distinctive Paquin notes in the blue and white buttons, and the black velvet bands and the blue linen collar. A pink tussore coat and skirt were liberally decked with coarse hand-made lace; and a black evening dress was a marvel of moderation at £22, with its net overskirt embroidered to the knees in spikes of jet, and its décolletage of white chiffon adorned to match. A cerise and black foulard, veiled with black, with bands of Saxe blue on the bodice, had irresistible charms; and a pigeon's breast-coloured chiffon, embroidered in tiny blue beads, was an alluring creation under its reduced circumstances.

Thursday.—Love's labour lost all chance of being appreciated in the grounds of St. Dunstan's Lodge this afternoon, whither I hopefully wandered to hearken to "A Masque" in honour of our rare and precious poet William Shakespeare, and incidentally to promote funds for the National Theatre. Our rare and precious weather intervened with signal irreverence. The wind and the rain howled and hissed the noble band of famous actors and actresses into inaudibility, and Fame seemed as Infamy, and Poetry as Prose, and History as Imagination, and one frail mortal sought a mackintosh and a wise spirit evoked an umbrella, while shadows and figures shivered beneath their diaphanous robes and doubtless wished themselves immortal indeed. Even Lady Tree, whose draperies of inharmonious reds were, with her usual sense of beauty, blended into perfect harmony, was hard put to it to retain her reputation for wearing flowing garments and veils with superlative grace. Woebegone looked the pretty chintz petticoat and silken sacque of the close-capped flower-seller, whose wet wares faded by the wayside; and dainty martyrs in chiffon bravely offered—and sold—sodden programmes; and I sadly watched disaster approach and befall a grey ostrich feather in a satin-lined turban hat. Sic transit gloria Thursday, but there are also to-morrow and Saturday, when the show is to be repeated.

At home, I found Lilian, who was drinking my tea and "enthusing" over the sale at Selfridge's, an establishment where she spends most of her mornings and many of the afternoons. She finds the bargains there now quite wonderful, and was rejoicing over an evening dress of ivory lace and Saxe blue satin with black and silver embroidery, which she had bought for £4; the same most truly moderate cost having tempted her to acquire a bronze-green meteor crêpe with an embroidered bodice and gold net yoke. She urged me to an immediate inspection of a black lace dinner gown with double flounces resting on bands of green moiré, of the ermine scarves at 65s., of some silk crêpe de chine blouses at 8s. 9d., and some no less remarkable attractions in ostrich feather collarettes, and boas from 10s. 6d. The place appears to be an Eldorado of desirable opportunities.

Monday.—Henley Regatta is a festival no longer to be trifled with; it must be met in a most becoming spirit, and, bound by stringent regulations of economy, I attended Jays' sale, in which policy I seemed to have been forestalled by many other deplorably greedy members of my sex. I could scarcely get into the doors, and the rush suggested that garments were being distributed free, gratis and for nothing.

Definitely I found things cheap, notably tailor-made costumes at eight guineas, and I secured a capital specimen in black, the only one, I believe, left by that selfish crowd, who had snatched the few at ten o'clock in the morning. It was of fine serge bound with braid. Further, I acquired a black and white striped cotton corduroy coat and skirt, eminently suitable for the Regatta, with buttons of white piqué and revers of brown and white cretonne—most original, and bound to look it when completed by a hat of brown garlanded with white flowers.

I met Joan selecting wisely for five and a half guineas a hand-tucked Princess dress of pale blue muslin, and I persuaded her to a consideration of a blue and white foulard with the top and kimono-shaped sleeves of white chiffon braided in soutache of varied blues for eight and a half guineas.

There were some gorgeous evening gowns, which never cost less than fifty guineas, marked down to fifteen and twenty. A réséda green and blue shaded grenadine over black satin with a drapery of fine black net traced with gold and steel and crystal beads on the bodice was a gorgeous example of the height of magnificence and the depths of economy. So, too, was a gown of biscuit-coloured chiffon over a foundation of meteor crêpe, with a hem of royal blue velvet about the low neck, and an elaborate design of biscuit-coloured pearls on every perceivable hem. A wonderful combination of colour was a cerise satin veiled with cornflower blue with tassels of blue and crimson dangling from the draped bodice. A bargain for eleven guineas showed the union of meteor crêpe in blue with a spotted foulard hem; and an evening coat of silver tapestry inter-threaded with lead and silk with monster button-holes of silver braid, lined with pale blue, was very satisfying to my artistic sense, a privilege further accorded to a couple of model hats, which I bought for a pound each, and upon innumerable tea-gowns and blouses, all suffering severely from the common tale of reduction well told again by a black satin coat with an enormous collar and cuffs of white fox fur. This is ideal for the immediate moment, and should be worn over a white satin gown of worthy detail.

Why have I not as much money as I should like to spend on clothes?

Joan reminded me that when I was a very little girl and had to write in a confession book an answer to the question, "What do you want most in the world?" I declared for "Clothes," and to the following question, "And what next?" I further wrote, "More clothes."

"Characters don't alter, they only develop," she murmured sententiously as we sat down to lunch.

Mrs. A.'s Letter-Box.

I have been persuaded to counsel through these columns all wise women who send me their dress difficulties to solve. But their inquiries must be clearly addressed to Mrs. A., "Truth" Office, Carteret Street, S.W.

S. L.—I like for wear beneath a blue serge a petticoat of tussore. There is a good model, finely kilted, with a fringed border on the top flounce, 25/9, at The London Corset Co., 28, New Bond Street, W.

A. A. L.—I do not reply to letters privately, so am using the initials you suggest. The prices you mention are very low, and I should say you would do best by placing your orders with a shop, such as Stagg and Mantle, Leicester Square. Here you can buy everything, and the style is generally good and the cost small.

PUPIL, PEDAGOGUE, AND PARENT.

The profession of parenthood is in these days no sinecure. At this period of the year recurs with unfailing regularity the question, "What shall we do with Betty or Tommy?" And whereas the question of Tommy is fairly simple, Betty's career, in the present fluid state of girls' education, is complicated by a thousand considerations. For Betty is no longer—as was the case in the days of "Magnall's Questions" or "The Child's Guide to Knowledge"—a nonentity in the triangle of forces—Pupil, Parent, and Pedagogue. A Betty of my acquaintance quite recently refused succinctly to go to a well-known school, run on the most modern lines, on the ground that "it was like acting a tract all day." Add to this the views of the Pedagogue, and the plot thickens. For Pedagogues nowadays insist on teaching their pupils something—be it what it may—and the Parent can, therefore, no longer rely on an innocuous pastime, sometimes known as education. Finally, since few of us to-day would venture to be without decided views on pedagogics, the Parent is in the difficult position of trying to reconcile upon entirely insufficient grounds three widely differing points of view of an all-important subject.

The educational ideal was, perhaps, never more varied than it is in the case of girls to-day. Enthusiasts for high-school teaching have come to realise that there is no particular point in making good girls bad boys; that the Victorian ideal is dead and done with can be clearly seen by turning over any old volume of Punch. A combination of the two sounds plausible enough; the difficulty lies in its achievement. For whereas boys go to school as a matter of course, both home and school put in strong claims for the education of girls. The disadvantages of both, as things are, are fairly obvious. The prospect of a governess in the house—and in country districts this is mostly inevitable—is only less discouraging than the now recognised impossibility of finding for £60 or £70 a year—or for that matter for £1,000—all the virtues, graces, and accomplishments summed up in one person. The discipline and independence of school training on the other hand are too often neutralised by the inevitable artificiality of the girls'-school convention. "Crocodile" walking is, to say the least of it, ridiculous, and no one should do a ridiculous thing regularly; the dangers, real and imaginary, of the vile seducer, moreover, impose upon the average school-marm a responsibility against which she is bound to protect herself at all costs, even to such offensive measures as keeping a watch upon correspondence.

It is the exception for mothers to have a definite aim in the education of their daughters. Some of the more advanced start with a noble determination that their girls shall "do something." So nebulous, however, is that something, that the right time never comes to put the theory into practice. In the meantime the girl works hard, passes exams., and ends—by doing the flowers. But, as a mother of four once remarked pathetically to me: "They can't all do the flowers." Much more often a mother has social ambitions, which she expresses in her desire that her girl shall have "nice friends." A good many schools are run solely on the "nice-friend" system, and their chief feature is their expensiveness. With such mothers a "nice friend" achieved is of much more value than erudition in quadratics or the accusative with infinitive. Finally, there is the mother who looks on education as an expensive evil, which, like a temporarily unremunerative investment, may some day bring in a handsome profit.

There are better educational ideals than any of these. The essentials of girls' education, what should be the aim of the teacher, the characteristics, merits and demerits of particular schools—these are questions demanding careful attention, regarding which a word of outside advice and suggestion is frequently useful. In subsequent articles I shall try to deal with them from the standpoint that girls should be regarded neither as girls nor as boys, but as human beings, to be equipped as far as possible as useful members of society.

WORK AND PLAY.

The right use of anachronism is rare, but when it occurs it is effective. Miss Vulliamy, in her Morality Play, which attained such success a couple of years ago at the Court Theatre, and has now been repeated three times at the Guildhall School of Music, introduces no less a quality than Modern Rush. The play, called "Give Heed," traces the Thoughtless Soul from its frivolous youth till it becomes the Thoughtful Soul, full of charity and sympathy, in middle age. The Soul has many adventures, meeting with various wayfarers, such as Fashion, Nature, Honest Labour, and Sense of Humour, who comes to the rescue at a very critical moment. The proceeds were handed over to the Hostel for Preachers, and the performances were under the patronage of Lady Emily Lutyens, the Rev. R. J. Campbell, and other distinguished people.

The two B.P. Girl Guides, whose courageous act in saving a young man from drowning was recently recorded, have received handsome silver crosses from Miss Baden-Powell, their President. They were fully dressed, with skirts and boots, and the bather's body was slippery, but they not only rescued him when he was already very far gone, but used artificial respiration with complete success. The cross is Maltese in shape, and has the badge of the Guides in the centre. It is a trefoil, symbolising the three vows made on entering the Guides. These are: to honour God and the King, to be helpful to others at all times, and to do one good turn to somebody every day. That is why they hold up three fingers when they salute.

An easy and a pleasant way of doing great good and giving great pleasure with very little expense is pointed out by Archdeacon Sinclair, who, on behalf of the Women's Branch of the Social Institutes Union of Girls' Clubs, writes that owing to lack of funds the scheme for a holiday camp for 1,000 girls has had to be abandoned for this year, but that friends who will lend their gardens for an afternoon in July or August, and give a plain tea to fifteen or twenty girls, will be doing much to make up for this disappointment. All that is required is permission to play outdoor games or to sit out of doors, when these hardworked, anæmic girls will get a real holiday and a real change from their stuffy work-rooms. Even when they get a week's holiday there are very few who can afford to go away. So those who will give a little garden-party of this kind should write to Miss Elsie Micholls, at the headquarters of the Union, 4, Portugal Street, Kingsway.

A little while ago the University of Auckland, New Zealand, instituted a Chair of Domestic Science, and an American lady was given the post, apparently in default of any eligible Englishwoman. The lady herself expressed a good deal of surprise. It seems, however, that a little research would have resulted in the discovery of several capable Englishwomen, for Miss Gertrude Rawson, who took Honours in the Tripos when at Newnham, and has since been thoroughly through the courses of Home Science and Household Economics at King's College, has accepted a position at a High School in the North Country. It seems a number of applications have been received for ladies so qualified, and the afternoon recently devoted at the Women's Congress to the discussion of this subject was of real importance.

The housing question becomes more and more acute so far as it concerns the working woman. The difficulty of finding properly regulated places whose rules are yet not restrictive makes life in London very difficult for workers who like society and have not much to spend on it. Various enterprises are being inaugurated to remove this difficulty, while for the very poorest there are a good many lodging-houses, shelters, and casual wards, but not nearly enough. Mrs. Mary Higgs enacted the part of a tramp in order to test these places, and with Mr. Edward Hayward has just brought out an exceedingly interesting summary of the information gathered under the title of "Where Shall She Live?" This question, which must certainly come in for public attention shortly, is dealt with lucidly and thoroughly in the book.

The Artists' Revel which took place at the Botanic Gardens on Monday night was fortunately favoured by delightful weather, and as a consequence the thousand or so artists and their friends present may be congratulated on having enjoyed one of the gayest functions of the season, so ably organised for them by Miss Gladys Baly. Given fine weather, the Botanic Gardens are an ideal spot for a fancy dress ball, and the scene on the lawns when day broke will long be remembered by those present. Dancing in what is to all intents and purposes the open-air does not make for fatigue, and it was five o'clock on Tuesday morning before the revellers went home to breakfast.

Wimbledon has been the centre of attraction lately to every one interested in tennis, and those who have braved the weather to watch the play of the favourites in the All England Championships have been amply rewarded for their courage. To see Mrs. Lambert Chambers and Mrs. Lamplough, at the top of their game, is a liberal education in tennis; and they have not been the only ones worth watching. It is a curious fact, by the way, not hitherto noticed, that in the matter of tennis costume feminine fashions appear for once to have reached finality. Women's costume in most sports varies in some degree from year to year. In tennis it has ceased to do so. One now sees every year the same style of shirt, tie, and skirt. It almost seems to be recognised that there is no room for improvement. And perhaps this is a sound conclusion, for what can look neater or more practical than the white silk "soft collar" shirt, worn with a short, workmanlike skirt of white serge or linen, and white shoes and "woolly" stockings?

NOTES ON NOVELS.

When a plot turns on crystal-gazing and other mysteries no attempt to infuse into it an every-day element is likely to be very successful. "Under Seal of the Confessional" (Everett, 6s.) is a more than usually unsatisfactory attempt to combine the two. Mrs. Coulson Kernahan convinces the reader neither of Rosamunde's flippancy and coldness towards her husband Jules nor of the unpardonable boyishness of Rosamunde's father. The love affairs of the world below stairs, the transformation of the vulgar Nora, the murder of the old priest, and the mystery of M. le Vicaire are all incongruous elements of a plot which has remained unblended.

bounder writes poetry in Tooting, or is it Dulwich? Finally she achieves "Life's Compass" (Alston Rivers, 6s.) by going away with him and eventually presenting him with a son and a daughter he does not want. Needless to say, the book is due to an authoress, Miss Priscilla Craven, who, after the initial mistake of attempting to be advanced, has achieved some clever characterisation. Leigh as a character is by no means badly drawn, and the contrast between her and the bounder is well sustained. The suburban Winnie, legitimate wife of the bounder, is freshly and vividly described, as are also several of the minor characters of the book.

A novel competition seems to act the part of Mæcenas to the budding novelist. Miss Marion Mole's "Vera of the Strong Heart" (Melrose, 6s.) just missed the 250-guinea prize offered by Mr. Andrew Melrose; I can only say that the prize novel must have been very much above the average. "Vera of the Strong Heart" turns on the tie between twin brothers, who have little to recommend them but this tie. The babies get mixed, their father tosses for the heir, the heir is lamed by his brother. Separated for a while, their love turns to hate, only to be reconverted with renewed force. The book is dramatic and elemental; the characters live; Vera of the Strong Heart is one of the most impressive figures it has been my lot to come across in recent fiction.

I do not know why it always falls to the lot of Sir Baronets to have had a past which usually renders their final marriage illegal. Yet, though Sir Roland begins to look worried early in "A Daughter in Judgment" (John Long, 6s.), the reader can take comfort from the fact that the writer, Miss Edith Gibbs, is bound to help him out before the end. This she does quite openly, and the good brother Wilfred and the bad brother Roland get what the writer believes them to deserve, though of two horrid little boys Wilfred seems to my more unsophisticated mind to possess the additional vices of priggishness and culture.

A good deal of culture has migrated to Battersea, and in "Intellectual Mansions, S.W." (Chapman and Hall, 6s.) Mr. Philip Gibbs describes the half-greats, the just-fall-shorts, the would-be moulders of modern thought. Recent politics play a prominent part in the book, and the heroine gets killed in a suffrage riot. The idea is a good one, and would have borne a rather more careful working out. As it is Mr. Gibbs is a little inclined to run amok on the suffrage question, and thus to detract from the humour and pathos of the life he describes so well.

* * * * * *

I do not know what the novelist would do without Cavalier and Roundhead, without Jacobite and Hanoverian. It says much for Miss May Wynne that she is able to impart to Hanoverian "Mistress Cynthia" (Greening, 6s.) considerable verve and freshness. The disguise of Sir Peter the Jacobite as Lady Anne, the devoted aunt of pretty Cynthia, who does not hesitate to avail herself of auntly privileges, the rescue of Joan from the tavern, the final revenge of the villain, Sir Harry Blundell, are described with humour and spirit, which make the book lively reading.

LETTER FROM MADGE.

Dearest Amy,—On Monday the Duchess of Sutherland had her "Homespuns" garden party. Weather never keeps any one away from this pleasant function, for, unlike some other ladies who own large houses, the Duchess practically throws hers open to those fortunate enough to have invitations. So, in case of rain, there is shelter and to spare, and one never wearies of studying the beauties of this splendid mansion, the most beautiful in London, though many millionaires have done their utmost to surpass its splendours.

The weather behaved beautifully, and the garden, with its fine old trees, was fresh and green. Some few of those present wore colours, but all the great ladies wore black—the Duchess herself, the Duchess of Montrose, the Duchess of Somerset, Katherine Duchess of Westminster, the Duchess of Buckingham, the Countess of Shaftesbury, the Countess of Arran, etc. The Countess of Drogheda was in black and white. I also noticed some black and gold dresses, one very picturesque, and cut as low as a tea-gown in front. There were a few of the tied-in skirts, but among the best-dressed women they were conspicuous by their absence. Not one was worn by any one of position. Lady Winifred Gore was in a kind of fancy dress, scarlet and blue, and grey was much worn. I saw but little mauve or purple.

The homespuns grow more attractive every year. The colours improve. Among them I noticed a very beautiful reddish purple, just the tint of an Orleans plum. There were lovely blues, too, and a singularly effective green. A nice mixture was heather mauve and green. The stall of Shetland things looked like drifted snow. There was a flower stall where rambler roses in full bloom were sold in tubs. On another stall was displayed brass and pewter work done by the cripples in the Duchess's home for them in the Potteries.

The band played, the sun shone, every one chattered, and we even forgot to expect a shower—perhaps the strongest tribute to the Duchess's hospitality. Refreshments were served in the magnificent hall from which rises the famous double staircase. Strawberries of the largest, smothered in cream, presented temptation in one of its many irresistible forms, and to it we succumbed before we came away.

upon the whole of the rooms on the same floor with it! The old-fashioned range really makes the whole house hotter than one likes to have it when the glass marks anything over 75 degrees in the shade. But servants are sometimes very extravagant with gas. We were told the other day of an excellent plan of convicting them of wastefulness in this direction. The idea is to have a meter fixed somewhere above the cooker, so that the consumption of gas in it alone may be recorded on it, and the mistress can then see if any waste is going on. We are going to have one installed, and feel sure that it will act as a deterrent to the ladies of the basement when they incline to indulge too freely in the luxury of so convenient a form of fuel. It is certain that cookery over gas is much more satisfactory than over a coal fire, for the degree of heat can be regulated to a nicety.

The private view of the late George Du Maurier's drawings on Friday drew together a crowd of interesting and well-known people, representatives of fashionable society, of literature, the arts, and statesmancraft. Lady Dorothy Nevill, who may be said to belong to all these worlds, such is the catholicity of her tastes and the width of her sympathies, was there with her daughter, Miss Meresia, also Countess Féodore Gleichen. Lady Ritchie, Thackeray's daughter, the Countess of Altamont, Sir William and Lady Gilbert, Mr. Briton Riviere, Mr. J. M. Barrie, Mr. William Toynbee, Mrs. Jopling Rowe, and Major Guy Du Maurier, author of "An Englishman's Home," were among those present. The drawings are those which were so immensely popular in Punch representing society in late Victorian days, and it was pleasant to renew one's acquaintance with such old friends as Sir Ponsonby de Tomkins, Lady Leo Hunter, and the rest. The managers of the Leicester Galleries have raised the status of their exhibitions to the front rank during the last decade.

Don't you hate the larder? I can well understand why so many mistresses shirk the daily disagreeable duty of visiting it and examining its contents. And yet how necessary it is! Not only in the interests of economy and good housewifery, but in those of cleanliness. Take milk, for instance. "Jane, why three little lots of milk in three different jugs?" "Oh, m'm, I quite overlooked those two. You see, m'm, they were on the top shelf." Probably Jane had put them there herself, but there is never any use in driving things home to peccant persons. But if "Missus" had not seen the two forgotten jugs, their contents would proclaim themselves eloquently to the sense of smell in a few days, and two jugs would need a course of scalding and cleansing which they would probably fail to receive.

Then there are the things left over from previous meals. Who but the mistress can deal efficiently with these? Yes, the daily morning visit is a necessity, and I suppose it is good discipline for those who, like you and me, prefer a pleasant irresponsibility but are forced by circumstances to be disagreeably and actively responsible. The horrid part of the larder business is that one finds it necessary occasionally to find fault. And even if undertaken in the gentlest fashion, how difficult it is to manage it without arousing that strange obstinacy that seems a part of the nature of the half-educated. One has to mingle praise with blame in subtlest fashion. "Mary, your shelves are usually so beautifully clean that I am surprised," etc., etc. But with all the wisdom of the serpent that one can painfully acquire, the mistress's heart often shakes within her when she is plodding the thorny paths of housekeeping. Losing patience and temper is simple foolishness, however one may be provoked into it. It is always the smaller nature that triumphs in such a case. The generous withholds the slaying dart from pure compunction. The petty flings it and exults. Besides, it is for the mistress, as the superior, to remember that noblesse oblige, and to recognise that in losing her temper she is putting herself on a level with her servants; in fact, below them, for they have learned to control theirs. It is one of many admirable things I have noticed in servants.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

DEAREST MADGE,—We, like the rest of the kingdom, have been struggling against adversity as regards weather. June has gone by without "roses or raptures;" its welcome was cold and its farewell still colder. It is to the credit of our powers of endurance, rather than to our common-sense, that we doggedly kept to our traditional June programme. We sported in the open air and took our pleasure regardless of its pain. We had tennis and croquet tournaments, race meetings, and garden parties.

Many in Kildare had parties for the Curragh race meetings. At Harristown, Mr. and Lady Annette Latouche's visitors included Lord and Lady Headfort and Lord Enniskillen. Lady Annette belongs to the Clonmell family whose residence is Bishop's Court, in Kildare. The present holder of the title does not reside there, but has let the place, Kildare, on account of the hunting, being a good letting county. The La Touches are an old Huguenot family, who fled from intolerance in their own country and attained great prosperity in Ireland. Several of the family were members of the last Irish Parliament and voted against the Union. Later on they were advocates of Catholic Emancipation—an example of tolerance from the victims of intolerance which might at all times be usefully copied.

The weather at the Curragh on Wednesday was simply awful. On Thursday, fortunately for the Garden Party at Powerscourt, in the adjoining county of Wicklow, the afternoon afforded some hours of sunshine. Lord and Lady Powerscourt's hospitality was worthy of the regal style of Powerscourt, its gardens, demesne, woods and mountains. The great number of guests, whom Lord and Lady Powerscourt were indefatigable in entertaining, also harmonised with it. Lord and Lady Aberdeen, with a Viceregal suite, were present, the latter in the deep gloom of full Court mourning. The guests included the highest officials, legal and departmental, and one noticed many of Irish social light and leading. Ladies Fingall, Conynghame, Plunket, Howard, Walker, Arnott, Rachel Saunderson; Lords Monck, Heytesbury, and many others. A band—military—played on the lawn. Powerscourt is some fourteen miles south of Dublin and several miles from Bray, the nearest railway station. The number of motors was prodigious. The number of them over here is one of the mysteries of the dis-tressful country. One can imagine that the extent of the Irish motor taxes must have been, to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, one of the pleasant surprises of his Budget, as they came flowing in.

Lady Aberdeen "took" the garden party on her way to Kingstown, whence she departed for Edinburgh, in the late afternoon. She will live in our chronicles as the most strenuous of "Lady Liftenants," the Roosevelt of our sex. Probably she hustles us too much; we are a leisurely people, and not very "hustleable"—at least, not for long at a time. If she succeeds—the fault will not be hers if she does not—in teaching us the sanitary value of our own fresh air, many will in the future rise up and call her blessed.—Yours ever,

Salmon, the incomparable, is now at its best, and before every one tires of it you must try these recipes and the others that I send you for treating the good things now in season:—

Salmon in Cases.—Soak a couple of pounds of salmon in oil and vinegar for an hour, then cut it into neat slices; season them with pepper, salt, and grated nutmeg. Take as many half-sheets of buttered paper and lay a piece of salmon on each of the half-sheets; fold the paper so that nothing can run out, then pour liquid butter over it. Screen it with fine bread crumbs, put the cases into a greased tin and set them in the oven, taking care they do not burn. When they are done serve them in the papers, without sauce, and with half lemons.

Rolled Salmon.—Take the half side of a salmon, bone it and place it in vinegar and oil, mixed, for an hour. Then make a seasoning with mushrooms cut small, minced parsley, fine breadcrumbs, an ounce of butter, pepper, salt, grated nutmeg, and a blade of mace. Mix all together with the beaten yolk of an egg. Roll it up lightly and tie it with tape; put the fish in a deep jar with an ounce of butter and bake it in a quick oven. Serve it with anchovy sauce.

Spring Turnips à la Crême.—Peel quite young turnips, cut them in four and turn the quarters into lozenge shapes. Boil them in salted water until half done, strain them and return them to the stewpan. Fry about a teaspoonful of minced spring onions with half an ounce of butter, mix in a dessertspoonful of flour and a little consommé, stir this till it boils, then add it to the turnips to finish cooking. Mix the yolk of an egg with two tablespoonfuls of thick cream, season it with a dust of cayenne, salt and pepper, add a squeeze of lemon juice, and mix it with the turnips. Serve them in a dish that is stuck with a border of fried croûtons of bread.

This Trout Pie is excellent:—Wash and draw two salmon trout, remove the head and tail, and stuff the fish with rich forcemeat. Lard them with bacon and anchovies, in alternate rows. In the dish put a layer of fine spiced breadcrumbs, also little dice-shaped pieces of butter, dipped in flour. Over this put skinned and stalked mushrooms, blanched, then lay in the trout. Cover the pie, and put into a good oven for about an hour. When needed for table, remove the lid, squeeze in the juice of a lemon, and add a dash of cayenne, with a sprinkle of salt. Do not forget the lemon. It improves all fish, but is usually omitted.

Ever your loving Cousin, MADGE.

EMPLOYMENT AFTER EDUCATION.

The Views of the Duchess of Marlborough, The Earl of Lytton, Sir Samuel Evans, and Sir Albert Rollit

(Ex-President London Chamber of Commerce).

THE recent remarks of such men as Sir Samuel Evans, when King's Solicitor-General, and Sir Albert Rollit (Ex-President London Chamber of Commerce) cannot fail to be of interest to all concerned in the welfare of the rising generation.

History.

Sir Samuel Evans, from the chair at the recent twenty-first anniversary of Kensington College, said:—

"The history of the College is the history of a progressive institution, which is really required in our educational system. Constantly men in public life have brought to their attention young people, some from the schools, some from the colleges—yes, indeed, some from the Universities—who say they have attained their degrees or achieved success in their colleges and schools, and who yet do not know how to perform the actual work of life. That part of the educational system of this country which is deficient in many respects from the public point of view appears to me to be admirably done by this College. The College is certainly, as I think, filling a most excellent place in our educational system."

Sir Albert Rollit, on the same occasion, stated that, in his opinion, "the College had solved one of the greatest, the most complex, and the most difficult of all educational problems—that of securing Employment after Education."

The Duchess of Marlborough referred to the great pleasure it had been to her to come into personal contact with the students of the College. She had watched them at their work with the keenest interest, and commended especially the practical nature of the instruction given. She said:—

"It is this practical aspect which especially appeals to me, for we all know that many young men and young women who have received the highest education are unable, from want of knowledge of technical and secretarial work, to obtain posts worthy of their acceptance. The education which they receive at Kensington College does away with this difficulty, and completes their training, making it efficient and business-like. They are not only fitted to fill posts, but they are also guaranteed a good position to start with."

Her Grace went on to wish all the students—and in particular the young women students—the greatest success in their careers, and stated she considered much credit was due to the Director, Mr. J. Munford, for the splendid results achieved by the graduates of Kensington College.

Mr. James Munford was able to state in the course of his speech that on this twenty-first anniversary of the foundation of the College there was not a single qualified student seeking an appointment, and that during the past year the applications for the services of the College graduates had exceeded the number of students available.

The College had also succeeded in capturing the blue riband of the London Chamber of Commerce for proficiency in modern languages, and had obtained a long list of successes at the various examinations.

Aim.

The aim of Kensington College is to provide for every boy and girl a definite and practical training, followed by the absolute guarantee of a remunerative career as soon as the student be qualified to perform the duties thereof.

Motto.

The motto adopted by the College is one suggested by the Right Hon. the Earl of Lytton, when speaking from the chair at a recent distribution. Having in mind Dante's dread warning over the gates of the Inferno, he thought it would be appropriate to inscribe over the portals of Kensington College the following variation thereof: "Have every hope all ye who enter here."

Training.

The students are trained as private secretaries, English and foreign correspondents, accountants, and book-keepers, and for other vocations of a responsible and remunerative nature.

Model Offices.

When the academic side of the training is complete, and all the subjects which comprise the lower rungs of the ladder of success have been mastered, the students are drafted into the "Model Offices," which are fitted up with all the requisites of a secretarial bureau. Here will be found students who can speak modern languages almost as fluently as their mother tongue; who can write shorthand, type their own notes accurately, and also perform journalistic duties.

In the absence of the chief they are capable of taking charge of the office, of interviewing visitors, and of conducting the greater part of his correspondence. They go on missions of delicacy as ambassadors and bring important negotiations to a successful issue; they write an essay or lecture, get out statistics, and make searching literary investigations.

Kensington College Diploma.

When they have thus given sufficient practical proof of their ability to discharge their duties in a thoroughly efficient manner, they are granted the Kensington College Diploma, which may be truly said to be more valuable than the diploma of any other institution in the world, seeing that the holder possesses the right of introduction to a dignified and remunerative appointment.

Guaranteed Appointments and Salaries.

Improbable as it may seem to the uninitiated, the trouble at Kensington College is not to secure appointments for the candidates, but to prepare quickly enough properly qualified candidates to fill the ever-increasing number of vacancies placed in the hands of the Director.

The opinion which the late Lord Nunburnholme held of Kensington College is evidenced by his taking the chair at a recent distribution of prizes by her Grace the Dowager Duchess of Roxburghe, and by his lordship having applied to the College for the services of secretaries at salaries of £130 (for a lady), £250, and £800 per annum.

The Rev. Canon Barker said on the same occasion:—

"Kensington College differs from any other I have ever heard of, inasmuch as it not only educates the students, but provides positions for them in the world afterwards."

Souvenir Booklet.

A card addressed to Miss T. Munford, Secretary, Kensington College, New Building, 34, Gloucester Gardens, Bishop's Road, Bayswater, will bring full particulars of the Guaranteed Appointment System, as well as an illustrated Souvenir, similar to that recently graciously accepted by her Royal Highness Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyll.

Consultations.

The Director is ever ready to give his advice on the subject of a suitable career for boy or girl, and to give detailed and expert counsel of the greatest value.

Kensington College will re-open after the summer vacation at no great distance from the site of the building where it has for so many years kept up its prosperous career, and which it has now outgrown. Mr. Munford has secured the commodious building on the north side of Bishop's Road, where that thoroughfare forms a junction with Gloucester Terrace at the corner facing the entrance to Holy Trinity Church. These premises are now being remodelled to suit the purpose for which they will be used, and there is ample space about them for future extensions, which are certain to become necessary.

THE COURT OF WILLIAM III.

By E. and M. S. GREW.

With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

Times.—"The authors have steered most dexterously between the solidity of history and the irresponsibility of Court biography. The book consists of a number of character studies done with care and distinction; it is a welcome change from the mass of literature whose only function is to revive the gossip and scandal centred round a throne. It is a series of portraits of the men and women whose lives were spent in making history."

MEXICAN NATIONAL PACKING COMPANY.

(Incorporated under the Laws of New Jersey, U.S.A.)

REORGANISATION.

Arrangements have been made having for their object the reorganisation of the Mexican National Packing Company as an English Company incorporated under the English Companies Acts, which is to be managed by The Packing House Development Company, Limited, which is directly under the control and management of Messrs. Van den Berghs, with Messrs. W. and J. Biggerstaff and Messrs. Poels and Brewster, and these firms have made a careful investigation through their own expert in Mexico into the prospects of the business. Their expert estimates that under their control and with the new capital the English Company will realise the following profits:—

|---|---|
| For the first year | £125,000 |
| For the second year | 175,000 |
| For the third year | 200,000 |
| For the fourth year | 250,000 |

The Plan of Reorganisation has the full approval of Mr. John W. DeKay, the President of the Mexican National Packing Company.

The Capital of the new Company will be:—

£1,750,000 6 per cent. Cumulative Preference Shares of £1 each and £750,000 Ordinary Shares of £1 each.

The Preference Shares will be preferential as to capital, and after payment of a non-cumulative dividend of 6 per cent. to the Ordinary Shareholders, will be entitled to addition to their 6 per cent. Cumulative dividend to rank pari passu with the Ordinary Shareholders in respect to the remaining profits of the business available for distribution.

The rights of the outstanding £500,000 Rastro Debentures of the Packing Company are recognised by the creation of Second Mortgage Income Debenture Stock to the extent of £300,000, bearing cumulative interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and secured as to both capital and interest on the whole undertaking, including the Rastro in the City of Mexico and the Concessions connected therewith, after the First Mortgage Bonds but before the Preference Shares of the new Company, but having no rights of foreclosure for the first five years as set out in the Plan of Reorganisation.

Assenting Rastro Debenture Holders will be entitled to receive, as set out in the Plan of Reorganisation, in respect of each £100 of their Rastro Debentures, £60 of the 6 per cent. Second Mortgage Income Debenture Stock and £40 of the Participating Preference Shares.

Assenting Holders of the 6 per cent. Gold Bonds of the Packing Company will be entitled to receive, in exchange for each $100 of such Bonds, £20 Sterling of the said Participating Preference Shares above referred to.

All Debenture and Bond Holders of the Packing Company who assent to the Plan of Reorganisation will, at the time of exchange, be paid in cash the interest on the Debentures and Bonds held by them up to the date when the securities of the new Company are ready for such exchange.

The assenting holders of the Preference and Ordinary Shares of the Packing Company will be entitled to receive £2 10s. of the Ordinary Shares of the new Company in exchange for each one Share of $100 of the Packing Company.

The additional capital required for the working capital of the undertaking and for the cost of carrying through the reorganisation will be provided by the creation of an authorised issue of £1,000,000 5 per Cent. First Mortgage Bonds, redeemable in twenty years, and secured by a first charge upon the whole of the undertaking of the new Company. Arrangements have been made for the issuance of an amount not exceeding £600,000 of these bonds to net the new Company 80 per cent. of their par value after paying the cost of stamping, printing, underwriting, and issuing. The remaining £400,000 cannot be issued except with the consent of the new Company in General Meeting.

All the remaining holders of Rastro Debentures, 6 per Cent. Consolidated Gold Bonds, and Preference and Ordinary Stock of the Packing Company, who wish to concur in this Plan of Reorganisation, are invited to deposit their Securities, on or before the 30th July, 1910, with the Bankers to the British and Mexican Trust Company, Limited, Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie, and Co., 67, Lombard Street, London, E.C., against which they will receive certificates of deposit entitling them in due course to receive:—

(1) The amount of Mortgage Debentures, or Preference or Ordinary Shares in the new Company, and

(2) The interest (in cash) which shall have accrued due in respect of the Bonds and/or Debentures up to the date at which such new securities are ready for exchange.

Or, failing the completion of the reorganisation, the return of their Bonds, Debentures, or Shares.

Copies of the Plan of REORGANISATION may be obtained at the Office of THE BRITISH AND MEXICAN TRUST COMPANY, LIMITED, WINCHESTER HOUSE, OLD BROAD STREET, LONDON.

This Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring from the Mazoe Syndicate, Limited, 126 Claims in the MAZOE DISTRICT, SOUTHERN RHODESIA, the property of that Syndicate known as the HAY Claims.

The following is a Summary of Messrs. Pearse, Kingston, and Browne's Report on the Property:—

The "Hay" Property, situated in the district of Mazoe, Southern Rhodesia, has been inspected and sampled by our Mr. V. S. Allen. We have examined his findings, and from all the information before us have pleasure in recommending vigorous development of the property.

The property comprises 126 claims in all. There is a small treatment plant consisting of a 5-stamp mill, boiler and winding engine, and a small cyanide plant is in course of erection.

The ore bodies occur as lenticular deposits in hornblendic granite, and are highly gold-bearing. Three of these deposits, situated on the Centre Block of the property, have been worked, and there is strong evidence of the existence of other lenses to the East and South of the present workings. The No. 1 or North Lens, No. 2 or Middle Lens, and No. 3 or South Lens, are being worked from a Main Shaft. These workings have been extended to 500 ft., and the present total depth is 160 ft. In the No. 1, samples in stopes from a depth of 40 ft., down to 115 ft., over a length of 70 ft., gave an average result of 43 dwts., or 172s. per ton for an average width of 11 ins. In No. 2, the drive at the 55 ft. level has reached 500 ft., 350 ft. of which, driven East, gave 6½ dwts., or 26s. per ton, average width 42 ins. West of the Main shaft a winze is down to 150 ft., from surface in ore, value 60 dwts., or 240s. per ton, average width 75 ins. At 70 ft. below the present stope a drive 51 ft. in ore gives 58 dwts., or 232s. per ton, average width 75 ins. In No. 3 ore stoped to a depth of 55 ft. was crushed, and is stated to have averaged 9½ dwts., or 38s. per ton for 19 ins. wide and 150 ft. long.

A new Shaft, sunk to cut the ore bodies on their Westerly dip, is now down to 101 ft., and entering values which indicate No. 3 Lens.

The ore is oxidised to the present depth, and some sulphide coming in the winze at 150 ft. carries high values.

There are about 6,000 tons of tailings worth 8½ dwts., or 34s. per ton, ready for cyaniding, which may require regrinding to get satisfactory extraction. From tests made on the ore, however, we do not anticipate any real difficulties when we come to actual treatment.

The water supply is assured and fuel is available; and provided the present widths and average values continue in depth, the "Hay" should develop into a very valuable property.

HEAD OFFICE.

Sault Ste. Marie, Canada.

BANKERS.

Bank of Montreal.

TRUSTEES FOR BOND HOLDERS.

United States Mortgage and Trust Company, New York.

The bonds will be payable to bearer, and issued in denominations of £500 and £100, payable, principal and interest, at the Bank of Montreal, London, or, at the holders' option, at the Bank of Montreal, Montreal or New York, at the fixed rate of exchange of $4.86 2-3 to the £.

The bonds may, at the option of the holder, be registered as to principal at the office of the United States Mortgage and Trust Company at New York.

The Bank of Montreal, 47 Threadneedle street, E.C., will, if desired, receive bonds for transmission to New York for registration.

Coupons payable half-yearly on the 1st June and 1st December.

A coupon for £1 5s, being interest at 5 per cent. on the instalments to 1st December, will be attached to the scrip.

The bonds will be redeemable at 105 per cent. and accrued interest in the event of the Company going into voluntary liquidation, and by the trust deed the right will be reserved to apply the net proceeds of any sale of land forming part of the security for the bonds in the purchase of bonds at or below 105 per cent. and accrued interest, or in their redemption by drawings at the same rate on giving six months' notice to the holders. The Company will be entitled also to redeem the whole of the bonds at the same rate on giving six months' notice expiring on any interest date.

The Bank of Montreal, 47 Threadneedle street, London, E.C., is authorised by the contractors for the issue to receive applications for £770,000 of the above bonds, at the price of £90 per £100 bond, payable as follows:—

25 on 12th July, 1910.
30 on the 19th August, 1910.
30 on the 5th October, 1910.

£90

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

Payment in full may be made on or after 12th July, 1910, under discount at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum.

The bonds will be secured by a trust deed in favour of the United States Mortgage and Trust Company, as trustees, constituting the bonds a specific first mortgage upon the lines of railway, terminals, and docks of the Company, and a general floating charge upon the rest of the Company's assets and undertaking, present and future, including the lands to which the Company will become entitled in terms of its grant from the Government of the Province of Ontario.

The full Prospectus contains information furnished by the President of the Company, of which the following is an extract:—

The Company is authorised under a charter granted by the Dominion of Canada to construct a line from Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, to the Canadian Pacific Railway, including a branch from Michipicoten Harbour to the main line, and from a point on the Canadian Pacific Railway north to James Bay, intersecting the National Transcontinental Railway under construction, and the projected line of the Canadian Northern Railway.

The Dominion of Canada has granted to the Company a cash subsidy of $6,400 (£1,280) per mile for the 225 miles from Sault Ste. Marie to the Canadian Pacific Railway main line, including the Michipicoten Branch.

The Province of Ontario has granted to the Company a very valuable land grant of about 1,665,000 acres in respect of the 225 miles.

These lands will be granted in freehold, and carry all minerals and all timber free of all charges except the pine, upon which stumpage charges are to be paid. 1,439,300 acres of this land grant have been selected already by the Company, and have been set aside for the Company by the Government of the Province of Ontario.

The railroad is already in operation for a distance of some 80 miles.

The Company owns extensive terminals and deepwater docks at Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, fully equipped for the rapid loading and unloading of ore, coal, steel rails, lumber, &c., and also owns the harbour at Michipicoten.

The Company owns and operates on the Great Lakes a freight steamship line with a tonnage (including a steamer under construction) of 15,600 tons.

Part of the proceeds of the bonds will be used to pay for $3,000,000 bonds of the Lake Superior Corporation which have been cancelled, in order to absolutely free the Algoma Central Railway Company from all encumbrances other than that of its own 1st Mortgage bonds now being issued, and the balance of the proceeds, together with other available funds of the railway company, and the cash to be received by way of subsidies from the Dominion Government will be more than sufficient to cover the expenditure required for the completion and equipment of the road to the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The net earnings from the 80 miles so far completed and from the steamship line for the past year to the 30th June, 1909, have been £26,700.

The net earnings of the ten months of the present year show an increase of fully 50 per cent. over the same period last year.

As soon as railroad connection is made the Algoma Steel Company, Limited, is prepared to take a minimum of 300,000 tons of iron ore per annum from the Magpie Mines, and the Railway Company will also get the whole freight on the shipments of iron ore from the Helen Mine, amounting to at least 200,000 tons per annum, so that the railway is assured 500,000 tons of freight per annum from these two mines alone.

|---|---|
| The estimated gross earnings of the line for the first year after its completion to the Canadian Pacific Railway, taken on a conservative estimate, are | £293,600 |
| Less 70 per cent. operating expenses | 205,520 |
| Estimated total net earnings | £88,080 |
| Add estimated net earnings—steamship department | 15,000 |
| Total estimated net earnings | £103,080 |

The amount required to pay the interest on the $6,750,000 of the Company's 1st Mortgage Gold Bonds is £67,500.

No account has been taken in the above figures of any profit which may be derived from the Company's lands, through the sale of timber, ore, or of the lands themselves.

An unconditional guarantee by the Lake Superior Corporation, both as to principal and interest, will be endorsed on each Bond.

The following figures show net earnings of the Corporation through its subsidiary companies during the past three years:—

|---|---|
| Year ending June 30th, 1907 | £160,964 |
| ,, ,, June 30th, 1908 | £210,879 |
| ,, ,, June 30th, 1909 | £215,511 |

The approximate net earnings of the subsidiary companies for the first ten months of the present year have amounted to £198,963, being considerably in excess of the corresponding period in the previous year.

Improvements now approaching completion in connection with the steel plant and other subsidiary properties of the Lake Superior Corporation will considerably increase its earnings.

Full prospectuses (upon the terms of which applications will alone be entertained) and forms of application may be obtained from the Bank of Montreal 47 Threadneedle street, London, E.C., or Messrs R. Nivison & Co., Bank Buildings, Princes street, London, E.C.

Overwhelming DEMAND for the Royal Worcester Corset BARGAINS.

Great pressure in all Departments is naturally anticipated at our Summer Sale, and arrangements made accordingly. But so irresistibly attractive have the bargains in Royal Worcester Kidfitting Corsets proved during the first week of our Summer Sale, now in progress, that our resources have been taxed to the uttermost, and we find ourselves left with only the comparatively few bargains enumerated here, which we cannot hope will carry us many days.

Fortunately, however, all sizes and fittings are represented, and ladies may be sure of securing a corset that will serve them faithfully for the autumn mode, the new corset base being so little changed.

All corsets of 14/9 and upwards, including the celebrated "Adjusto" figure-reducing corset (now 13/11), marked down 2/- per pair throughout the sale.

Post orders receive careful and prompt attention.

The half-a-century reputation of Royal Worcester Kidfitting Corsets is a universally accepted guarantee of the smartness and stylishness of these bargains, which we are offering at these substantial reductions in accordance with our principle of clearing our corset stock twice every year.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best Epigram, Conundrum, Lipogram, Bouts-Rimés, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this Journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the Truth Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a quarter to the same competitor.

7. All New Contributors are Required to Forward with their First Answers their Real Names and Addresses for Registration; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed twelve, and must under no circumstances consist of more than fourteen, letters.

9. Competitors must on no account change the noms-de-plume they have once assumed.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed:—

QUESTION No. 13 (AND LAST) OF THE SERIES.

There was an amusing story in one of the magazines some little while ago of a peripatetic medicine vendor holding forth to an interested audience on the marvellous properties of his patent tonic. In reinforcement of his eulogies, he quoted examples of the wonderful cures it had effected. One of these was the case of a woman, a weakly, nervous creature, who was cruelly ill-treated by her herculean bully of a husband. At length, in her misery, she resolved to take poison. So she rushed upstairs and drank off a whole bottle of cyanide of potassium, as she thought. But she had mistaken the bottle. What she had really swallowed was the patent tonic. And the invigorating effects of the draught were so marked and so immediate that she came straight downstairs and threw her 14 stone husband out of the kitchen window.

You are now Invited to Take Some Article or Object of those Advertised in this Issue of "Truth" (July 6), and Invent some Equally Marvellous Story, in Humorous vein, of the Extraordinary Effects that it may be Supposed to have Produced.

IMPORTANT.

Please note that replies to this, the concluding question of the series, as well as all replies to previous questions which have not yet been sent in, must reach Truth office not later than by the first post on Wednesday, July 20.

No replies received after that time can be entertained.

Competitors are advised once again to read carefully the detailed rules and regulations for this competition, which were published in Truth of April 13 last.

Strict compliance with those rules and regulations is essential. Any competitor failing to comply with them will be disqualified.

I emphasise this point, because a certain number of replies have reached me unaccompanied by the requisite coupons. If the competitors concerned wish to have their replies entered for the competition, they must rectify the omission by forwarding the missing coupons, with their noms-de-plume endorsed on them, to reach me before the entries close finally on the morning of July 20.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,638.

The usual Prize of Two Guineas is offered this week for the best reply to the following query:—

If you were going for your Holiday to Iceland, St. Kilda, or some other Remote Spot where Circulating Libraries do not exist, and only had room in your portmanteau for Three Novels, what Three would you Select? Your Choice to be Confined to the Novels of Living English Authors.

By "English" authors, are meant authors who write in the English language, or in any dialect of the same. Thus American and Colonial novelists, for example, are eligible.

The "best" reply will be the reply that most nearly corresponds with the ideal reply arrived at by collating all replies sent in. In other words, the Prize award will be determined by plebiscite.

All replies must reach Truth office by the first post on Monday, July 18.

Answers to Correspondents.

 The real name, with the address, of Tom Nissed, winner of £1 1s. in connection with Truth Prize No. 1629, is Thos. H. Allbutt, Esq., Ingleside, Old Colwyn N. Wales.

 The real name, with the address, of Nutcracker, winner of 10s. 6d. in connection with above, is A. W. Baxter, Esq., Manchester Chess Club, Bank Street, Manchester.

 The real name, with the address, of Cherub, winner of one-sixth of Truth Prize No. 1,630, is Miss Sybil Page, 35, Rutland Court, London, S.W.

 The real name, with the address, of Aunt Jane, winner of one-fourth of Truth Prize, No. 1631, is Miss M. Jenkinson, 122, Palace Road, Tulse Hill.

 The real name, with the address, of Sapper, also winner of one-fourth of above, is P. S. Robinson, Esq., Blackhall, Kilcullen, co. Kildare.

Orang.—Certainly the definition of alliteration might have been extended to embrace phonetic alliterations; but, in point of fact, it was not. So there is, I think, not much use in discussing the general question.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,635.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

ALLITERATIVE DESCRIPTIONS OF THE HORSE SHOW AT OLYMPIA.

How heedfully handy horsemen handle here headstrong horses, handsomely harnessed, holding heads high.—Arundo.

Excellent equine exhibition entailing enormous expenditure. Engaging exhibitors eke extraordinary exploits. Endless excitement. Effective entrance. Spartan.

Amazing and amusing attractions awaited all attending. American animals, as always, admirable; also all arrangements.—Quilp.

Connoisseurs consistently commend coaching contests; comparing cavalry, cordially congratulate clever Continental competitors, criticising compatriots caustically.—Musicus.

An admirable ambiguity. Art aptly aids—alternately altering and alienating. Ardent artists accentuate atmospheric artificiality.—A——.

Altogether an admirably arranged affair. Accommodation and adequate accommodation. Attendance above average. Animals A1.—Cæsar.

Here husband hunters hie; handsome horses; harmonious habits; happy humorous harangues. Hence horses help Hymen.—Wm. Robertson.

A brilliant spectacle of floral beauty, expert and dashing riders, and equine competence effectively combined.—Georgina.

Equinophils enjoy exceedingly entrancing equine evolutions, extraordinary equestrian exercises, each exhibition (enter enclosure—encourage exhibits).—Ribler.

Horses holding heads high, handsome hacks hasting, heavy hunters hurtling, house hot, hundreds happy, hurrah!—Almaviva.

Eagerly expected exhibition excellent, equestrian exploits especially exciting. Everyone's enthusiastic encores encourage English entrants enormously.—Sapper.

Azaleas and arums are attractively arranged around arena. Amazons advance, Admiring audience applauds announced awards.—Giovanna.

Vast venue, vindicating veterinary's vocation. Visitors viewing Vanderbilt's victory, virtually voicing vanity. Verdict: vulgar voluptuousness.—Glenrosa.

High-bred horseflesh's habitual haunt; hurdles, hunters, hurrying hoofs; harmony helping horticulture's hues; humanity holding holiday.—Owen.

Hither hastily hie hopeful, headlong, heroic horsemen, happily hinnying. Hurtling hunters hop hyperhazardously high hurdles.—Piers Peniles.

Judicious judges. Jibbers jump jeopardously. Jolly juveniles joke. Jealous jehus jostle jubilant joyous jarveys.—Saemund.

Every eye eloquently expressed equine exhibition entertaining, educating, edifying, exciting; equitation especially evoking emphatic encomiums.—H. Wynotte.

Each elaborately equipped, exclusively equine, entertainment effectively exhibited European equestrian élite emulating exceptional equinal euphemism.—Orang.

Excellent equine exhibition! Every exciting event extorting enthusiastic encomiums.

Elated European experts eclipsing English equestrians.—Le Demonio.

Melodramatic midsummer meeting. Martial music. Military men master magnificent mounts. Millionaires, matchmakers, mothers, maidens muster.—Klondyke.

Each excellent exhibit entrancingly entertaining; every equestrian emphatically enhances Empire's education.—Peakite.

Easily eclipsed every earlier equine exhibition. English equestrian evolutions excelled. Everybody emphatically expressing enthusiastic encomiums.—Arlos.

Successful society show. Shady stands; some shilling seats. Striking surroundings. Splendid sight. Spectators sit spellbound.—Lindholme.

Equestrian, exciting, edifying, effective, exertive, eventful, emulative, exhibitive, entertaining, enthusiastic, exhilarating, enriching, enterprising, enjoyable, elaborate.—Korah.

Choice, corymbiferous, commodious construction. Chaos consistently condoned. Chary, classified, clean-shaped competitors compete, confidentially contemplating championships.—Myth.

Equine exploitations, excellent exhibits. Emulations enthusiastically extolled each equestrian engagement, every energetic expansion earning eulogy.—Sophia.

Equine essays effervescent, emulations expanding energy, equestrian effacements, encounters, efforts, elegance, excite effusively enthusiastic eulogies.—Mary.

Magnificent management marking majesty, masterly mounts, meteoric movements, magic might, mercurial manipulations, manifesting martial manœuvres.—Crank.

Sweating steeds strenuously speeding surrounding same, several swaying sections spectators; sudden swerve, shout, shock, sensation.—Fragos.

Dozens different, decidedly difficult, daring, dashing deeds dexterously done. Debonair damsels defy danger. Delightful display.—Aunt Jane.

Handsome horses, hunters, hackneys handled helpfully. Heroic horsemanship. Hospitable hosts. Homogeneous humans hurling hearty huzzas!—Provident.

Exceedingly excellent exhibition; easily equals every endeavour ever evolved. Educates eager equestrians enormously; encourages exquisite equipages.—Nemo.

Everyone entering England's equine exhibition enthusiastically exclaimed: "Enormous entries, exciting events, enchanting environment, excellent entertainment!"—Toler.

Splendid show. Such superb steeds seldom seen. Smart set slightly surprised, strangers showing superior skill.—Nin-Nin.

It is indeed in itself impressively interesting; i'faith, inspiriting! I'm invariably inside. It's increasingly international.—Clapa.

Excellent exhibition every evening, European emulators especially evincing extreme energy. Each entry excited excessive enthusiasm.—Ballantrae.

All agree an admirably arranged, attractive, and amusing affair; airy and ample accommodation; attentive attendants.—Allimac.

Attractive and accomplished animals at an annual array, anxiously awaited and admirably attended.—Sigma.

Mourning maids, military men, magnificent mounts moved midst magic melody. Moore, meanwhile, merely making money.—Praecipe.

Exceptional equine exhibition. Every entry excellent. Each event exhilarating. Enchanting environments. Everything enjoyable. Eulogies emphatic.—John M.P.

Flowers, fountains, feminine fashions, flirtation, fearless fellows, fiery fillies, feats, fences, fanfare.—Tap.

ESTABLISHED 1856.

President—THE LORD BISHOP OF LONDON.

THE CONVALESCENT AND HOLIDAY FUND FOR THE POOR COUNTRY CLERGY.

The Committee of the Poor Clergy Relief Corporation earnestly ask for CONTRIBUTIONS to their FUND FOR GRANTING HELP TO COUNTRY CLERGYMEN and to those in PROVINCIAL TOWNS suffering from overwork and weakened health, to enable them to obtain a few weeks' rest and change. Cases are frequent wher for 6, 8, or 10 years—sometimes even longer—a clergyman has not had a single Sunday from his parish.

It is requested that all sums sent for this special purpose may be marked "Holiday Fund."

The Society also makes large grants periodically from its General Fund in times of emergency and is the only Institution of the kind which gives immediate assistance to the Clergy, their Widows and Orphan Daughters IN ALL PARTS OF THE EMPIRE. At each fortnightly meeting of the Committee some hundreds of pounds are distributed in this way.

Cheques should be crossed "London County and Westminster Bank," and made payable to Messrs. THE ALMAGAM CO.

Dear Sirs,

The two covers you retreaded for me with Almagam, at a cost of £1 4s. 8d. each, I am very pleased to say ran exceedingly well. One, which I have now taken off, ran a distance of 2,750 miles, and then the cover burst. The tread was still in good condition, and had the cover not been weak would have had considerably more mileage. The other one I have still on my cab, and it has done 3,050 miles, and looks fit to run the same distance again. This distance is registered by my taximeter, as you know I run these tyres on my taxicab. I have recommended several of my friends to you who have taxicabs, and I hope they will have as good luck as I have had myself. I will call and fetch the other two tyres when I am in your district.

Yours truly,
W. J. DEAN.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE King and Queen are spending the greater part of this week at Aldershot, and next Tuesday afternoon their Majesties will join the Royal yacht Alexandra at Portsmouth Harbour, embarking at the south railway jetty. They intend to spend a few days in cruising about the Solent and round the Isle of Wight, after which they will probably proceed down Channel to Dartmouth and Plymouth Sound. It is understood that their Majesties will be afloat for about a fortnight, after which they may stay for a short time at Barton Manor. It is expected that they will spend about a week at Frogmore during the early part of August before going to Scotland. They had originally intended to return to Windsor last week.

The King held a Court in the Throne Room of St. James's Palace on Thursday morning for the reception of the Ambassadors and other Chefs de Mission. The ceremonial was exceedingly brief and very formal. The Investiture, which was held by his Majesty directly after the Diplomatic Court, occupied only thirty-five minutes. The King received the Companions of the various orders, instead of the Investiture being limited to Knights Grand Crosses and Knights Commanders.

---

The last of the "Accession" Courts for the presentation of Addresses on the Throne was held by the King on Friday at St. James's Palace. The only bodies attending, with a prescriptive right to present such Addresses, were the Convocations of Canterbury and York, and they were first received by the King, who read a reply to each of their Addresses. Twenty-four deputations from all descriptions of bodies were afterwards introduced into the Throne Room, each Address and his Majesty's general reply, being merely handed over, except in the case of the University of Glasgow. The ceremonial was got through with extraordinary rapidity, as excellent arrangements had been made by the Lord Chamberlain's Department. Among the "introducers" of deputations were the Duke of Norfolk, Lord Rosebery, Lord Derby, Lord Tullibardine, Lord Carnarvon, Lord Kinnaird, Lord Curzon of Kedleston, and Lord Joicey. One would like to know why the Corporation of Newbury was favoured by being received at Court on this occasion!

A paragraph has appeared in several journals which states that preparations are being made at Balmoral for the arrival of the Queen and her children "about the end of July, and that the King will join them" for the Twelfth. As a matter of fact, no "preparations" whatever are being made at Balmoral, and nothing is yet known at the Castle concerning the arrangements for the autumn residence of the Court on Deeside. It is understood, however, that Balmoral is not likely to be occupied by the Court before the middle of August at the earliest. There would be no object in the King arriving "for the Twelfth," as there are so few grouse on the Royal estates that the whole season's bag is not equal to one day's bag on a crack moor.

One of the morning papers considers that the King will be treated "in a niggardly manner" if the report of the Select Committee on the Civil List is adopted by Parliament. This journal states that the King "has to meet the expense of entertaining foreign Sovereigns," whereas the cost of such visits is paid by the country, and during the last reign there were numerous votes on this account. We are told that the King "must own a yacht and pay for its upkeep," whereas every one who discusses such subjects ought to know that "the upkeep" of the Royal yachts is paid for by the Admiralty. "A racing stud is an exceedingly costly possession," as every one knows, but there is no reason whatever why the King should keep racehorses, and there would be strong protests if the Civil List were increased in order to provide for the expenses of such a stud.

Queen Alexandra has changed her plans, and she will give up her intended summer residence at Sandringham. Her Majesty will leave London next Monday for Copenhagen, and she proposes to stay in Denmark for about three months. The King has placed the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert at his mother's disposal. Queen Alexandra will pay a visit to Norway in the course of the next few weeks. Her Majesty and the Empress Marie will occupy their villa near Klampenborg on the Sound during the greater part of her stay in Denmark.

Princess Victoria, whose health has been benefited by her stay at Bognor, is going to Christiania on a visit to the King and Queen of Norway, and she will probably be their guest until the beginning of October, when H.R.H. will join Queen Alexandra in Denmark.

---

The Emperor William has left Kiel on his annual cruise to Norway, and he is accompanied in the Imperial yacht by Prince Albert of Schleswig-Holstein, who is to return to England next month. The Emperor is to join the Empress at Wilhelmshohe when he returns to Germany at the beginning of August, and they will stay there for about a month until he leaves and attends the autumn manœuvres.

---

The King and Queen of Spain and Queen Christina have left Madrid for San Sebastian for the season. The Queen of Spain is not expected to arrive in the Isle of Wight until the last week in this month, and she will stay at Osborne Cottage with Princess Henry of Battenberg for about three weeks. Her visit is to be absolutely private. King Alfonso is not expected to accompany his wife to England, but he may do so, as he so often changes his plans, in which case he will spend a week at Cowes on board the Royal yacht, and will afterwards pay two or three visits to Scotland for grouse shooting. If the King of Spain does come to England he will maintain the very strictest incognito during his visit.

Princess Louis of Battenberg, who has been staying at a small country place near Chesham for several months, has left England on her return to Germany. She intends to spend the summer and autumn at the Château of Heiligenberg, where she is within an easy drive of Darmstadt. Princess Louis will probably go to Russia shortly for a few weeks to visit her sisters, the Empress and the Grand Duchess Elizabeth, widow of the Grand Duke Serge, who now lives entirely in the neighbourhood of Moscow.

---

Mr. Alexander Hood has accepted the office of Treasurer of the Queen's Household. During the last reign Mr. Hood was private secretary to the Princess of Wales. He is a son of the late Lord Bridport, who was a member of Queen Victoria's Household for many years. Lord Ripon was Treasurer of Queen Alexandra's former Household.

---

A Tory journal blames the Government for creating a delay in the election of a Scottish Representative Peer in the place of the late Lord Carnwath. It would be quite as reasonable to blame Convocation or the General Assembly. The Government has no concern whatever in the affair, which is entirely in the hands of the Peers of Scotland themselves. Such elections are usually conducted with an ostentatious deliberation which in Scotland excites a combination of annoyance and contempt. The Court of Chancery under Lord Eldon was scarcely more dilatory in its methods than are the Scottish Peers in filling up such vacancies.

---

Lady Victoria Campbell, who died at Edinburgh last week, was a sister of the Duke of Argyll and the Duchess of Northumberland. She took an enthusiastic interest in all Highland affairs, and she was actively concerned in many philanthropic and educational enterprises in the north. Lady Victoria was a staunch member of "the Kirk." She had made the island of Tiree her principal residence for several years, and she did much to provide for the welfare of the inhabitants, by whom she was greatly beloved.

Lieutenant-General Macdonald, who died last week, belonged to an ancient Perthshire family. He was the son of General Sir John Macdonald of Dun Alastair, who was a well-known Peninsula and Waterloo officer, and he was named "Black John of the Battles." General Macdonald served in the Army for forty-four years, and he greatly distinguished himself during the Crimean War. He commanded the forces in Scotland for several years.

Mrs. Feilden, of Todmorden, who has died at the age of ninety, was all her life closely associated in Lancashire with a circle of active social workers and zealous philanthropists. She was keenly interested in education, and founded several schools. Being possessed of a large fortune, Mrs. Feilden gave numerous and considerable gifts for various educational organisations, and she was a munificent benefactor to Manchester University, while at Owens College she founded a Chair of Education. She was for many years a very useful member of the Todmorden School Board.

There is an ancient oak in the small park, under which Pitt and Wilberforce discussed and settled the terms of the Slavery Abolition Bill. Pitt's house was pulled down after his death, and the present one was built in 1823. Holwood was for many years the residence of Lord Chancellor Cranworth, and the place was purchased by the fifteenth Earl of Derby (elder brother of the late Earl) in the seventies.

A petition has been presented to the Court of Session by Lord Kinnoull for authority to sell the Dupplin Castle estate, in Perthshire, to Sir John Dewar, M.P., for £249,000, the transfer of the property to take place at Whit Sunday, 1911. It appears that the encumbrances on the Kinnoull estates amount to £275,114, and it is proposed to apply the price to the reduction of the debt. Sir John Dewar is at present the tenant of Abercairny, Colonel Home-Drummond-Moray's fine place near Crieff.

I have received a great deal of correspondence with reference to the case of Mrs. Ashton Cross and the Kennel Club. As it is mostly in the nature of expressions of opinion—all in confirmation of that expressed last week in TRUTH—there is no occasion to go into it in detail. But it is evident that there is a very strong feeling in the club that the action of the committee is indefensible, and, that being so, it seems to me that the members owe it to themselves to take the matter up and dispose of it to their own satisfaction.

Through a distinguished gentleman personally acquainted with the whole case, I hear that not only the intention of suspending Mrs. Cross, but the very term which was ultimately decreed, were talked of openly in official quarters before the charge was lodged. If this can be established it damns the whole proceedings at once. However that may be, it is, I believe, undeniable that the committee framed the charges on which they adjudicated; in other words, they were both prosecutors and judges. One member of the club asserts that the committee are "a self-elected body." Not being in possession of the rules, I cannot say precisely what this means, but a club in which the committee are in any sense self-elected is not likely to be conducted to the uniform satisfaction of the members. The affairs of a club, however, are the affairs of the members. In this case I have given the members a full statement of the facts, which they were not likely to get by any other means, and it remains for them to deal with them as they think fit.

THE ROMANTIC POSTER.

Lloyd George a fierce oration made—
  In fact, what's sometimes called a "roaster,"
And in most scathing terms inveighed
  Against a certain Cocoa Poster.

The Chancellor had cause, no doubt.
  But still I find the same objections
To all the posters put about
  By either party at elections.

It matters not or blue or red,
  Or Lib'ral, Labour, Whig, or Tory;
The fact remains, when all is said,
  That "every poster tells a—story."

The Times correspondent in Constantinople says the Powers should "take decisive steps to stop the deadlock in Crete." Why should they do so? What has the domestic deadlock in Crete to do with the Powers? Having been given self-government the Cretans should be let alone to work out their own salvation. It would be as reasonable to force the Africanders to give the franchise to the coloured population of South Africa as to force the Cretans to admit Moslems to their National Assembly. As to the deadlock, it strikes me that if our grandfathers had been flayed alive by the Turks we should be as strong deadlockers as the Cretan Deputy whose grandfather was so treated.

I dislike meddling with other people's affairs, because other people know their affairs better than I do. There would be no wars if there were no meddling. Let the Cretans swear allegiance to any number of Kings, and let the Turks spite their faces by boycotting Greek cargoes. No one in Europe cares a brass farthing what Greeks and Turks do or do not do. All the Powers care about is to prevent fighting, and this they can do by concerted agreement and without the parade of battleships, which only aggravate the situation. The Turks always bow to the will of Europe.

I am very glad to see the report of the Committee on Street Trading by Children, as I suppose everybody will be who has given much attention to the problems of boy and girl life in big cities. There is no room for two opinions about the evil results of setting children to earn their living in the streets of a place like London. Volumes have been written on it during the past ten years, the present Bishop of London, when he was Bishop of Stepney, having been among the first to direct public attention to the subject. The present report merely collects in a convenient and authoritative form the ugly facts already perfectly familiar to all who are engaged in educational, philanthropic, or religious work among the young. The Committee themselves are perfectly agreed about the nature and extent of the evil; they only differ about the remedies—and that rather in degree than in principle. The public, therefore, can no longer have any excuse for shutting its eyes to this grave social evil, and our legislators can have no excuse for neglecting it.

It rather surprises me, however, that nothing is said in the report about the extension of the age of compulsory school attendance. It has been said over and over again in Truth, and I have never seen any attempt to deny it, that this is the only measure that really goes to the root of the evil. Age limits for street employment must, of course, produce a certain effect, but mere repressive measures are no cure for an evil of this kind.

We don't want to have hordes of young men and women selling matches and newspapers in the streets at the age of twenty any more than at the age of fourteen, though at the latter age it may be worse for them and for society at large. What we want is to put them in the way of doing something better, and the best means to that end is to keep them at school until the dangerous age at which bad habits are easily formed is pretty nearly passed, and to turn them out by that time equipped for something better than what are called "blind-alley occupations." This is the only effectual way of checking the wholesale manufacture of hooligans, loafers, unemployables, and juvenile criminals. The leaders and spokesmen of the working classes perfectly appreciate this. For years past they have been asking, more and more unanimously, for the raising of the school age limit. It will have to be done sooner or later, and it cannot be done too soon.

---

A most striking point in this report is the prominence given in it to the employment of boys in selling newspapers. This is undoubtedly the worst phase of the evil. A few years ago I was present at a meeting where the London boy was under consideration. Among the speakers was Canon Horsley, who gave it as his experience (with apologies to the journalists present) that the point at which a London boy began to go to the devil was that at which he began to be connected with the Press as a retailer of newspapers. The generalisation may have been a little broad, but there is no room for doubt about its substantial truth. It does not touch the Press universally, and my own withers are unwrung. The galled jade who ought to wince under the report of the Departmental Committee is the proprietor of halfpenny evening papers, and possibly also of certain Sunday papers.

Unfortunately the proprietor in this case is generally a company. He has consequently neither a soul to be damned nor a body to be kicked. But several great magnates of journalism have big interests in this direction; while at the head of their staffs are many gentlemen to whom one would be sorry to deny the possession of consciences or the gentler instincts of humanity. They really ought to take up this question for themselves without waiting for the tardy compulsion of Acts of Parliament. Apart from the harm done to the boys, the system of distributing newspapers by the hands of hordes of howling hooligans is a disgrace to a civilised community—especially during the palmy days of flat-racing and football. And the intelligent gentlemen who produce our evening papers for us are quite capable, possibly with the assistance of the police and the municipal authorities, of organising for London a better sort of service altogether.

MALOJA, Engadine, Switzerland.—Palace Hotel. New Heating Installation 1910. 6,000 ft. alt. Completely renov. 1906. Private Baths, Golf, Tennis.—ED. SMART, Mgr. Prospectus on application.

From the answers given in the House of Commons it is evident that Mr. Churchill is taking into serious consideration the question of the imprisonment of youthful offenders in default of payment of fines, and I trust that his expression of disapproval of the fine of £5 inflicted by Mr. Hopkins on a lad for "disorderly conduct," to which attention was directed in Truth last week, will do something to check the manufacture of criminals by the London stipendiaries. Meanwhile evidence of the necessity of action in this matter by the Home Office continues to accumulate. At a recent meeting of the visiting justices at Preston Gaol the cases of several young prisoners committed by the Wigan Bench were carefully reviewed, and the justices felt so strongly in the matter that they paid the fines and costs in four instances so that the lads might be instantly released.

In regard to three of the cases the question arose whether the committing magistrates had given the lads or their parents sufficient time to enable them to pay the penalty imposed, but the fourth came into a different category. This was the case of a lad fifteen years and ten months of age, and, therefore, his committal was in defiance of the provisions of the Children Act, which expressly provides against the committal of a "young person" under the age of sixteen to an ordinary gaol. This lad was committed in default of payment of a fine of 1s. and 13s. 10d. costs, and here again the Wigan magistrates were in error, for the Children Act provides that where a young person is himself ordered to pay costs in addition to a fine the costs are in no case to exceed the amount of the fine. These Wigan Dracos evidently need a lesson.

These are not isolated instances, however. The Lancashire Daily Post publishes a list giving particulars of sixty such cases which passed through Preston Gaol during 1909. Of these eight prisoners had been fined for playing football in the streets, twenty-eight for gaming, one for throwing stones, one for loitering, one for furious driving, eight for touting, nine for obstruction, one for plying for hire at a railway station, two for bathing in a canal, one for railway trespass. These were all youths under the age of twenty-one, who found their way to gaol through inability to pay the fine and costs. The mere fact that the magistrates had themselves imposed a fine makes it clear that their offences were not of a nature which made imprisonment either deserved or desirable, and it is, therefore, to their poverty alone that they owe the ineffaceable degradation of the gaol brand. There is something wrong either with the system or its administrators which permits such a state of things to exist, and Mr Churchill ought to be able to find out the weak spot.

Mr. Sydney Buxton's reply to Mr. Lawson's question in the House as to what the Board of Trade are doing to use their new Labour Exchange machinery for emigrating purposes indicates that the President has the matter in mind. There is no doubt that if the Board of Trade and Colonial Office co-operate much might be done to direct the emigration movement on economic principles, instead of leaving it to the tender mercies of commercial agents disguised as philanthropists. Without bleeding the country of its adult labour a big field is open for diverting the stream of boys and girls from casual "blind-alley" occupations to situations as farm and domestic servants in the Colonies, where they could learn useful work, and then return home to take the places of their parents when the latter were qualified for old-age pensions.

The Canadian Government may be quite justified in requiring that every immigrant shall have £5 in his possession on landing, but the inflexible enforcement of the regulation is sometimes foolish from the point of view of the Dominion, as well as a hardship to the individuals concerned. On the voyage home from Canada recently a correspondent became acquainted with two rejected emigrants. Both men were good types of the British artisan, and they had gone to Canada with excellent credentials and definite promises of employment, but the shipping agent had misled them as to the landing money regulation. One was able to produce nearly £4, the other's cash only fell short of £5 by the amount (2.50 dollars) which he had expended on a cablegram to his mother at home. Both were rejected and deported. In its own interest the Canadian Government should surely allow the immigration officers to exercise some discrimination in cases of this kind.

Baron Schröder's Sèvres porcelain was one of the finest collections of this kind which has ever come into the market. The competition among collectors and dealers was very keen, and in almost all cases the prices realised were in advance of those at which the same articles last changed hands. Three exquisite vases painted by Dodin and Le Guay, which were purchased at the Lyne Stephens sale in 1895 for 5,000 gs., now realised 9,000 gs. They had changed hands at Lord Pembroke's sale in 1851 for 665 gs. The vases and covers painted by Ledoux, which had cost 2,650 gs. at the late Lord Dudley's sale in 1886, now sold for 9,000 gs. A pair of orange tubs, with panels after Boucher, painted by Dodin, rose from 1,900 gs., at the Lyne Stephens sale, to 5,100 gs. An exception to the general tendency of prices was the Gabbitas biberon, to which I referred last week. It realised £10,000, having cost 15,500 gs. about five years ago. Two French snuff-boxes (one Louis XV. and the other Louis XVI.) sold for 4,000 gs. each, while 2,150 gs. were paid for an exquisite little gold tablet case of the Louis XV. epoch. The price for so small an object is quite unexampled.

Some light was thrown upon the county-biography business at an inquest held at Sidmouth last week into the death of a lady who was known as Mrs. North, of Ridge House, Stockland, near Honiton. She seems to have been the author of the various volumes for which "Allan North" so continuously touted for subscribers. Allan North, it appeared, is no other than my old acquaintance Truman Press, whose only serious rival in providing fame for county nonentities is his brother biographer, Manning Press, alias Ernest Gaskill. The unfortunate lady whose body was found on the beach was said by Press to have been recently suffering from depression. As she had been turning out county works at the rate of three or four a year there seems adequate reason for her melancholy, for I can conceive of no more depressing work than that on which she was engaged. One of the witnesses said he had posted from 500 to 1,000 letters a night for her, and this is a further tribute to the industry of the celebrity makers.

The miscellaneous sale at Christie's on Friday was remarkable for two "records." Gainsborough's portrait of Signor Raphael Franco, which was long at Silverton Park, near Exeter, had been purchased at the Egremont sale in May, 1892, for 840 gs, but it now realised 6,200 gs. Hoppner's portrait of Miss Matilda Fielding changed hands at Christie's in May, 1896, when the price was £1,550, but it was now sold for 7,550 gs.

The Vicar of Leeds (Dr. Bickersteth) has selected the Rev. R. H. Malden, Fellow and Lecturer of Selwyn College, Cambridge, to be Principal of the Leeds Clergy School, in the place of Dr. Simpson, who has been appointed by the Crown to succeed to the new Bishop of Lincoln's living at Manchester. Mr. Malden is a most accomplished scholar, and an able and successful teacher. He was trained for holy orders by the Dean of Westminster, and held a curacy at Manchester for three years before he returned to Cambridge at the request of the Dean of Ely, who was the Master of Selwyn College. He is clever, energetic, and practical, and earnestly interested in Church work. The Principal of the Clergy School is ex-officio lecturer at the historic parish church, which, since Dean Hook's time, has been one of the principal centres of reasonable and definite High Church doctrine and practice.

One of the first duties of the new Bishop of Lincoln will be to present to two of the best livings belonging to the See. Grantham, which is one of the most important parochial charges in the diocese, is vacant by the preferment of Bishop McCarthy, and is worth about £700 a year, with house. Algarkirk, vacant by the death of the late rector, is a small parish near Spalding, with a noble church, and the net stipend is over £1,100 a year, with an excellent residence.

---

The Bishop of Winchester has been laid up for some time at Farnham Castle through a varicose vein. The Bishop and Mrs. Ryle are to give their annual garden party in the beautiful grounds of the castle this week, and on Friday, the 22nd, they are going abroad, proceeding first to Ober-Ammergau.

---

The Rev. Reginald H. Yeld, who died last week, was one of the best-known ecclesiastics in the diocese of Durham, where he had worked since his ordination by Bishop Barry in 1875. He was an Evangelical, and an excellent parish clergyman. He took an active part in local affairs, and he was a prominent Freemason. Mr. Yeld's death vacates the rectory of Houghton-le-Spring, to which he was presented about three years ago by the present Bishop of Durham. The net stipend of this living is about £1,000 a year, with house.

A hundred years ago Houghton-le-Spring was a quiet village with beautiful surroundings, and the neighbourhood was one of the best in the North of England. It was said that twenty carriages waited at the church gates every Sunday morning, and thirty footmen sat in the gallery. The living was then a very rich one, and the rector and his wife were among the principal leaders of local society. For the last half century Houghton-le-Spring has been the centre of a flourishing colliery district, and it is one of the blackest places in Durham.

Officers of cadet battalions are very much exercised about the new regulations with regard to their administration, and the opinion of many seems to be that the battalions were better off under the old go-as-you-please arrangement, with the burden of financing themselves, than under the tender mercies of the War Office in their present shape. One correspondent writes:—

> In the past all incidental expenses had to be met out of voluntary subscriptions, but as a set-off against this an appreciative and generous Government supplied free ammunition, camp equipment, and arms. The new regulations withdraw all these privileges; we get no arms, no ammunition, no camp equipment (except on hire), and in exchange are allowed £5 per company. But even this paltry sum is not to be paid direct to the units; it goes direct to the county association, to cover postal and other incidental expenses incurred in administering cadet units. In future a cadet battalion of eight companies will have to pay down at least £2,000 for the provision of arms, £200 per annum for ammunition, and about £100 for the hire of camp necessaries (in addition to uniform, drill hall, etc.); while the county association which administers the unit will receive £40 annually for postal expenses. This must result in wiping out all existing cadet battalions. By the time the "provisional regulations" have been repealed or altered, there will be no cadet battalions to regulate.

This is perhaps a pessimistic view of the situation, but it might be as well if the views of the War Office on the subject were elicited by a question in Parliament. The cadet battalions have an important relation to the general scheme of the Territorial Army. If they are properly efficient they should turn out recruits who have already thoroughly mastered an ordinary recruit's drill, which very much simplifies the problem of territorial training. Starving them is, therefore, a very unwise policy.

The Army Pageant resulted in a financial loss, which is not altogether a matter for surprise, and according to a statement which appeared in the Press the other day, the loss has to be borne by the proposed beneficiaries of the show. One of the performers writes to suggest that under these circumstances certain money which has been subscribed (by the performers) for testimonials to people who have taken the lead in getting up the Pageant should be surrendered and applied to the liquidation of the deficit. There seems a good deal of sense in this, and I am pleased to be able to bring the suggestion to the notice of the parties for whom the testimonials were designed, and who seem to have been already quite adequately paid for their services.

A growl from Lucknow discloses the fact that, although it is left to commanding officers to test men for proficiency pay as often as they please, in the 8th Hussars there has only been one such test during two years, and qualified men have had in consequence to wait for months before drawing the extra pay to which they were entitled. Again, several men who were fully qualified by regulation in all subjects for Class I. proficiency pay (6d. a day) were only awarded Class II. pay (3d. a day) on account of deficient horsemanship. This is not right. To draw proficiency pay in either Class I. or Class II. a cavalry soldier must be a "good horseman," and he is not required to be a better horseman in Class I. than in Class II.

Another complaint is that among those who failed to pass the commanding officer's test were some six or eight non-commissioned officers, who are thereby debarred from drawing their proficiency pay. Unless these non-commissioned officers only held lance rank, this is a breach of the King's Regulations, which distinctly lay down that a sergeant shall be entitled in virtue of his office to draw Class I., and a corporal Class II., proficiency pay. Either these non-commissioned officers ought not to have been promoted as such, or they ought to draw the proficiency pay which their rank entitles them to receive.

A case which I have from a correspondent at Malta exemplifies the lack of consideration which is often shown for the interests of soldiers who are returning to civil life. A twelve-years' man in the Somerset Light Infantry is time-expired in October of this year. He ought by rights to have returned to England last trooping season, with a view to his having a furlough pending discharge for the purpose of trying to get civil employment, to which he had a special claim, as he had enlisted originally from the Duke of York's School, so that in all his life he has had practically no experience of the world outside the Army. He was, however, kept back on the ground that there was no one to take his place as side-drummer in the band; and he cannot, therefore, reach England till within a week or so of his discharge. This is a case in which some one in authority ought to have his knuckles rapped pretty smartly.

The Admiralty orders of Thursday last contained the announcement that the retirement of Commander A. P. Davidson has been cancelled. I trust that the view expressed in Truth last week in regard to the passing over of this meritorious officer may have presented itself to "my Lords."

Captain Trevelyan Napier, M.V.O., who has been in command of the Dartmouth Naval College since August, 1907, is relieving Captain Hugh Evan-Thomas, M.V.O., in the battleship Bellerophon. The latter officer will succeed Captain Napier at Dartmouth. Captain Napier, who is a son of Admiral Napier, has done splendid work in developing the new system of naval training during its most critical phase. Captain Evan-Thomas was private secretary to the First Lord of the Admiralty prior to hoisting his flag in the Bellerophon in December, 1908.

If there should be any uncommon degree of sickness during the naval manœuvres the result would inevitably be a startling disclosure of the scandalous insufficiency of the sick berth staff. The members of this branch number less than 1,150 for the entire British Navy. The mobilisation of the Fleet has denuded the naval hospitals to such an extent that it is "under consideration" to call in outside assistance temporarily. A battleship of the Third Home Fleet has a sick bay staff of one steward and one attendant. The attendant lately fell ill. Application to the sick headquarters of the command for another attendant was met with the reply that not a single man was available. For thirty-five days the sick bay steward had to do all the nursing work of a big ship single-handed, and only twice during the whole time did he get ashore for an hour or two, although the vessel was in harbour all the while. And this during the normal routine of peace. One shudders to think what would happen in war.

With regard to calling in outside assistance during the manœuvres, it may be mentioned that there is a Sick Berth Reserve in existence. Any qualified member of the St. John's Ambulance Corps may be enrolled in it. But I am told that there are probably not a dozen sailors on the entire strength of this reserve, so that its sea-going value is insignificant. A sea-sick attendant would prove a bad nurse and a dangerous dresser. Why should the oft-repeated request of the sick berth staff to be enrolled in the Royal Fleet Reserve be still consistently ignored? The average age at which a sick berth steward goes on pension is about forty. His services are then lost to the country, when he ought to be in the zenith of his training, and should be good for at least another ten years as a reservist. Here is one simple and efficient remedy for the present state of things.

The application of the Greenwich Hospital fund to the payment of the pensions of the Royal Fleet Reserve is the latest bit of jugglery with this much-abused institution. It is laid down that the award of the regular Reserve pension "will not affect a pensioner's claim to the Greenwich Hospital pensions of 5d. and 9d. a day, but when either of the latter is awarded the Reserve pension will cease." Exactly; and in this way it becomes a matter of economy to confer as many Greenwich pensions as possible upon the Fleet reservists, and save the corresponding amount chargeable to the Navy Estimates. This, I understand, is just what is now being done, notwithstanding that the Greenwich Hospital fund was instituted for the benefit of veterans and invalids.

The shortage of the accountant staff in the Third Division of the Home Fleet was remarked upon in Truth a week or two ago. I have since heard that in the Fourth Division things are very much worse. One ship with a nucleus complement of 108 had recently a single ship's steward's assistant, combining the steward's duties with those of writer and captain's clerk, being responsible for all service correspondence, and having the victualling accounts and large quantities of stores under his command, though not actually any money account. A "parent ship," with frequently as many as five tenders, has an accountant staff of one fleet paymaster and an assistant paymaster, who are responsible for all money payments, stores, clothing, etc., of the whole six vessels. This state of things seems bound to lead to trouble of some kind.

There has lately been a loud cry for a more efficient system of coast patrol in North Devon. The Admiralty have not seen their way to satisfy the demand, but they have found it necessary to create Torquay a divisional coastguard station. Commander Frederick K. C. Gibbons has been appointed to this new post, and the status and strength of the Torquay coastguard establishment will be greatly enhanced. Torquay is a pleasant spot, and no doubt the gallant commander and his men would sooner be stationed there than at Hartland or Trevose. But that they would be infinitely more useful at either of these spots is a proposition not open to serious dispute.

---

The cruiser Proserpine has just been re-commissioned at Aden for two years' more service against gun-runners in the Persian Gulf. The Gibraltar took out her relief crew, and is bringing home the time-expired complement. Amongst these are several cases of beri-beri. The ship had just previously sent home four critical cases of this horrible disease in the P. and O. liner China, amongst them being the paymaster. I thought it was pretty well agreed by medical men in these days that beri-beri infects the dwellings in which sufferers are lodged, and that it particularly attaches itself to woodwork. If this is so a very grave risk must be incurred in turning over a ship to a new crew under such conditions, and in the climate of Aden.

The Fisgard training establishment for boy-artificers has been moved from Chatham to Devonport. The Indus training establishment has been transferred from Devonport to Chatham. I hope this chop and change may be made the occasion of much-needed modifications in both systems. The method of entering the boy-artificers leaves much to be desired, whilst the manner in which promotion is being retarded amongst the existent artificer class until these youngsters are ready to supplant them is scandalous. The mechanicians are a costly blunder, whose existence bars the road to warrant rank to 30,000 stokers in their legitimate rôle, and usurps the functions of the infinitely more efficient E.R.A. branch. In short, "not wanted" would be the fitting requiem to this futile experiment.

As time goes on I do not see much reason for qualifying the opinions I have hazarded about aeroplanes and dirigibles. Aviators continue to break their necks with remarkable regularity, and now an air-woman has all but shared the same fate. Dirigibles are proved by the fate of the "Deutschland"—not to mention its predecessors—to be dirigible only so long as the wind does not overpower their engines. For the present, at any rate, they are only fair-weather craft, and must be sure of finding suitable harbours and anchorage within easy reach, unless in countries where sudden and unexpected falls of the barometer are rare—a defect which must handicap them seriously in the British Isles.

---

The aeroplane also is obviously very much at the mercy of the wind. In bad weather the "air-men" will only leave the ground to avoid disappointing a crowd which has paid its gate-money. A very great danger arises from this fact, which the managers of aviation meetings in England will have to recognise and guard against if they do not desire to figure as accessories on charges of manslaughter. The "conquest of the air," which looms so big in newspaper headlines, is obviously still in a purely experimental stage. In spite of all the silly talk about the imperative necessity of our being abreast of foreign nations in the achievement of this conquest, nobody has yet been able to explain the utility of the existing machines, except for military purposes, and here they can only be useful at present for purposes of observation. Aeroplaning may possibly have its attractions as a sport, but these are largely discounted by its obvious dangers.

Doubtless the present experiments will lead to further developments in course of time. We may see any day some new type of aeroplane which will not be liable to capsize in an unexpected gust of wind, or to drop like a stone when its engine stops. In the meantime, if I were going in for this form of sport, I think I should devote myself to designing some sort of parachute attachment which would lower either the machine or me to the ground gently and safely in the event of circumstances unexpectedly precluding my remaining longer aloft.

The great prize-fight in the United States has given European nations in general, and England in particular, the opportunity of thanking God that they are not as this publican; but the spirit of the pharisee seems rather out of place in our case. The London daily papers were full of the event for two or three days, and if the space they devoted to it bears any relation to the interest taken in it by their readers, it is a fair conclusion that a similar fight in this country would have drawn quite as big and probably as distinguished a crowd. It has yet to be seen whether cinematograph reproductions of the spectacle will not prove attractive over here; and if British managers hesitate now about making the experiment it will probably be because America has set the example of forbidding such shows. The truth is that there is just as strong a feeling against this particular form of brutality in the United States as in other civilised countries, and it is as absurd as it is unfair to treat the manners and customs of Nevada as typical of those of the Union at large.

Far more horrible than the fight and its surrounding circumstances is the outburst of racial violence which followed it. But the spirit which manifests itself in this ugly shape is in no way peculiar to the United States. The sentiment of the white man towards the black is essentially the same wherever the two come into contact. The Briton and the Boer in South Africa do not differ from the American in this respect. That the sentiment occasionally manifests itself more ferociously in America than elsewhere is probably due to the different position that the negro occupies there.

Near to Norwich is a village named Postwick, which is a favourite resort of the city's inhabitants for its rural beauties, or it was so until the Norwich Corporation selected it as a suitable spot for dumping the contents of the city dustbins. Now picnic parties avoid it as they would the plague, for the scent of its roses is submerged in less attractive odours, and the villagers have to barricade their houses against the swarms of flies which are bred in the refuse heap. The medical officer of health has reported that the health of Postwick is seriously menaced, and an appeal is to be made to the Local Government Board to reason with the Norwich City Council on its lack of consideration for the village at their borders. I hope the Council will prove amenable to reason, for they must see the paradox involved in throwing their rubbish where they throw their love.

THE AMATEUR GARDENER.

("The average man rarely takes to gardening before he is married."—Weekly Paper.)

Ah! I remember somewhere in my cranium
The garden where I used to loll and yawn,
The sickly pink, the rose, the red geranium
Around our ragged lawn.

I recollect our golden-haired Hesperides—
My sisters—for they held me then in awe,
And the deep hollows where our doggie buried his Bones with a privy paw.

I think of how my mother oft times fearfully
Would ask of me—an unobliging kid
To dig, and how I used to promise cheerfully,
Only I never did.

Those were the times, too, when I hadn't got any Knowledge of things that grow in bed or pot,
And little minded, for I hated botany,
Whether I had or not.

But what a change to-day! Although my knowledge is Up to this moment little short of bad,
To-day, I say, without mere vain apologies,
I'm getting gardening mad.

I mow my little lawn with regularity;
I have to labour nightly like a horse
Because the grass has this peculiarity,
It grows in tufts like gorse.

I garden not because the work's congenial,
Indeed I loathe that simple sort of life;
I do it—well, because I'm now a menial,
I'm ordered by my wife!

The Incorporated Law Society reminds me of a lady who suddenly takes to discoursing publicly about her virtue. It is notorious that for years past solicitors have been robbing their clients right and left. Brahmins of Chancery Lane have figured among the most conspicuous robbers. The public has cried aloud for protection against them. Solicitors, ashamed of the reproach cast upon the profession, have vainly agitated and laboured for reform. All this time the Council of the Incorporated Law Society has never stirred a finger to abate the scandal—not even when the chairman of its Discipline Committee was sent to penal servitude. But when the Chancellor of the Exchequer reproaches the Law Society with putting the interests of the profession before those of the public, the Society holds a sort of public demonstration, and vindicates its honour by passing resolutions. I fear this imposing display of virtue will only move the world to laughter.

The result of the prosecution of the Master of the Cambridge Drag Hunt in connection with the cruelty to a hind last autumn might have been expected from the position the Cambridge magistrates took up when they first dealt with the case. First, they decided that there was no case to answer, as the deer was not in captivity. The High Court corrected them on that point. Now they find that it is not cruelty to drag the scared animal from a place of shelter for a renewal of the hunt, even though it dropped dead in the roadway after it had injured itself in its attempts to escape from its tormentors. There is no sickly sentimentalism about the Cambridge magistrates, and it is just as evident that they have no more comprehension of the true meaning of the word sport than the young barbarians who engaged in the hunt. Perhaps public opinion will enlighten them on this point.

The Tunbridge Wells magistrates last week fined a boy 6s. 6d. or seven days' imprisonment for trespassing on the railway line. The lad was of good character, the support of his widowed mother, and he had gone on to the line to pick a few flowers to place on his father's grave. The magistrates may have thought they punished the boy for his own good. The effect is more likely to be to fill him with hatred and contempt for the law and those who administer it.

ROYAL SOCIETY FOR PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS. 6,550 convictions last year. Complaints marked "Private" absolutely confidential.—SECRETARY, 105, Jermyn Street, London.

Two lucky beggars who found themselves in Aberystwyth Police Court were told by the magistrate, Mr. John Gibson, that although it was an offence against the law to beg, the local governing body of the town sanctioned begging, and he discharged them with the advice to beg as much as they liked. It is all very well, Mr. Gibson, for you to hold opinions about the desirability of allowing begging for charitable objects in the streets—in fact, I share them with you—but, at the same time, it is your duty as a magistrate to enforce the law—to administer justice, not sarcasm, however well deserved.

By the way, an illustration of the evil which results from such public lessons in the art of begging as those to which Mr. Gibson objects was afforded at the Chester children's court last week, where a brother and sister, aged fourteen and fifteen respectively, were charged with obtaining charitable contributions by fraud. Since January they have been going about, provided with collecting books, representing that they were collecting on behalf of Baden-Powell's boy scouts. They had a rubber stamp for giving receipts, and altogether they had managed to collect over £5, which had been expended in various ways. When it is so easily demonstrated to the youthful mind that money is to be had for the asking, it is surprising that there are not more child beggars about.

Another invasion of the Assyrians is reported from the North of England. The advance guard, which landed at Hull, got no further, however, than Burton-on-Trent, where they fell into the hands of the constabulary. Their names were Michael Emanuel and Miles Georges, and from books in their possession it was found that they had already obtained £24, on the strength of credentials from the Bishop of Chaldea, for Assyrian orphanages. This is, I take it, my old friend Mar Shimon (No. 13 Truth Cautionary List), Patriarch of the Chaldeans of the East, who furnishes credentials, for a consideration, to members of the tribe of Jilu when they set out, according to tribal custom, on a begging tour with England or America as their ultimate objective. The magistrates before whom Emanuel and Georges were brought cannot have been aware that a number of these tribesmen have already been sentenced to imprisonment and deportation, or they would have scarcely found it necessary to remand them on bail for inquiries.

Sheriff Campbell Smith, of Dundee, is an able lawyer, but he is sometimes as eccentric in his decisions as were some of the Judges of the Court of Session of a hundred years ago. The Sheriff recently dealt with a workman's compensation case, which turned on the state of the applicant's eyesight. His lordship put the claimant into the witness box, and proceeded to examine the injured eye himself, with the result that he decided that the damage had been exaggerated, so he reduced the amount of compensation. There was an appeal to the Court of Session, which remitted the case back to the Sheriff for new procedure. It was certainly in the highest degree absurd and unbecoming for the Sheriff to make himself judge, jury, counsel, and expert witness, all combined into one individual.

The first introduction of dogs into the police force of the country has been made at Glasgow, where four Airedale terriers have reported themselves at headquarters. Prior to being taken out on duty the dogs are to undergo a short training. With a view to making them suspicious of strangers, no person, not even a constable in civilian garb, is to be allowed near them. This does not seem very reassuring for the nervous civilian who may happen on his way home to meet P.C. Grip on his nightly beat. It is to be hoped that Grip's superior officer will not be very far away. At all events, the experiment is one which will be watched with interest, the only doubtful point to my mind being whether the constable's attention will not be occupied with the dog to the detriment of his more immediate duties.

The usually Argus-eyed Press of Edinburgh has lately suffered from a strange attack of defective vision. Patrick Thomson, Limited, a big local drapery firm, were convicted and fined for having advertised and sold as "Scotch tweed, all wool," cloth containing 45 per cent. of cotton. Not only did the papers miss the case at the Edinburgh Sheriff Court, but they also failed to notice the subsequent meeting of the South of Scotland Chamber of Commerce, at which reference was made to the prosecution. On previous occasions the Chamber's efforts for the protection of the tweed industry have received publicity and commendation. But, after all, the omission of this case may not have been due to any lack of journalistic vigilance. Newspapers have many demands upon their space, and possibly these reports were crowded out by the advertisements of Patrick Thomson, Limited.

The renewal of Sunday Trading prosecutions at Yarmouth by order of the Watch Committee, to judge from recent proceedings, is not likely to be more effective than the similar campaign some years ago. For one thing, the Bench is divided against itself as to the wisdom of proceeding under the obsolete Act of Charles II., and for another there is an element of unfairness in the selection of a few tradesmen for prosecution. It was urged on behalf of one defendant that every one should be served alike, whether tradesmen, street hawkers, or the Corporation, which, it was pointed out, carried on its tramway business and ran musical entertainments for a profit on the pier on Sunday. Municipal hypocrisy is no more palatable than the personal form.

The activity of the free portrait gentry was demonstrated in two parts of the country last week. At Ulverstone the "York City Artists' Guild" made an ineffectual attempt to recover in the county court a couple of guineas for two frames from the proprietress of a boarding house who had been promised two enlargements free. The frames were proved to be worth only 4s. 9d. each, and the judge in finding for the defendant also warned the plaintiff against the use of the blue paper "penny frighteners" which are so popular with these people. The other case was in Essex, where the Witham magistrates fined a free portrait tout £5 for theft of a sovereign as bailee. He had foisted a frame on a servant girl at the price of 10s. 6d., and being entrusted with a sovereign had decamped with the change. It is a pity he was not sent to gaol without the option of a fine, for he richly deserved it.

From the outcome of two or three prosecutions at the instance of the R.S.P.C.A. at Truro recently it would seem as if the magistrates of the Cornish city are under the impression that punishment of offences against dumb animals might injure the business of their cattle market. One would hesitate to believe, however, that this can be the motive which animates them in dismissing cases in which the evidence would appear conclusive to any one but the occupants of the bench. Most likely it is merely stupidity.

A PROTECTED INDUSTRY.

("With divorce as a protection, marriage becomes a wise investment."—Mr. Plowden.)

"Be mine!" I cried, and took her hand.
Said she, "We've scarcely met;
Your haste I fail to understand;
You cannot love me yet."

"Who spoke of love?" I made reply;
"I'm asking you to wed."
"But surely that does love imply,"
Said she, and tossed her head.

Said I, "That is a great mistake"
(Wide opened she her eyes),
"A sound investment I would make,
And one that's reckoned wise."

She laughed. "Wise to espouse a maid
Of whom you nothing know,
And one you love not? I'm afraid
I cannot marry so."

"How dreadful if we grew to hate!
(She gave her skirts a whisk)
I will not tempt unkindly fate,
I cannot take the risk."

"There is a risk," I answering said;
"That's obvious, of course;
But think of the protection shed
Upon us by divorce!"

. . . . .

We married; but I quickly found,
To my extreme surprise,
That my investment wasn't sound,
And very far from wise.

For when to court I later went
To plead for a decree,
I won—but somehow every cent
Of costs was charged to me!

An Army officer sends me a batch of low-comedy picture postcards, which he has received from "The Card Company," Willesden Junction, together with the usual circular commencing "Dear friend," and offering him the usual present of shoddy jewellery if he will sell the cards amongst his friends and remit 1s. 2d. for them. It is perhaps lucky that the officer in question is quartered in Ireland, or the "company" might find that his "dear friend" strongly resents the imputation that he is willing to tout for the sale of penny pictorial vulgarities amongst his acquaintances. In this case the company has a body to be kicked, and if he does not select the recipients of circulars and postcards with more discretion kicking is very likely to be his fate sooner or later.

James Brown, 260, Great King Street, Birmingham, says that he is known all over the world as Great Britain's Premier Prophet. His idea of his fame is perhaps a trifle exaggerated, but it is surprising that he should have been unknown to a reader of Truth, whom he has just favoured with an offer of an extraordinary double event—"two real good things" on which he can "go for a 'parcel' and fear nothing whatever." Beston, the chief of the tribe of swindling tipsters, is constantly discarding old aliases and assuming new ones, but there are a few to which he has remained faithful for years, and "James Brown" is among the oldest of them.

A singular decision has been given by Mr. Mead at Marlborough Street Police Court in a case in which one A. V. Witkowsky, otherwise known as A. V. M. Cole, and also as the Army and General Exchange, was summoned for sending moneylending circulars to two minors, who are second lieutenants in the 3rd Dragoon Guards. In March and again in May last I pilloried the defendant, and suggested that he should be prosecuted both for non-registration under the Moneylenders Act and for inviting minors to apply for loans. He seems to have heard that this suggestion was likely to be adopted, for after the appearance of my second paragraph he called at the office of the Public Prosecutor and, in conversation with a clerk, "objected" to what Truth had said. In due course, however, proceedings were taken against him under the Betting and Loans (Infants) Act, and at the hearing of the case it was shown that the ages of the officers to whom the circulars were addressed might have been ascertained by a reference to the quarterly Army List.

Witkowsky's defence was that he had given instructions in his office that no circulars should be sent to second lieutenants. He also stated that he had discharged the lady clerk who sent the circulars in respect of which he was summoned. Accepting this evidence, Mr. Mead came to the conclusion that defendant did not cause the circulars to be sent, dismissed one summons, and adjourned the other sine die. I am glad to see that counsel for the Public Prosecutor intimated that there will be an appeal from this decision. If it is allowed to stand it will practically knock the bottom out of a most useful piece of legislation, for conviction will be almost impossible if the circularisers cannot be held strictly responsible for the acts of their servants. Meanwhile, I should like to know why Witkowsky has not been proceeded against for non-registration under the Act. This individual, who says that he has himself been a lieutenant in the Army, has engaged in a most mischievous and reprehensible system of circularising young officers, and he ought not to be allowed to escape the penalty for any offence that he has committed.

An American lady visitor at a West-End hotel tells me that she has been greatly annoyed by an offer of an advance of cash from "John Weston." She does not require a loan, she has no acquaintance with "John Weston" (whose real name, by the way, is Pockett), and she considers it an impertinence that he should write to her as "dear madam." In particular, she thinks that the sending of the circular to a hotel in an open envelope—he frugally uses the halfpenny post—may cause doubts to be cast upon her solvency. As to that, I can re-assure the lady. Everybody would be regarded as hard-up if the attentions of Weston and his tribe conveyed that imputation. None of us, rich or poor, can escape the notice of these pests, and I am afraid it would be futile to ask them to leave our visitors alone.

One does not care to say much about the public school boy who has come down in the world even when he does take to begging-letter writing. Therefore, when I warn old Rugbeians and others against responding to the appeals of a Mr. W. L. F. Billington, who tells a pitiful story of illness and distress, and assure them that he is an entirely undeserving object of charity, I feel that I have said all that is needful.

A begging-letter writer regarding whom a word of warning is desirable at the moment is Bruno von Hohnfeldt. (No. 82, TRUTH Cautionary List.) He has only recently been liberated from prison, but is once more at his old game. He usually represents himself to be a medical man, and in that capacity appeals for assistance on behalf of some patient in whom he is interested. His latest assumption is the name of B. R. Connolly, and he gives 2, Upper Rathbone Place, Tottenham Court Road, as his address. The only medical man of that name on the register is now resident in Madeira, a fact with which Hohnfeldt was doubtless aware when he appropriated it for begging purposes.

Dealings with peripatetic gentlemen who go up and down the country with novelties to dispose of are rarely satisfactory. One of them, a Mr. H. Hopkins, whose card bears also the name of the British Economic Gas-Light Co., and the address 25, Emerson Street, Hightown, Manchester, has recently been in the neighbourhood of Nottingham. He sells self-lighting gas mantles, promising that the representative of the firm will call in a few days, and if the mantles prove to be unsatisfactory the money paid for them will be returned. After a few days the mantles get tired of lighting themselves. The purchasers also get tired—of waiting for the arrival of the Economic gas man. This may tend to economise gas and thus justify the name of the company, but it means a penny-wise policy.

A lady in Ireland, answering an advertisement in a paper called the Feathered World, sent 17s. 6d. for a turkey-hen and ten chicks to a dealer in Edmonton, and when she found that she had been swindled, wrote to complain to me of the newspaper for inserting the advertisement. At one time and another a good many similar complaints have been brought to my notice in regard to the Feathered World, but after communication with the proprietors I am quite sure that they make every effort to exclude the advertisements of swindlers. Further, as an additional protection to their readers, they have an arrangement whereby the cash of purchasers is held on deposit against delivery of the birds advertised. If purchasers do not choose to avail themselves of the protection thus afforded, and send their cash without inquiry or reference to unknown persons, I really do not think that they have much right to complain when they lose it.

Four years have elapsed since the last warning appeared in TRUTH against the methods adopted by Mr. James Aspdin, J.P., of Pendock, Staunton, Gloucestershire, for obtaining premiums for placing farm pupils in Canada. But from a correspondence placed in my hands it would seem that the warning is needed just as much to-day. On the last occasion he got into communication with would-be emigrants in the name of one Farrant, who represented himself as a successful result of Aspdin's efforts. To-day it is another "old pupil," signing himself J. Selwyn, who blows Aspdin's trumpet as the one agent able to place the youthful emigrant on the path to success. Comparison of handwriting leaves no possible doubt that Farrant and Selwyn are one and the same person, and the mere fact that this gentleman has found it necessary to change his name in the past four years is a very good reason for taking his advice with a grain of salt.

Apart from this, however, it is worth recalling that the Canadian Government has for years warned the public against Aspdin and all his class. Aspdin, indeed, has a special grievance against the Canadian emigration authorities because they refused to exempt him from their official warnings, and for a long time he retaliated by denouncing Government agents and official emigration pamphlets. Naturally the advice given by the Canadian Emigration Department to the effect that payment of premiums for placing farm pupils is sheer waste of money is not to the taste of those who are engaged in the business, but for that very reason it cannot be too widely known.

The following curious advertisement has been appearing for a considerable time in the Church of Ireland Gazette:—

> Clergymen from remote places invited to send age and get particulars of our great Mutual Life Company. Total business, £99,999,999. Profits—three times others. J. F. Bennis, clerical stock and share broker and insurance agent, 30, George Street, Limerick.

Perhaps this clerical stockbroker—a new species of broker—has done himself less than justice in framing his advertisement. It would, however, be interesting to know why he appeals especially to clergymen in remote places, and also to have the name of the life insurance company whose "total business" is just twenty shillings less than a hundred millions, and whose profits are treble any other company's.

THE PERFECT LIE.

("Three things are needed for a lie."—Professor Paterson.)

There is a frequent sin that soils the breast,
Which when it journeys upwards from the chest
And leaves a lung,
Causes the sinner, whether man or brat,
To wish, a moment after, that He'd held his tongue:
It sometimes saves his miserable skin,
Yet then makes such a din,
That fain the fool would fly;
And what I here refer to is a Lie.

Now there are three essential things to find
Before you get a whacker of the kind
That's worth its salt;
And if Beelzebub, their Father, fails
At times to find a listener for his tales,
It may not be his fault.
First, to draw out the story from the throat,
Please do not fail to note,
A man must find, or try to,
A party suitable to tell a lie to.

And secondly, I hardly need explain,
There must be something in the author's brain
To lie about,
The which will fashion, if the tongue be glib,
An all but perfect fib
Without a doubt.
But most of all, to make the lie complete,
One, lastly, has to meet
The spark who makes the fire;
In other words, one has to find the Liar!

While the Government is still considering the possibility of a scheme of State insurance against unemployment, a private company has boldly tackled that formidable task. It is styled the Rampart Unemployment and General Insurance Co., Limited, and it was incorporated so recently as April 29. As it is registered as a private company only a few particulars are available at Somerset House, but it appears that the authorised capital is £10,000, that Mr. William George Leslie is the managing director for life, and that Mr. Howell William Powell, of 13, Elmfield Road, Balham, is the secretary. No return showing what amount of the capital is actually subscribed has yet been filed. The company, however, is now seeking agents, and from an office at Birkbeck Bank Chambers it is sending out printed papers telling all and sundry how "they can be sure of 20s. a week when out of work."

It seems that in return for a premium of 2s. a month the company will undertake to pay a policyholder (after his policy has been in existence for six months) £1 a week for the first four weeks of unemployment, 12s. 6d. a week for the ensuing four weeks, and 7s. 6d. a week for the next five weeks. This is an alluring proposition, but before working people are induced to become subscribers it might be desirable for Mr. Leslie to explain what experience he has had of insurance business and upon what data it has been estimated that the company can provide these benefits for policyholders—to say nothing of profits for the proprietors—out of the proposed premiums. Personally, I cannot see how the thing can be done, nor can the insurance expert whom I have consulted. It would also be well for Mr. Leslie to state the amount of the cash resources of the company. The statement on the prospectus, "Authorised capital, £10,000," is not only worthless, but—as is expressly recognised in the new Act now in force—it is likely to be misleading.

The reference in Truth last week to the case of Mrs. Jack, the paying guest who was used as a bait for guinea fees by both Austen Debenham and Co. and Glyn and Co., has produced a letter from Miss Carter, of 8, Perham Road, West Kensington, who states that Mrs. Jack has now fully satisfied all claims against her by the lady who entertained her. I am glad to hear it. Miss Carter has, however, failed to furnish any explanation of how it was that Mrs. Jack came to figure as a client both of Debenham and Co. and Glyn and Co. I can only translate her silence on this point into a recognition of the correctness of my deduction that both firms are merely aliases of William Bartlett, with whom she has been so long connected. Under the circumstances the fact that fees were taken by both firms for introductions to Mrs. Jack, who could only be communicated with through Miss Carter herself, wears a very ugly look.

A FEW POSERS.

Dear Truth,
To you I must apply,
For all things known you know;
Please solve for me each little "why"
Which I append below.

Why such a charm erotic lies
For lovers in the moon;
Why May-flies should be called May-flies
When they don't come till June;

Why half the public rush to buy
Right on the market's top;
Why parsons swallow every lie
Of every bucket-shop;

Why laundries play the deuce with shirts,
Of collars make such hash;
Why touting tipster-men's dead certs.
Are certs. for losing cash;

Why girls on land who'd blush to show
Their stockinged limbs to me
Will show them nude, nor care a blow,
While bathing in the sea;

Why Fry imported players dubs
A humbugging device,
When he himself by county clubs
Has been imported twice;

Why Editors, in every case,
To print my verse are loth;
Why comminations still disgrace
The Coronation Oath;

Why——
(Truth, interposing): Here, hold hard! No Solon I, Nor Solomon the great.
I'm only Truth. The authors try
Of "Wisdom while you Wait."

SCRUTATOR.

TRADE UNIONS AND LABOUR EXCHANGES.

I HAVE been watching the establishment of Labour Exchanges with benevolent interest, and without joining in the chorus of criticism which has poured from the mouths not only of Tory opponents but of candid friends on our own side of politics. In setting up the exchanges Government is attempting to organise, direct, and control the industrial labour market throughout the country—a task of considerable magnitude, which cannot be undertaken without upsetting the apple-carts of some people and disturbing the hen-roosts of others; but, on the whole, the exchanges have made a good start, and are pushing their way with better results than I ever expected. Perhaps their chief claim to success is that they are not giving complete satisfaction either to employers or to men. On the one hand, we have the employers demanding that the exchanges should only register the unemployed, and not those who are already in situations but wish to better themselves; on the other hand are the trade unions, with their demand for preferential treatment. Between the Scylla of chambers of commerce and the Charybdis of trade unions the exchanges must steer a middle course, or they will suffer shipwreck.

As I understand the matter from Mr. Churchill's explanations in the House of Commons, the primary function of labour exchanges is to mobilise labour by bringing employers and men together under the most convenient conditions for doing business one with another. When they have done this their task is finished; employers and men must do the rest. The exchanges are not concerned with wages, which must be settled by mutual bargain between those who want work done and those who are willing to do it. In order to keep up wages and keep down hours the men band themselves in unions, which are powerful or weak according to their success or failure to enrol members who will consent to be bound by union rules. The exchanges recognise the unions, but to no greater extent than they recognise individuals outside them, it being no part of their duty to inquire whether applicants for situations are working in union or "on their own." Only a section of the industrial population have joined the unions, and if the exchanges were to give preferential treatment to these men they would be ignoring the claims of non-unionists, who have as much right as their union brethren to benefit by the national register which they help to pay for from their share of taxation.

The unions are complaining, among other things, that the labour exchanges are trespassing on their preserves by placing their members in situations which were formerly found for them by their own society officials. Surely this is no cause of complaint, for are not the exchanges doing at the taxpayers' cost what the unions formerly did at their own expense? Hitherto the unions have sunk much of their subscribed funds in bad debts owing to members being unable to repay loans for travelling expenses. These debts will in future be transferred to the State—not a bad arrangement for the unions, whatever it may be for the taxpayers. Members' subscriptions can now be lowered or devoted to other purposes, such as canvassing for more members—a much-needed requirement—and increasing sick and unemployed benefits.

If trade unionists are to dominate the Labour market they must cease to be dogs in the manger. Sweating can best be defeated by combination, which makes the most, not the least, of individual effort. Pooling wages for piece work, as the Newport stevedores recently did, is the abnegation of efficiency, for it removes the incentive to excel. In every union there should be graded classes with comparative wage scales, promotion from a lower to a higher class being a matter of internal agreement by means of a selection board. I wish a great organiser like Mr. Haldane would take the trade unions in hand, for at present they are run on too parochial lines to enable them to exert the full authority derived from well-organised combination. What is wanted is better local organisation and stronger central concentration. There are nearly 2,500,000 members in the various trade societies—a goodly number, but not enough to command success. These numbers must be at least doubled before the unions can claim a monopoly to dictate. Then, as regards concentration, there are only 700,000 affiliated members in the General Federation of Trade Unions. Herein lies the chief weakness of the men's organisation. All men in all unions should join the federation, and until they do so local strength will be wasted, energy frittered away, and the power to fight capitalism correspondingly weakened.

THE CHEAP-JACK AND THE CARMELITE.

Through having given publicity last week to the very interesting views of Mr. R. Hamilton Edwards on the evils of competitions in Answers, particularly those in which very big prizes are offered, my attention has been called to another department of the Carmelite House literary factory. Mr. Edwards seems fortunate in the possession of friends who are anxious that the good deeds which he does by stealth should be proclaimed upon the housetops. It is a pleasure to me to assist them on this occasion, because the matter to which I am coming has already been the subject of a little interchange of compliments between Mr. Edwards and Truth. At that time Mr. Edwards was responsible—and I suppose that, more or less, he is so still—for a huge weekly output of cheap reading matter for the young under such titles as the Boys' Friend, the Boys' Herald, the Boys' Realm, the Union Jack, the Marvel Library, the Pluck Library, and the Boys' Friend 3d. Library. The advertisement columns of these journals appeared to be the happy hunting ground of a horde of cheap-jacks of various degrees of honesty, all bent—like Mr. Edwards himself—on charming the small change out of the pockets of small boys. As the result of answering one of these advertisements a gentleman in Lancashire was swindled to the tune of 8s. 6d., and addressed a complaint on the subject to the editor. The advertiser, then calling himself the Kew Trading Association, was a rascal who had been under notice in Truth for several years, and had figured in the annual Cautionary List, and when his victim wrote to complain of the advertisement he mentioned that he had also communicated with Truth on the subject. This elicited from Mr. Hamilton Edwards a letter in which he signified his personal contempt for Truth, and, at the same time, his refusal to acknowledge that his correspondent had any grievance. If he were for a moment sure that his advertisers were guilty of the practices imputed to them, he would "throw their advertisements out of all our publications at once," but in the absence of proof he must, in common justice, listen to the advertiser's explanation, which he found to be "a sound, straightforward one."

On this correspondence coming to my knowledge—as, of course, it speedily did—I did my best to enlighten Mr. Edwards about his advertiser, giving him particulars of various swindles in which the party calling himself the Kew Trading Company had been engaged. Mr. Edwards had amiably referred to Truth as a "frequently unjust journal." It was his own scrupulous sense of justice that led him to reject the complaint of his reader. Until he had proof he preferred the "sound, straightforward" explanation of his advertiser. Well, I gave him three columns of proof, cherishing the hope that a man whose sense of justice is one of his strong points would gather from this evidence that he himself had been far from just either to his own reader or to the frequently unjust journal Truth. Possibly my efforts never came to his notice; a gentleman who is engaged in editing seven or more journals at once, in addition to all the other duties devolving on a director of the Amalgamated Press, naturally has little time for reading other people's productions. Possibly, he consulted the Kew Trading Association again and received another sound straightforward explanation of the various swindles. Anyhow, the advertisements of this firm continued to appear in the Hamilton Edwards group of journals as before.

But in the meantime Justice has vindicated herself without the assistance of this gentleman. A few weeks ago, as noted in Truth at the time, one Alfred Powell was convicted at the Old Bailey of certain frauds perpetrated by means of newspaper advertisements, and was sentenced to four months' imprisonment. The frauds with which he was charged had been committed under the alias of the "Wellington Supply Co.," but he had previously been one of the parties running the Kew Trading Company. Among other aliases under which he had operated were the "Kew Seed Company," the "Royal Card Company," and "Philip Leslie and Co." Evidently Powell's sound, straightforward explanations of his system of trick advertising made considerably less impression upon a judge and jury at the Central Criminal Court than they did upon Mr. Hamilton Edwards. Indeed, I am sorry to say that the judge, in passing sentence, went so far as to intimate his opinion that the prisoner in the dock was not the only party who ought to be there, and to express his regret that he had not the power to punish those ornaments of the press who further the operations of swindlers like Powell, and secure a share of their plunder, by publishing their advertisements. However strongly Mr. Edwards may believe that Truth is frequently unjust, he must, I think, recognise that in this instance its judgment has been endorsed by a somewhat higher authority than his.

Heaven forbid that I should give this gentleman any reason to suggest that Truth has been unjust towards him personally. I say nothing, therefore, of the fact that since the conviction of Powell an advertisement of the Royal Card Company has been appearing in some of the boys' papers above-mentioned—side by side with those of various other ornaments of the Truth Cautionary List. One of them appeared so lately as Saturday last. It may be that Mr. Edwards has found the labour of supervising all these journals too much for him and has washed his hands of it; or that he has not heard of the conviction of Powell; or that he has reason to suppose that the fate of that individual has worked a reformation among his fellow-advertisers. By all means let him have the benefit of any sound, straightforward explanation which can be put forward on his behalf.

But with every desire to be not only just but merciful, one must confess that Mr. Edwards seems unfortunate in getting into equivocal positions. As managing editor of Answers he goes before a Parliamentary Committee and testifies to the evil results of newspaper competitions on the coupon principle. He is particularly down on very big prizes, and he throws valuable light on the humbug of birth-rate competitions. A few months afterwards out comes Answers with a "record offer" of £5,000 for one of these very competitions. Again, as managing editor of seven boys' papers he justifies the acceptance of catch-penny advertisements from a firm who have been repeatedly denounced in Truth as swindlers. One of the principals in this firm is convicted of fraud at the Old Bailey, and the judge denounces the papers which publish such advertisements; but advertisements from other members of the same gang continue to appear. There seems some ground here for unfavourable remark, even when we have made all due allowance for the unconscionable greed of shareholders, who will not allow directors to "misconduct their trust," and for the stress of competition in the newspaper world, which limits the freedom of a managing editor to do what he knows to be the right thing. Possibly Mr. Edwards may have heard something of the howl of virtuous indignation that has gone up of late from certain quarters over the hypocrisy and cant imputed to what is tastefully styled the "Cocoa Press." But if we are going to excite ourselves about the shortcomings of our contemporaries—and no doubt the maintenance of a high ethical standard among newspaper proprietors is a becoming subject for the solicitude of pressmen—there are far worse sins in the newspaper world to-day than any that have been associated with that blessed word cocoa. Moralists, especially if they happen to be also politicians, must beware of straining at gnats while swallowing camels, or they may themselves be found guilty of cant and hypocrisy. It may be very reprehensible to combine the advocacy of free trade with the manufacture of "protected" commodities, or the preaching of Liberal principles with the countenancing of forced labour, or, what specially distresses Sir Edward Fry and the Spectator, the Nonconformist Conscience with the publication of betting and racing intelligence. But it is certainly not less heinous to carry on the business of a lottery promoter or a gaming-house keeper under cover of that of a newspaper publisher, nor to inflate the profits of a newspaper by allowing swindlers to rob its readers through its advertisement columns. The last offence, bad enough in all cases, assumes its most obnoxious shape when both the newspaper proprietor and his good customer, the candidate for the Central Criminal Court, lay themselves out specially to minister to the needs of children.

ELIMINATING ARISTOTLE.

The spirited controversy which has been going on for some time on the modern school of drama has brought forth some very interesting expressions of opinion, but the real clash of arms has been between Mr. A. B. Walkley and Mr. Granville Barker. I have often found myself at variance with Mr. Barker, but he has contributed by far the most luminous contributions to the discussion. Mr. Walkley says that even if you leave Aristotle out you leave the whole argument in, because the old fundamental laws of drama were "the recognition of certain scientific laws concerned with the attention," and it is by these laws that he will continue to judge plays, I imagine. The drama of the future, he declares, is not to be a rambling conversation or written in the go-as-you-please style. It must contain unity of impression and continuous and cumulative interest, because the spectator's brain works in a certain way. Now Mr. Barker cannot abide Aristotle. He has no use for fundamental laws. He wants to express himself in his own way, and find out for himself what he feels to be the most dramatic way of setting forth his ideas. To be frank, I am very strongly in sympathy with him in his theories, however much I may think he goes wrong in his execution. There is a new school of drama growing up, and the way to encourage it to be vital is not to measure it with an Aristotelian foot rule, but to judge how far it does dramatically set forth the life around us. The search for new methods of expression is unquestionably, as Mr. Barker says, the healthiest sign possible in any art, and a crowd of new writers are searching vigorously. I would far rather for the moment see some of these wild growths full of ideas than see the work of earnest students who know their Aristotle by heart and never get away from "the fundamental laws of psychology." Perfect balance is an eminently desirable thing in any art, but before perfect balance is attained there is oftentimes a good deal of violent oscillation. Not so very long since our drama was in a state of seemingly hopeless stagnation. If since then the dramatic pendulum has swung rather violently from one extreme to another, at least the clock has started going, and occasionally you find a little theatrical oasis where your brain may be stimulated. At the present moment such an oasis might be hard to find, but still the prospect is not unhopeful.

Mr. Barker would be the last person to say that cumulative interest or that unity of impression is unnecessary, although he has occasionally ignored both. He is far too clever a dramatist not to know that even if you "leave Aristotle out" drama must be development, and that you must hold the attention of an audience. But the new drama does not require discriminate encouragement, and I would rather see such a play as Miss Elizabeth Baker's "Chains," in which you have a vivid if rather formless picture of real life, than the work of a writer who was so engrossed with fundamental laws that he or she had no time to observe human nature. Any one who has anything vital to say will in time evolve for himself the most effective way of saying it, Aristotle or no Aristotle. Mr. Shaw, in his characteristic contribution to the discussion, harks back on his old grievance that critics praise his "old plays in order to throw into greater relief the infamy" of his new ones, and says, with equally characteristic inaccuracy, that the same applies to Mr. Barker. I will concede Mr. Shaw "The Madras House," but I should like to know the critics who have compared "The Voysey Inheritance" and "Waste" unfavourably with "The Marrying" (not marriage, Mr. Shaw) "of Ann Leete." I am glad to hear that Mr. Shaw takes the greatest pains to secure "cumulative force of interest" in his plays, but I should recommend him to go on trying.

As to Sir Arthur Pinero's contribution, I am afraid I am hopelessly out of sympathy with him when he suggests that "leaving Aristotle out" is, in a measure, the cause of the influx of French drama. First, I do not remember the time when the English stage was not largely recruited from the French. The great difference now is that French authors claim their own, whereas in the old days their ideas or plays were boldly "lifted." Again, when Sir Arthur says that he would prefer that playgoers should be put to the expense of travelling to Paris to see the French drama, I once more disagree with him. Would he apply this rule to all foreign plays? If so, we might never have known Ibsen, who has had more influence on our English stage than any modern writer.

To sum up, every coming dramatist with anything in him begins by wanting to break away from tradition, and it is not necessarily the function of criticism to jump on him with tradition. That merely tends to produce what Mr. Barker calls hollow imitations of popular drama. Unconventionality and originality are so rare that they should be received with open arms. Nothing would please me more than to see a huge crop of dramatic wild oats sown, may be, by writers who had never heard of Aristotle. If one is to have a choice between the well-made play without ideas, and the formless play with ideas, by all means let us have the latter, because the man with ideas can always learn technique, but the man with technique cannot always acquire ideas.

COMPANY MANNERS.

When we take our moral self out of curl-papers, dress it, and put a clean pinafore on it, and give it urgent instructions to sit still and keep itself tidy, we are indulging in the fearsome occupation of putting on our company manners. A schoolboy, who, although anonymous, deserves to be immortal, described a friend as some one who knew all about you and liked you just the same. Company manners are our nearest protection against any one of our intimates finding out all about us with the risk that they wouldn't like us just the same. And, after all, there are only one or two people in the world who we really prefer should not like us. We are anxious to seem "a good sort"; that is why in a stranger's house we seek for some smaller ash-tray than a Persian rug, and clothe even our political opinions in a decent simulation of politeness. Company manners are, in fact, a social defence against the moral virtue of being natural. As Sarah Grand has said somewhere, "People are always telling you to be natural; that is all very well if you are naturally nice, but suppose you are naturally nasty?" The proper understanding of artificially good behaviour preserves us from misunderstanding the necessity for telling the truth. It would, for instance, have prevented the natural and truthful child who was asked after the Christmas dinner what he would like to be (his choice of a profession being understood) from remarking in loud tones, "I'd like to be sick!"

It may be said with truth that company manners are much more necessary when we are not in company than when we are. It is in the constant and comprehensive intimacy of family life that it is most advisable for us to shield our natural selves from view. That item of the social code, for instance, which decrees that a man shall be courteous to a woman is much more important when she happens to be his sister, his mother, or his wife than if she is a stranger whom he has never met before. He sees his sister, for instance, more frequently than an outsider. He is very likely to see her at a moment of domestic crisis, and it is precisely when dinner is late, or cook has to be dismissed suddenly, that the average man takes latitude to scold his home women-folk. Back-parlour bickerings, too, are frequently, in English family life, that worst kind of bickering in which one person "talks at" another to a third. On these occasions company manners would be a boon indeed.

It is company manners which are indicated by that useful saying: "Joie de rue, douleur de maison," with its forceful English version, "Street angel, home devil." It is company manners that put the nation into different clothes on a Sunday from those it wears on a week-day. We are as polite to God as to any other acquaintance whom we only meet occasionally. Many a British householder stays at home on a Sunday rather than go to church without a tall hat, so seriously does he take his company manners.

An old proverb shakes its head over this very question: "Courtesy is cumbersome to them that kens it not." Some grammarless philosopher had seen how seldom the natural man is a gentleman. To judge by our behaviour on too many occasions, one would suppose that manners were twopence extra not only at school, but whenever we put them on. We do not rail at our hostess if her cook has made a failure with the fish; we do not tell her that we have brought our own cigarettes because we would not trust her beastly ones—that is, not unless she is our mother, entertaining us at her club. We do not tell our escort that it is more trouble than it is worth to come out with him, and that he doesn't know how to look after women—that is, not unless he is our brother or our husband. We do not slam doors in other people's houses, nor leave other people's tables in dudgeon because some one else expresses opposite political views. We do not quarrel about trifles among strangers, or contradict them if some one disagrees with our conclusion. We do not say, "Well, you are a fool," if he is not related to us. We say, "Well, well, time will show," or "There are two sides to every question," or "I dare say there is a good deal in what you say."

Company manners are the oil on the wheels of society, and the lack of them is the creak in the home machinery.

It is not necessary that with a low bow we should say to a member of our family, "Might I trouble you to pass the salt?" but to soften the short, sharp shock of our "Salt!" with even a curtailed hiss, which would seem to suggest "Please," would be an improvement. The young generation in England at present has a tendency to regard politeness in the home as a sentimental weakness. It is, however, only the weakness involved in that discretion which is the better part of valour, the weakness of avoiding unnecessary battle. Politeness does not necessarily make prigs, but for many years we have heard that "manners makyth man."

WOMEN I HAVE MET.

The Propaganda Woman.

The Propaganda Woman believes that there is nothing on earth equal to the influence of a good woman, and, further, that if there is anything better than the realisation of an object it is its propagation. She says that the mere recognition of their own importance in the world seems to bring out, as does nothing else, the best qualities in people. She herself felt at a very early age a mission to influence her fellows for their own good. She regards the world as composed, so to speak, of moral invalids whom she is destined not exactly to cure, but to minister unto. Did she cure them, her mission would be gone and unrivalled talent for propagation would be wasted. As long, therefore, as they are in need of moral sofas or spiritual warm milk she is at their service. Once they become regenerate by the entire adoption of her views she points out that authority after all must be undivided, and that self complacency such as her own is dangerous in those less fitted to use it wisely.

The Propaganda Woman has applied herself to many cults. She well remembers the time long ago when, being an ardent collector of postage stamps, she realised the difference it would make to the world if every one could be induced to collect postage stamps. Besides the knowledge of geography it imparted, it would divert your attention from the vicious course to which you were most inclined. She thought that the whole moral tone of the nation—to say nothing of its financial status—would be raised if it could be induced to collect postage stamps, and she raised quite a large sum among the people she only asked to "At Homes" for the formation of a philatelist club. The demise of the club, three months later, she attributes entirely to a despicable jealousy of her red three-cornered Cape of Good Hope stamp, which she knew for a fact to be worth £40. With great generosity she offered to sell it to the club for £35, which generosity so enraged some prominent members that they produced documentary evidence in an endeavour to prove it to be worth only 3s. 10d. Much as she regretted the necessity for giving up a cherished project, she realised that the nation had proved itself unripe for the idea, and that, if anything, her mistake in presupposing generosity in other people was to blame. For a short time after this she consoled herself by putting new life into the Temperance movement. Propaganda begins at home, and she pointed out to her husband how impossible it was for her under the circumstances to have either beer or whisky in the house. Thoroughly consistent, she would even explain beforehand to her hostess at a dinner-party how greatly her husband preferred milk, and, to relieve him from the ignominy of succumbing to temptation, added that he could not even bear alcoholic drinks to be offered him. Once when trifle was being handed round, she gave evidence of her sincerity by calling down the table to him: "James, James, don't touch it! It will revive the craving!" A feeling, however, that too many workers in the same cause were detrimental to harmony, added to her husband's unexpected rebellion—on medical authority—against pure milk, caused her to relinquish temperance and to turn her attention to a more neglected cause.

It is not every one who realises that nothing is too small or insignificant for propaganda work. I well remember the brave stand made by the Propaganda Woman on a subject that grosser spirits would have dismissed as unworthy of attention. It was the demand by infirm paupers of the local workhouse to have handkerchiefs under their pillows at night. Several members of the Board gave the subject no attention, remarking carelessly that the infirm paupers could very well "manage." The Propaganda Woman, however, went to the length of declaring her innermost conviction that she herself would be unable to sleep a wink without the consciousness of a pocket-handkerchief under her pillow. What then must be the feelings of an infirm pauper when told to "manage"? The feeling infused by the Propaganda Woman into the matter ended in the motion being carried unanimously. Shortly afterwards she opened an office for the propagation of pocket-handkerchiefs during the night for infirm paupers—it became intimately known as the P. P. P.; and had it not come to an untimely end through lack of public spirit on the part of its subscribers, the Propaganda Woman had intended to go into the question of whether infirm paupers derived more pleasure from spots or checks.

The Propaganda Woman's success is chiefly due to her realisation of essentials. She knows that au fond there is far more in buttons than in principles. She realises that people will not give shillings for causes, but that a badge accompanied by a cause will realise vast sums. Botanic Garden Parties again have double the value of the plinth in Trafalgar Square, just as a picture postcard is more effective than a leading article. It is the realisation of business details such as these which enables the Propaganda Woman not only to support a cause, but to make the cause support her with every evidence of modest luxury.

VARIETY AT WESTMINSTER.

THE chief outcome of last week was the Prime Minister's announcement that, after all, the Government intend to press the Accession Declaration Bill through all its stages before the holidays, instead of hanging it up till November, as was originally contemplated. Mr. Asquith intimated this dramatic change of programme in the casual way in which a man might say that he had taken a stroll in the park after breakfast, and yet it has a tremendous bearing on our convenience. It probably means, in the first place, the prolongation of the present portion of the Session (which, like omnes Gallia, is divided into three parts) until the first week in August instead of Parliament shutting down at the end of the present month. Further, it will save a certain number of us a good deal of bother with a section of our constituents. When the Bill was first mooted we foresaw letters of indignation, resolutions of protest and boiling deputations. We knew that we should be exhorted to raise the Protestant banner and to die in the last ditch, which so far as I can see is the very last thing that any member of Parliament wants to do. The reception of the first reading foreshadowed trouble, and since that day a pious little rebellion has been organised. Mr. Walter Long, until recently the darling of the Orangemen, has been excommunicated from the Brotherhood with the Orange equivalent for bell, book, and candle, and is not allowed to play at the Boyne anniversary because he dared to vote in favour of the measure. I can well understand Mr. Long's fascination for the broad-minded and charitable "Loyalists." He can talk to them for a week of Sundays in an unbroken flow of melodious but largely meaningless prose, and as the Ulstermen are almost always lacking in the gift of loquacity, sometimes rising to eloquence, which is common to all other parts of Ireland, they have hailed Mr. Long, English and "moonraker" though he is, in the light of an inspired prophet. Now there is this unfortunate rift within the lute, and the music of Mr. Long's verbiage will never again soothe the ears of the black North.

Then Colonel Sandys, of Bootle, near Liverpool, has been prancing gloriously at a Protestant meeting, where he tore the Bill into fragments that strewed the winds. I wonder what would happen if the gallant colonel does something of the sort on the second reading. The Old Hand says that he does not know; he has never seen the trick performed in the House. Of course, even he is not venerable enough to remember the episode of Burke and the dagger, but we agree that anything in the ultra-dramatic line would send the present House into Homeric laughter. At any rate, the Colonel, a tall, glum, taciturn man, who has sat in Parliament since 1885 without making any mark, is coming out of his shell at last, and we shall be able to take his measure before the recess. These two incidents indicate that if the Bill had been postponed till the autumn we should have been badgered and bothered by our earnest theologians, and the wise men among us would have been driven to a prolonged foreign tour, leaving no address behind. It has been rumoured that the decision of the Government to proceed with the Bill at once is a surrender to Mr. Redmond on the supposition that the Nationalists insist upon getting it, irrespective of any hostility they may choose to show the Budget whisky duty in November, but I do not think there is much in it. Mr. Asquith wants to nip any extreme Evangelical revolt in the bud. What a strange breed these religious intolerants are, and yet few things are stronger or more abiding in human instinct! Very few of us can remain wholly impartial spectators. Probably Lord Morley is one, and the Old Hand recalls one of his most polished literary sentences in connection with the authority of a Church. The Unionist Government of the day had tried desperately hard to induce the Vatican to pronounce its official ban on agrarian outrages in Ireland, and Mr. John Morley, as he then was, waxed scornful. "With one hand," he exclaimed, "you beat the horrid Orange drum in Ulster, while with the other you are furtively plucking at the sleeve of Monsignor Persico." We rarely get such finish and beauty of phrasing nowadays. The contrast is ridiculous and unfair, but last week gave us a pearl from one of the Nationalists. He was talking about old-age pensions and adducing individual grievances. "Then," said he, "there is the case of Miss Casey. It is one of those cases of many, many cases of that sort of case." But you have to sit through hours of Irish Estimates before you are rewarded with a gem like that.

From religion to cocoa has been an easy step in a mixed week. The Budget gave the Tariff Reformers their one and only opening for a logical argument. The cocoa duty is admittedly protective, and as our Cadburys, our Rowntrees, our Frys and the rest of the magnates are staunch for free trade the position is obviously incongruous. The Tories rode the cocoa horse for all it was worth, and several of our fellows strongly appealed to the Chancellor to stop the whole thing by simply abandoning the duty, but Mr. Lloyd George, who has been fairly lavish with his millions of late, suddenly became squeamish over a hatful of sovereigns and refused to give way. Cocoa naturally suggests placards; our hoardings are grateful and comforting with them; and a Tory poster played quite a heroic part in the debates. It came in for some pretty rough handling from our side, and in the end the Chancellor threw it across the table at Mr. Bonar Law, who dodged it with the skill of a human Aunt Sally. The House listened with interest to Mr. Rowntree, of York. He is one of us new-comers, almost of a Bradlaugh build and facial appearance, but he spoke moderately and with a very honest plea for a removal of the fiscal advantages under which his particular industry is carried on.

The Irish Estimates consisted mainly of Mr. T. W. Russell. The Ulstermen made a great fuss because Mr. Russell is still Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture, although he no longer sits in the House, conveniently forgetting the case of Sir Horace Plunkett, who occupied the same post for six years although Dublin County had rejected him throughout the entire period. "T. W.," as Mr. Russell was generally called, reminds the Old Hand of a platform reverse suffered by the then Unionist firebrand. It was during the prolonged Rossendale by-election, when the Marquess of Hartington vacated the seat on becoming Duke of Devonshire. Home Rule was to the fore, and "T. W." came down to address a crowded meeting of Lancashire operatives, among whom was a fair sprinkling of Irish. He quickly warmed to his subject. Brandishing his clenched fists, he shouted: "When Strongbow landed in Oireland ——" and a pained voice came from the back of the hall: "Och! Tell us something about the Flood." Mr. Russell's period remained unfinished on that occasion.

Well, this week we got to the Women's Franchise Bill with all its fratricidal warfare. Party lines have been obliterated, and you have not known whether the man sitting next to you is for or against the women. A Labour man moved the second reading, a Tory seconding. Mr. F. E. Smith moved the rejection, and Mr. Bryce, an excellent Radical, seconded it. There you are! The choicest moment arrived when Mr. Walter Long opposed the Bill from the front Opposition bench and was immediately followed by Mr. Lyttelton, his stable companion, warmly advocating it. Since, however, Mr. Haldane took the earliest opportunity of

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE CONSERVATOIRE EXAMINATIONS.

NOT very long ago the Conservatoire examinations for tragedy and comedy were got through in one day. They began at eight in the morning, tragedy taking the priority, and holding the stage through the forenoon.

Last week the votaries of the tragic and the comic muses were heard through two days. The selection of competitors for prizes used to be more rigorous. This time the number of green goslings was appalling, inasmuch as nobody could slip out between the closing of the doors and lunch, or after lunch, before the last test for the day had been applied. That brought the audition up nearly to seven o'clock. These crude youngsters had applied themselves to learn all the tricks and artifices their professors could teach them, but neglected to understand their authors, though any one with some knowledge of life can always tell what a great French dramatic author means. This knowledge was what most of the goslings wanted. But in some instances, and particularly on the young ladies' side, intuition and divination supplied the want. On the whole the comedy class outstripped the other. The French are born comedians, and their native esprit and liveliness give them a great advantage in this side of dramatic art.

I was amused by the observations of a retired actress who sat beside me, and in an undertone thought aloud as the recitations went on. She had been in her young days a pupil of Regnier and of Got, and had for a friendly adviser Mme. Arnould Plessy. An old horse-dealer could not have a quicker eye for the points of racer, hunter, or park hack. "Why so much weeping and wringing of the hands, in a pathetic scene from 'Andromaque'? Hector's widow was, under all circumstances, mistress of her emotions. The girl is a lovely dear. She understands classical drapery. But how she spoils her nice young face in attempting to force tears from her eyes! At this distance nobody could scent an onion in her pocket handkerchief. Rachel resorted to that trick in 'Adrienne Lecouvreur,' and the tears flowed freely without facial contortions. I heard it said that as she left the stage she gave the onion she held to Prince Napoleon to eat in salad, and that he did so. Suppose I shut my eyes and lay aside my ear-trumpet until somebody more to my liking replaces that doll."

Mlle. Malraison—"a name to pun with," observed the ancient actress—gave more satisfaction. "That girl has every requisite quality but emotion in her rendering of Andromaque. She has chosen the part in which the agony is piled up in a crescendo measure. The heroine ought to remain the queen, but to quiver with an emotion that at once leads her to decisive action. The player must not suffer emotion to run away with him, else he won't capture his audience. But without it he is a steam engine lacking fire and water." A second prize awaited this future actress, and a second certificate a mere chit, Mlle. Deroxe, who gave to perfection the songe d'Athalie, avoiding sing song, while not neglecting cadence, but keeping clear of blood-curdling effects. She knows how to give the impression of being at high tension. Truffier has in her a promising pupil.

Mlle. Ducos, the first prize in tragedy, is said to be a granddaughter of that Minister of Marine who conducted the naval operations of the Second Empire during the Crimean War. He also furnished France with a fleet of iron warships, and made a heroic marriage with a Bordelaise beauty. Mlle. Ducos has vitality, emotion, and tingles with feeling. But for its expressiveness, the face might be in its outlines too much of the mask. It tells of latent power. Her voice has considerable range, from a grave tone upwards, is flexible, and, when indignation must be feigned, not that of a scold. In reciting Corneille's Alexandrines, Mlle. Ducos remained natural and free from sing-song, while she marked sufficiently the rhythm or cadence. The part of Camille might have been written for her.

There could have been no more ideal Antigone than Mlle. Revonne in her classical costume, slightly Parisianised. She has an almost Tanagra refinement of appearance and manner, a nice face, eyes that can look infinite tenderness, and are not too much played with. The voice from its deepest tone upwards is sweet and in the higher tones silvery. She was marvellous in a part all serene purity and never insipid. The public burned with indignation when the apparitor proclaimed her a "second prize." She deserved to be bracketed with Mlle. Ducos. Two jurors also were seen to explode—Brieux and Donnay. Their colleagues, fearing they were going to resign, patched up matters by proposing to give her a first prize next day in comedy. With this in her hand she can claim to be engaged at the Français. But the majority of jurors refused to make amends to Mlle. Guyta-Dauzon, that other public favourite, for having only awarded her a second prize. Antoine felt, perhaps, secretly glad, for he jumped at the opportunity to engage her then and there as one who has all the qualities that professors cannot give. She is, therefore, next season to enter the Odéon.

And now some words about comedy. On the second day I sat beside the neighbour of the first day. Mlle. Sylviac enchanted her as Katherina in I know not what translation of "Taming of the Shrew." Her professor, Paul Mounet, warned her that the part of Katherina abounded in shoals and quicksands, and was too much in the buffo feeling of the Italian stage not to startle a French audience. These difficulties disappeared as she gave her selections. She also has much that professors cannot give, is fine-looking, a good scold, has a splendid torso when she stands with arms akimbo, a bright countenance that pleases as she enters, and never when she sulks displeases. Temperament is one of her gifts. Mlle. Sylviac laughs inwardly when most carried away by her termagant humour. The public thought her great fun, and applauded all her points. She reminded my neighbour of Alphonsine, formerly the great favourite at the Palais Royal in hilarious comedies of Labiche. They showed themselves disappointed at the official reward of "a certificate."

Mlle. Deroxe scored a brilliant success in a scene from "Magda." What a number of strings this young thing must have to her bow! As Mlle. Revonne gave selections from "Autre Danger," the old actress whispered: "All the glasses are turned towards the jury. What comedy can be going on there?" It was this: The tender emotion, the pathetic anguish of a young lady in the would-and-I-would-not phase of amorous passion were so rendered by her as to unloose the fountains of the author's (Donnay's) eyes. He wept plenteously and a little noisily. The air had by this time grown bad. It stimulated, no doubt, his emotion as an author and spiritual father of the heroine of "Autre Danger." Said my neighbour: "On le dit bon garçon et sensible. Mais à qui ressemble-t-il?" He resembled a nobly handsome Englishman's bust very roughly blocked out—that of Sir William Harcourt—but with a wide, thick-lipped mouth and a pair of funny little shrewd eyes that told a tale of laughter in the sleeve.

When I first witnessed Conservatoire examinations in the stuffy theatre of the Faubourg Poissonnière the young ladies all wore book-muslin dresses. They might wear silk or satin sashes of any colour they pleased, or have flounces or tucks on the skirt. This rule was made by Napoleon for the benefit of poor girls, as La Sainte Mousseline was ordered by an archbishop of Paris seventy-five years ago for the toilettes at the First Communion. Holy muslin is still the rule of the Church. At the Conservatoire it is obsolete. Girls up for examination can dress as they please. The only limit to a display of fine clothes when they can have them is the fear of offending the taste of jurors, or their sense of propriety.

The obsequies of the Duc d'Alençon at Dreux (in the Gallic period Druidstown) was strictly private. The mausoleum there came to the Orleans family, with extensive forests, through Louis Philippe's mother, the most opulent heiress of her time. It was built by that excellent sheep in human form, the Duc de Penthièvre, her father. I do not know well enough the natural history of the ovine species to say whether the sheep is as benevolent as patient and uncomplaining when ill-used. The ovation of antiquity was, to be sure, a triumph of the pacificator, who loved his fellow countrymen, and served them in the arts of peace. The Duc de Penthièvre shone as the virtuous seigneur before the Revolution. He did not know when, on his only son's death, he sold Rambouillet to Louis XVI., and lived as far as he could from Court, what to do with all his money. Yet he had been a providence to the poor on his wide estates, and around them, dowered tenants' daughters and rose queens, and sought to make virtue fashionable and popular by subsidising authors to write up and instituting virtue prizes. Montyon, as a young judge, borrowed of him his idea of the annual prix de vertu awarded by the Academy. A central staff of priests and laymen met at his town house, now the Bank of France, to direct the distribution of alms in Paris, and communicate with forty other provincial ones on the subject of ducal charities. We find traces of his influence in the frequent use made in literature of the word vertu, and in the speeches of reformers and revolutionists. It seems to me that Rousseau sought to get at the good duke by writing up virtue. M. de Penthièvre could not endure the idea of Satan being eternally lost, or any of his servants. He thought the best of every black sheep who came in his way, and heartily hoped that the revolution might prove a God-sent storm. It never disturbed his peaceful soul, though he saw the Reign of Terror half-way through.

To the crypt of Dreux this good Duc gathered the remains of his father, the "virtuous Comte de Toulouse" (though a son of Louis XIV. and Mme. de Montespan), and of the Comtesse and the children that predeceased them. Some Revolutionists of Dreux threw them out of their coffins in seeking for lead wherewith to cast musket balls. In 1821 Louis Philippe, with his own hands, and helped by an anatomist, gathered them, sorted them, re-coffined them, and set monuments above each sarcophagus. He now sleeps among them with his queen and their sons' sons' sons and their wives, among whom is the Duchesse d'Alençon.

The late Helena, Duchesse d'Orléans and a cousin of the Prince Consort, dying in the heretical belief of her life, is placed in a vault all alone. On her sarcophagus lies a full-length sleeping portrait figure of her in marble, with a thin sheet over the body from the neck down. She seems to toss uneasily in her sleep as if in a fevered dream. A worn hand is stretched out as if to feel a vanished one. I saw it in the old Champs Elysées Salon before it was set up at Dreux. One does not see there the poor wasted hand. It is passed through a hole in the wall of the sort of cell to which she was consigned, as being out of the unity of the family faith. Beyond this wall of separation it touches the hand (in effigy) of the late Duc d'Orléans. This contrivance her two sons agreed to. They did so when the Moral Order party reigned and the Comte de Chambord still lived. Since his death they never attempted to right this posthumous offence to the Duchesse. Mercie's work is one of the most touching monuments I know, and very beautiful. He does not flatter the fever-wasted Princess, but he makes her so touching that she ceases to be plain.

The different members of the Orleans family resident in France, their Bavarian cousins of the Deux Ponts family, and the Alphonse Royal branch came to the Dreux obsequies. The King of Bulgaria and his gentleman, Comte Bournoulon, made the journey from Chantilly by themselves in special trains. All the Princesses wore thick crape veils. The Princesse Blanche de Nemours' resemblance to the Queen of Spain was, when she raised hers, much noticed, and is striking, though her hair is no longer a warm auburn, and her face has lost its ruddy colour. The Duchesse de Nemours, daughter of the late Comte de Flandre, who lives a tamely dignified and opulent life with husband and three daughters at Neuilly, takes after her grandmother, Louise, Queen of the Belgians, daughter of Louis Philippe. The different members of the family filled twelve landaus and their drive from the railway station and back. The horses wore crape rosettes at their ears. The drivers and valets were in black, the former wearing white doeskin shorts. This had an eye-hitting, magpie effect. All the European sovereigns related or connected with the Duc and Duchesse d'Alençon sent representatives. The Bishop of Chartres gave the absolution. Prefect and sub-prefects of the Eure had had instructions from the Ministry of the Interior to have a care for the safety and convenience of his Bulgarian Majesty, and to be aux petits soins, and were zealously officious. The gendarmes of the whole district had been mobilised, and agents of the Sûreté Publique sent from the Place Beauvau, not that there was any danger of an Anarchist, Turkish, Greek, Macedonian, or other attack on the shrewd diplomat who reigns at Sofia. But Briand seems to think him a proper substitute for the great friend and ally that France had in King Edward. At any rate, he will not be behindhand in paying back the flattering attentions he so conspicuously received from his Bulgarian Majesty.

Baroness de Laroche, who met with the fearful accident in the Betheny aviation week, is handsome and young, but almost an old stager as an air woman. She attended all the air matches from Heliopolis to the plains of chalky Champagne and sandy North Germany, and tried her skill and nerve at four of them with some distinction. We never hear nor see the Baron, and he does not appear to have given any sign since her last great mishap. If she were divorced she would not still bear the title he gave her in making her his wife. Evidently she is a person of wealth and education and bitten with the air craze. She wears a sort of dress in vogue eight or ten years ago as suitable for dames cyclistes, but looked upon in English inns and hotels as decidedly unladylike. Mrs. Grundy might think it improper. I saw her at a match at Vincennes, and was struck with the romantic character of her appearance. She wore round her neck a tall dog collar of fur enfolded in goffered nuns' veil tissue. The goffering kept its form for a whole day. It had a pretty effect, and kept the hairs of the fur from her mouth and eyes. She had been learning at a gymnasium to make perilously flying leaps, and had a sculptural though lightly built figure, luxuriant hair, and wore a basque béret cap. The face was rather pensive, and not that of a confirmed sportswoman.

THE NEW PEPYS.

July 4: With my wife to Lord's for the Oxford and Cambridge match; we reaching the ground at noon, but find there will be no play for an hour or two by reason of the softness of the pitch. So we walked around, chatting awhile with this and that acquaintance. Anon, about one of the clock, chanced to find ourselves near Admiral Topper's tent, behind the publick seats. Many of his acquaintance hanging there-around, as they might be spelling for a luncheon, which methought indecent.

Presently the Admiral catcht a sight of me and would have us join his party, pressing the invitation so instantly that I could not, in civility, refuse. Choice fare, and the champagne good, and all merry. Next me was one Mistress Skitby, the Admiral's niece, a grass-widow, whose husband is in Bombay. Her looks pleased me mightily, and her sprightly converse no less. Many droll stories did she relate of the manners of the Far East, and one in particular which much diverted me. It seemeth that the natives out there have a word which I could not quite catch, but it sounded like "budli"—in meaning equivalent to our English "substitute." Now, the wife of a certain major, going out to join her husband, did arrive in the cantonment a day before she was expected; and the major not there to welcome her. So, while a messenger is gone for him, she converst with a native servant, who after the manner of his kind, was all obsequious deference to the Memsahib. Presently went by an Eurasian girl, mighty well-favoured. "Who is that?" inquired the Major's lady. To whom the native, with a profuse salaam, make answer: "She is the Memsahib's budli." But the sequel did my fair friend not relate.

Play begin at a quarter of four. And the first over was a sensation, two Oxford wickets falling therein, with no more than two runs (and they wides) on the board. Two other men quickly follow, whereat was I greatly elated with the assurance of a Cambridge victory. But alack! when Hooman and Le Couteur come together, they make more than 100 runs, albeit with no small luck. Anon, with the cheap dismission of Twining and Lagden, my hopes revived somewhat, but again are they dashed when Pawson join Le Couteur, and these two played out time.

July 5: Again to Lord's, but left early, mighty dejected and sick. For Lord, what a feeble showing did these Cambridge lads make! And a vast deterioration in their cricket since the days when I was reserve man for the Magdalene XI., and batted four times in college matches, with an average of 14.* So I did yearn now to go to the wicket and give these young degenerates an object lesson in the hitting of Le Couteur's googlies.

July 6: I took Bet to Henley. A pestilent, wet day, more like to November than July. By the river side a melancholy scene, and small wonder, thought I, that the Frenchman should gird at us for taking our pleasure sadly. Of a truth mine own is sad enough. Bet have forgot her umbrella; so we shared mine; but as I have to shield all the wide expanse of her hat, I did come off, for shelter, second best, and catcht most of the umbrella's drippings betwixt my collar and my neck. Which did incommode me foully.

Bet in a vixenish humour by reason of having to wear her waterproof, and cannot shew off her new frock. So we came to words, and I called her a baggage. She flinging off in a tantrum and will take care to let my wife know what manner of man I am. Whereat I bade her go hang. But presently, my conscience reproaching me for mine unchristian outburst, I did hold out the olive-branch. And she is to have a new set of sables for the coming autumn.

July 7: Debating with my wife of our holiday plans. She for a month at Dieppe. But I cannot afford it. And the best I can offer is three weeks at Margate for her, but for myself not even so long as that, for my mind misgives me that I shall have urgent affairs of business to attend to in Ostend and Trouville during at least a fortnight of the time. But I will not add to her disappointment by telling her these ill news just now; rather waiting on a convenient occasion to break it to her gently. Yet what a pestilent drag on a man this business is; so that he may not even spend his holiday in peace with the wife of his bosom!

I had another squeak this afternoon with my Lord Borehambury, who met us almost face to face in Piccadilly near the corner of Bond Street. But the sight of Scott's window remind me that my hat do badly need an ironing; so in forthwith to have it done. Yet am I in some sort paid out for my subterfuge; for my wife, while waiting in the shop, catcht sight of a lady's golfing cap, which pleased her. Straightway she bought it before I could stop her, and, to my chagrin, it was put down to mine account.

July 8: To Lord's for Eton and Harrow, where my young friend Charlie Blount is playing for Harrow, having but recently (as they do say upon the Hill) "got his flannels." But I could not stay to see him bat, having to leave early for the City.

July 9: To General Wigg's, where I do find him and his lady affixing these new "Domes of Silence" to their drawing-room chairs and sofas. Which, in truth, are well-named, for they are wholly noiseless, and do run so easily as you would scarce believe. This the General forthwith demonstrated to me by pushing a heavy ottoman across the room with one finger. So methinks I shall procure a set for my library chair, whose casters are now always, as it were, sticking in the carpet; and I have to stand up and lift the plaguey thing by main force whenever I desire to shift my position. Which is no small exertion, more especially after dinner.

The General full of pretty stories as ever; and one he tell me, which I have heard before, but do always divert me on every repetition. 'Twas of a traveller journeying to York by the night mail, on an urgent affair of business. So at King's Cross he did call the guard, to whom he gave half-a-crown with instant instructions to awake him at his destination. "And harkee," says the traveller, "I am a testy man when first aroused from sleep. So 'tis like I may resent your interference. Yet are you not to heed that. But if I do resist, pull me out by force on to the platform." The which the guard did promise to do. So the traveller fell asleep, easy in his mind. Anon, he awoke, and to his no small consternation found it to be daylight, and himself in the Waverley Station, Edinburgh. Forthwith he summoned the guard and did objurgate him by every ill name he could think of. But the latter, a pawky Scot, having heard him to the end: "Hoots, mon," quoth he, "Ye can swear. But ye canna swear equal to the mon I pit out at York."

(After Horace. Odes III. 21.)

O flask with cobwebs well bedight,
My twin in point of age,
I'll get you from your bin to-night
For good Professor Sage,
Who dines with me and takes delight
In rare old Hermitage.

Some pundits like their discourse dry;
He doesn't—de'il a bit!
He much prefers a bottle nigh
To wet his thirsty wit,
Like Addison in days gone by,
Like Porson, Burke, and Pitt.

In very truth, O flowing bowl,
A magic spur you ply;
You fire the most phlegmatic soul,
You stimulate the shy;
E'en churls unbend 'neath your control
To geniality.

In you fresh hope the hopeless find,
And feel the blues no more;
Where poverty unnerves the mind,
Its balance you restore;
E'en hen-pecked worms leave fear behind
Where you have gone before.

I have a wife who makes a stir
When late to bed I go;
To-morrow things will hum and whirr
At three a.m., or so;
But primed with you, why even her,
I'll send to Jericho.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

"HISTORY," dear Lady Betty, "repeats itself;" the entertaining performances of the Jackdaw of Rheims have been reproduced in almost every particular in the crisis connected with the Budget for 1909.

The jackdaw represents the "Absentee Peers":—

"The jackdaw sat on a red-leather chair,
Lansdowne, Cawdor, and Curzon were there;

. . . . .

In and out
Through the motley rout
That little jackdaw kept hopping about."

The audacious attitude assumed by these Peers towards the House of Commons caused general astonishment:—

"And M.P.s, with awe
As such freaks they saw,
Said 'The d——l must be in the little jackdaw!'"

The Unionist Peers rejected the Budget, endeavouring to rob the Commons of their rights. The country was bewildered!

"There's a cry and a shout,
And a deuce of a rout,
And nobody seems to know what they're about."

The confusion was very short-lived, however:—

"The Ministers rose with a dignified look,
They called for their candles, their bells, and their books!"

It is unnecessary to repeat the distressing terms of the denunciation; the consequences were almost immediate:—

"The day was gone,
The night came on.

. . . . .

When the multitude saw
On crumpled claw
Come limping a poor little tame jackdaw!"

The House of Lords then accepted the Budget submissively, and craved that a compromise might be effected in connection with the Veto!

"That poor little bird
Was so changed in a moment, 'twas really absurd!"

* * * * * *

"The obscure heroes of the House of Lords"—the humble description they afford of themselves—who forsook the racecourse, cover-side, and card-table at the summons of their chiefs to defeat the representatives of the people, have been foully betrayed. "A Victim" writes:—

"Sir,—I was dragged from behind the scenes at a variety theatre to vote for the repeal of the rights accorded to the Commons in successive generations. The House of Lords was routed, and now the leaders who forced me to join the conspiracy are offering to surrender my privileges to retain a semblance of their own power! It is the vilest treachery on record."

'And shall the Peerage die?
Then three hundred coroneted men
Shall know the reason why!'"

It may truly be said of a peer that who steals his head steals trash . . . . but who robs him of his seat at Westminster deprives him of his most precious asset.

* * * * * *

Ante-to-morrow Toryism is a species of insanity; this is the age of mounted events. Civilisation is at the gallop, and "to-morrow" almost every feudal survival will have been trampled to the dust—the centre of "superiority" has shifted.

. . . . .

This is the age of self-made men, self-made women, and, especially, of self-made politics. Men no longer make movements; the movements now make the men. The Tories still cling to the old system of organising "Scares," "Crises," and "Impending catastrophes"—all the policies of the Radicals are self-made movements arising spontaneously from surviving abuses or altered conditions.

If Europe intends to delay progress it must stop all leakage from America; modern development oozes at every pore from the United States.

Joan of Arc is one of the most fascinating characters in history, and it required rare skill to add to the admiration which is already entertained for her all the world over. That is the achievement which Father Bernard Vaughan has accomplished in his recently-published volume, "The Matchless Maid" (George Allen and Sons). In a devout spirit the qualities of her exquisite character are presented together with the struggles and sufferings of the mere child who fought for Faith and Country.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ARMY COUNCIL AND THE REGIMENTAL OFFICER.

Dear Truth,—I am glad to find you pouncing on the weak spot in the Army Council's armour—the want of regimental experience among its members. Not one of the present military members of Council has ever commanded men either in peace or war. General Ewart may be, as you say, a bon garçon, but this does not make him a good Adjutant-General, for he has been a staff officer nearly all his life, and knows nothing of regimental sentiment and usage. I agree with you in attributing the existing unpopularity of the Army Council to the unfortunate selection of members who are chosen for their skill in handling papers instead of men. What makes matters worse is that Army Councillors never get off their office chairs. This was not so in the Duke of Cambridge's days, when the Adjutant-General and Quartermaster-General always accompanied the Commander-in-Chief at inspections, and so kept touch with the troops, of whose interests they were the guardians.

Acies.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER AND THE LAW SOCIETY.

Sir,—At last Friday's meeting Mr. Ellett asserted that the Council of the Incorporated Law Society never opposed the appointment of a Public Trustee. The fact is that before the last Bill, which became law, there were several previous "Public Trustee" Bills, which proved abortive, all of which the Council opposed tooth and nail; but no sooner did they learn that the passage of the last "Public Trustee" Bill was inevitable than they veered round and accepted its principle, and confined their opposition to securing certain terms, advantageous to the profession, but which the promoters never dreamed of withholding. Mr. Ellett was at some pains to impress upon the meeting that his Council did not, properly speaking, oppose the passing of the last Budget, because they never petitioned against it in Parliament, and their criticism was limited to showing that some of the clauses were unfair and unworkable, while some of their recommendations had actually been adopted in the Bill as passed. He omitted, however, to tell the meeting that his Council went to the length of publishing two reports, condemning every single one of the licensing and new land taxes as "unfair and not to be adopted," and sent a copy to each member of the House of Commons and the House of Lords, and to the leading organs of the Press—a proceeding which strikes one as being a very real "root and branch" sort of opposition, and far more effective than simply filing a petition against the Bill.

It would occupy too much of your valuable space to follow into any further detail Mr. Ellett's disingenuous defence—in which he was loyally supported by the President, Mr. Winterbotham, and by another councillor, Mr. Beale. Suffice it to say that the fact, as the Chancellor has put it, remains that the Council have invariably opposed every remedial measure (land registration, appointment of a Public Trustee, proposed amendment of the bankruptcy law, etc.) which had the effect of reducing professional charges, or which (like the last Budget) would reduce the monopoly and privilege of the licensing and landed interests of this country, which the Council are so concerned to bolster up.—Your obedient servant,

F. O. C.

FRUIT TREES AND BIRDS.

Sir,—I have the management of a fruit farm, where some twenty to twenty-five acres of strawberries and raspberries are grown. If your correspondent "E. G. E." will pay me a visit, he shall see for himself the destructive work of the blackbird and the thrush. A large number are captured during the fruit season—in some seasons from fifty to 100 in a single day. While admitting that some good is done to the fruit-grower by birds destroying many insect pests, yet it is unquestionable that he also suffers severely from their attacks on ripe fruit, and when they become so numerous as in this district, the damage done is very considerable, the worst offenders being the blackbird, starling, wood-pigeon, and the thrush.—Yours faithfully,

H. Cotterell.

The Orchards, Elsenham, Essex.

Sir,—Your correspondent "E. G. E." must live in a very favoured locality in respect of the ravages of thrushes and blackbirds among fruit, or he would not write that those who say these birds destroy sound fruit are "unobservant people." I can remember that fifty years ago one had not even to protect strawberries against birds, and I expect that insects were as plentiful then as now. At present blackbirds and thrushes attack strawberries, cherries, and raspberries, while the blackbird also makes havoc among gooseberries, figs, pears, and even apples, wisely selecting the finest of these fruits. That it is these birds any one who has a garden may easily observe. It is these and not sparrows that make their way into the netted strawberry-bed; for in some gardens if a portion of the strawberries is left unprotected by netting, the owner will find every berry, ripe or unripe, destroyed, and it would be absurd to say that these were more insect infected than those under the netting, which are found sound.—Yours faithfully,

Ecce.

ROUND THE MARKETS.

A Week of Liquidation—Continental Speculators in Trouble—Yankees a Bright Spot—Stocks that Might be Picked Up.

The troubles of Continental speculators obtruded themselves upon the London Stock Exchange last week to an uncomfortable degree. We had to withstand further extensive sales of Tintos, Steels, Union Pacifics, and Trunks in connection with the failure of a German speculator, who afterwards committed suicide, and in addition Paris was liquidating heavily, and especially in Mining shares, owing to the difficulties of an operator on the Bourse, whose liabilities are put down at a quarter of a million sterling. Under such conditions bull points have mostly been hidden. But for the distinct recovery in Americans, which fostered a better tendency in Canadian Rails, it would have been an altogether sorry week. As it is, the account in Yankees is winding up in much better fashion than it began. Forced selling seems to have come to an end, for the time being at all events, and, on the other hand, the bargain hunter has thought it time he appeared on the scene, while the bear has been getting increasingly inclined to seek cover. The maintenance of the half-yearly dividend on Milwaukees at the rate of 7 per cent. and the continuance of quarterly dividends upon Atchisons at the rate of 6 per cent. have been important influences in steadying the market, while Wall Street has not failed to take heed of the fall in exchange and the rumours of considerable gold exports from London to the States. Certainly there is more to be said for purchases of Americans at their current level than at the top peaks of a year ago attained during the premature "Prosperity Boom." The fall that has occurred since, if it has not completely run its course, has discounted the bear points pretty liberally, and at current levels sound dividend-paying shares, such as Atchison, Baltimore and Ohio, Milwaukee, Great

RAILWAYS.

Home Railway Dividend Outlook—Increases of ½ to 1 per Cent. Expected—The Recovery Amongst Backward Lines—Some 5 per Cent. Yields.

In the next few weeks the Home Railway market will be in the thick of the dividend season. The half-year just ended is what is known as the lean half-year for our railways, that is, as compared with the December half, but it has been a fat six months as compared with the corresponding period of 1909. Without exception all the leading railways show additions to their gross receipts, as may be seen below:—

Aggregate Receipts—26 Weeks.

| Company. | Total, 1909. £ | Total 1910. £ | + Inc. £ |
|---|---|---|---|
| Great Central | 1,944,800 | 2,025,400 | + 81,600 |
| Great Eastern | 2,509,600 | 2,569,400 | + 59,800 |
| Great Northern | 2,829,400 | 2,898,800 | + 59,400 |
| Great Western | 6,473,000 | 6,607,000 | + 134,000 |
| Hull and Barnsley | 304,400 | 342,100 | + 37,700 |
| Lancs. and Yorkshire | 2,856,000 | 2,872,400 | + 16,400 |
| London & North-Western | 7,222,000 | 7,387,000 | + 165,000 |
| London & South-Western | 2,319,000 | 2,385,600 | + 66,600 |
| London, Brighton & S.C. | 1,509,200 | 1,545,700 | + 36,500 |
| Metropolitan | 422,400 | 436,900 | + 14,500 |
| Metropolitan District | 259,400 | 285,200 | + 25,800 |
| Midland | 5,767,000 | 5,922,000 | + 155,000 |
| North-Eastern | 4,713,500 | 4,836,100 | + 122,600 |
| North Stafford | 472,000 | 489,300 | + 17,300 |
| S.-Eastern and Chatham | 2,185,900 | 2,266,500 | + 80,600 |

The growth in traffic has, doubtless, been attended by an expansion in ordinary expenditure, such as increased train mileage and bigger wages bills, but the further savings resulting from the development of the community of interest principle and the rigorous manner in which the companies have continued to restrict capital outlays suggest that a good slice of the improvements in receipts should go to the shareholders. Without exception, the companies should make some addition to their dividends, and a specially gratifying feature will be the further amount of leeway made up by backward concerns such as the South-Eastern and Chatham, the Great Central, and the Underground lines.

The Great Central out of its gross increase of £81,600 may have £50,000 extra to distribute, a sum sufficient to pay the due rate upon the 1881 preference and a balance equal to ½ per cent. (actual) on the 1889 preference. To put the matter another way the company bids fair to be in a position (without making allowance for any advance in gross receipts in the current half-year) to pay the full dividends for the year 1910 upon the 1881 and 1889 preferences, and ½ to 1 per cent. upon the 1891 preference—a stock that has received nothing since 1906. In the circumstances the course of all three stocks is likely to be towards continued recovery.

The balance of net earnings divisible between the South-Eastern and Chatham in the fixed proportions of 59 and 41 per cent. respectively is not unlikely to show an addition of £60,000. The share falling to the South-Eastern would thus permit of the dividend on the ordinary being raised by ¾ per cent. per annum for the half-year, making the rate 1¼, and it would mean (assuming no increase in receipts during the current half-year) that the company already had in hand the full dividend for the year on its 6 per cent. preferred (which for 1909 got 5½ per cent.) and about ¼ per cent. on the deferred, more commonly known as Dover A. This is a very welcome recovery, for it is ten years since holders of Dover A last saw a dividend. The Chatham ought to be able to increase the dividend upon its 4½ per cent. first preference for the half-year to 3 per cent., which would make the rate for the company's financial year ending 30th June 3¾ per cent., against 3¼ per cent. for the previous year.

Another line which is making rapid strides is the Hull and Barnsley, the ordinary stock of which some of my readers should be holding at prices showing substantial profits. The Hull publishes an increase in gross receipts for the six months of £38,000. The retention of £25,000 of this sum as net gain would enable the dividend upon the stock to be raised 1½ per cent. to 3 per cent. On this basis the company could pay 3⅝ per cent. for the whole year without showing any expansion in receipts during the December half, and the stock bought at its present price should thus give a yield of at least 5½ per cent. It still, therefore, looks one of the bargains in the Home Railway market.

The Brighton Company ought to be able to raise the dividend upon its deferred ordinary stock by ½ per cent., making it 3¼ per cent., which suggests that the dividend on the A stock payable next February will be not less than 4½ per cent., against 4 per cent. for the year 1909. On such a basis the yield upon Brighton A is fully 5 per cent. The Great Northern's improvement in gross revenue should be sufficient to allow the balance forward after meeting the preferred dividends to be increased by a sum equalling ½ per cent. (actual) upon the deferred and A stocks. In such event, if receipts during the current half-year are merely maintained, the distribution for the twelve months upon Great Northern deferred would be 2¼ per cent. and the yield offered to a present purchaser 5 per cent. Increases at the rate of ½ per cent. per annum should be possible for the past half-year upon North-Western ordinary, South-Western ordinary, Midland deferred, Great Eastern ordinary, and North Staffordshire ordinary. The Great Western and North-Eastern and Lancashire and Yorkshire may raise their dividends from ¼ to ½ per cent. The stocks just referred to are among the most solid things in the Home Railway ordinary group, and advances in the dividends at the rates I have mentioned would raise the yields to an average of 4½ per cent. Such returns are not extravagant as yields run nowadays, but the probability is all in favour of the improvement in railway receipts continuing throughout the half-year that has been entered upon.

RUBBER.

Long Life and Increasing Yields—Some Investment Opportunities.

Some comments which have recently appeared in the financial columns of a great daily newspaper show how widespread is the misconception which still exists with regard to the most elementary facts of the rubber industry, even among those who undertake the important duty of guiding the financial opinion of the public. We are told in some quarters that the trees in the Middle East plantations must die an early and most unnatural death, as they are supposed to be unable to acquire maturity out of Brazil. In Brazil many trees are known to be enjoying a ripe old age of eighty years, and, judging by the amount of latex which they are now yielding, some of the trees in Ceylon which were planted thirty years ago may be said to be approaching their prime. Many instances, in fact, might be adduced in confirmation of the opinion which was expressed some few years ago by a well-known planter, that the "life of a rubber tree is like the life of a man. The greatest mortality is in the very early years, but once these are passed, although there may be occasional deaths from accident and disease, there is no reason why the remainder should not live to be at least three score years and ten."

The yields, of course, of these old trees are enormous, and although of little present practical use to us as a basis for computation, they cannot fail to inspire us with hope as to the high yields which we may expect from plantation rubber as the industry passes from its promising youth to prosperous middle age. The Linggi chairman told us recently of a block of twelve-year-old trees which last year gave an average of 10¾ lbs. of rubber per tree. At Parit Buntar some fifteen-year-old trees are giving an average annual yield of over 27 lbs. each, while the few old trees in Ceylon are giving an annual crop of between 50 lbs. and 60 lbs. per tree. Feeling as I do that caution and moderation will always produce the most satisfactory results, I do not care at the present moment to confess how high my hopes run as to the yields which may eventually be obtained from old plantation rubber, and I am content to wait until a wider experience confirms my hope and justifies my confidence. It may be of more immediate practical interest to compare the Straits Times' scale of estimated yields (which I used last week) with the outputs which are now being obtained in the Middle East; and as an example I will take the Anglo-Malay, which announced an output for 1909 of 517,550 lbs. from "just over 1,000 acres." This output, it may be noticed in passing, already reaches the conservative maximum which I adopt in my tables of prospective dividend estimates. The age and acreage figures mentioned below are taken from current publications, and are believed to be approximately correct. The expectation of yield for 1909 is shown in detail, and the total is compared with the actual output.

The Most Complete List of Rubber and Oil Share Quotations will be found in every Saturday's issue of "The Financial Times," 1d. daily. On sale everywhere.

ANGLO-MALAY OUTPUT, 1909.

| Age of Trees in 1909. | Acreage Tapped. | Lbs. per Acre. | Total Lbs. |
|---|---|---|---|
| 10 years and over | 107 | 840 | 89,880 |
| 9 years | 245 | 720 | 176,400 |
| 8 years | 100 | 460 | 46,000 |
| 7 years | 100 | 360 | 36,000 |
| 6 years | 275 | 240 | 66,600 |
| 5 years | 185 | 120 | 22,200 |
| 4 years | 50 | 90 | 4,500 |
| Expectation of yield :— | | Lbs. | 441,580 |
| Actual production | | Lbs. | 517,550 |

While it is perfectly true that few companies exceed the magnificent results shown by Anglo-Malay, there are many which furnish ample confirmatory evidence of the general reliability of the Straits Times' scale. Although I may from time to time use this scale to illustrate an argument, I prefer for the present, from motives of caution, to retain my adopted maximum of 500 lbs. per acre as the basis of my investment tables, and the margin thus afforded will provide the investor with a useful and very substantial reserve against possible contingencies.

Ten per Cent. with Rubber at a Penny per lb. Profit.

The shares of producing companies, of course, have the undoubted advantage over the non-producers of standing to gain by any rise in the price of the raw article, while the probable fall in future years is fairly discounted by the moderate standard of profit which I have assumed in my tables. Federated Selangor, Asiatics, Malacca, Lanadron, Linggi, Batu Tiga, and Inch Kenneth all afford splendid investment opportunities at the present time, and I can only regret that I have no space in which to plead their respective claims at length. For the investor whose stern conservatism or limited purse will not allow him to pay a heavy premium for a share there is, however, if he is prepared to wait, a bright prospect in store; and I will ask my readers to ponder carefully what I have to say. In the earlier portion of this and my previous articles I was able to prove that 840 lbs. is not too much to expect as the annual yield of an acre of ten-year-old rubber. Now, 840 pence is the equivalent of £3 10s., and if 840 lbs. of rubber can be produced from one acre at one penny per lb. profit, that profit will be sufficient to pay 10 per cent. on the shares of any company which can bring its rubber to the ten years' stage at a capital cost of £35 per acre. How many companies whose estates are now undergoing careful and systematic development (some perhaps now little more than mere jungle propositions) will be able to bring their rubber into bearing at a total cost of £35 or under? Not all, by any means, for many are far too overweighted with capital raised in boom times; but there are dozens of companies (well managed, possessing splendid soil and healthy young trees) which are capable of answering my test; and it cannot be doubted that, for the investor who is prepared for a long shot, there are many shares to be picked up to-day at modest premiums which will ultimately bring in handsome profits of 10, 20, and 30 per cent. when rubber fetches no more than one, two, or three pence profit per lb. Glen Bervie, for instance, now has 1,000 acres of rubber, which cannot, so far, have cost the company more than £20 per planted acre. A portion of the estate has reached the tapping stage, and Mr. Copeman, who recently inspected the property, describes it as "one of the cheapest estates in the East." Bandar Sumatra, Jeram, Travancore, Merlimau, Java Plantations, Tandjong, and Kajang are all in the low capitalised section, and I can confidently recommend them to the attention of those of my readers who desire to possess shares which will still be able to earn substantial profits in the days when it may be necessary to count rubber profits in pence, instead of shillings.

The Kinta Kellas sales have been of a very satisfactory character, and I hear on excellent authority that developments of an important character are pending which should justify high values for the shares in the near future. The announcement of the first shipments of rubber by Brieh and Alor Pongsu calls attention to two well-managed estates which promise to furnish yields on an exceptionally high scale. The Prye dividend is due this month, and I should not be surprised to see 10 per cent. paid, instead of 5 per cent., as foreshadowed by the prospectus.

The Market Position—Crude Rubbers.

The troubles of the American and Mining markets have upset the Stock Exchange as a whole, and it is nothing less than marvellous that the Rubber market becomes firmer each day, and even with the public standing aloof for the present, slowly makes headway from the support which Mincing Lane and other people who clearly understand the industry are always ready to give. One word as to Crude Rubbers. Partly owing to German failures and constant selling by weak speculators, these shares have had a drastic set-back, which has now weeded out the dangerous West-enders who were gambling in them on borrowed money. The market considers that they have now fallen far enough, and a substantial recovery is bound to come before long. Mincing Lane now admits that this company will take a high place in the industry when its new plant at Edmonton is in full swing. A factory is in course of erection to deal with 3,000 to 4,000 tons of rubber per annum, and the manager considers that their cleaned product will secure "a higher price than that of any known brand," and their rubber will become the standard for rubber all over the world. Some readers have sent letters to me asserting that this company has no patents, no works, and has never produced any cleansed rubber! The board intends setting apart three days for a shareholders' demonstration at Edmonton, and they and the world will soon discover for themselves the intrinsic merits of the concern.

Ceylon Rubber and General Produce.

The shareholders of the Ceylon Rubber, Tea, and General Produce Co., Limited, must be of a singularly placable disposition if they are content with the explanations in reply to the criticisms of Truth, which were given at the statutory meeting last week. In regard to one important point it was indeed no longer possible to deny the accuracy of the information I published. Three out of the five estates which the company was formed to acquire are called the Matale group. It is now admitted that the owners of these estates have repudiated the authority of the agent who claimed to sell on their behalf; and although the company's solicitor expressed the hope that the sale would yet be carried out, he hinted that litigation might be necessary. Down to the present it is therefore open to doubt whether the company will ever secure possession of the major portion of the properties which figured so attractively in the prospectus. Another serious matter with which I dealt with in my articles was the misleading use of the names of Messrs. Joseph Fraser and Wm. Forsythe. When challenged at the meeting, the chairman, Mr. J. M. Craig, virtually implied that the comments in TRUTH were the outcome of an anonymous letter in the Times of Ceylon, and an anonymous letter, he said, would never receive any answer from him. He added that Messrs. Fraser and Forsythe's reports, if not written for the company, "ought to have spoken the truth in any case." Mr. Craig's remarks exhibit really amazing audacity. He knows very well that this is no question of an anonymous letter. My first article on the matter contained a disclaimer which Mr. Fraser had sent to me for publication as soon as the prospectus reached him in Ceylon. Mr. Fraser wrote that the use of his name and Mr. Forsythe's in the prospectus was unauthorised and unjustifiable; and Mr. Forsythe duly confirmed this in a subsequent letter to TRUTH. These two gentlemen have a high reputation as experts on Ceylon plantations. A year or two ago they made reports on one, and only one, of the five estates mentioned in the prospectus, and to those reports (although not intended for the purpose of this promotion) they would doubtless adhere. But the complaint against the promoters and directors of the company was that the prospectus set forth a series of statements relating to all five properties and then, by means of a disingenuously worded paragraph, conveyed the impression that these statements were based on Messrs. Fraser and Forsythe's reports. It was a frigid and calculated misrepresentation. Even in the case of the single estate upon which they really had reported, the prospectus gave no separate details, but mixed up the particulars as to the acreage under cultivation, the number and age of the rubber trees, etc., with those in regard to two other estates. In these circumstances Mr. Craig's observation that the writers of the reports "ought to have spoken the truth" was grossly impertinent in every sense of the word. Their protest against the association of their names with the company was amply warranted. The prospectus was a document which they could not possibly countenance, and the promoters were parties with whom they did not care to be connected. However, for the sake of the shareholders I trust that the Ceylon Rubber Tea and General Produce Company will, after all, turn out a more satisfactory investment than a number of dead or moribund gold mining and other undertakings with whose disappointing history Mr. Craig is familiar.

LUCERNE. HÔTEL SCHWEIZERHOF, LUCERNE, SWITZERLAND.

Private suites with Bath-rooms. Auto Garage.

MINES

FURTHER FLOOD OF LIQUIDATION—A KAFFIR COMPARISON—CLOVERFIELDS.

Johannesburg speculators joined the ranks of the sellers during the past week, and helped to knock down further the prices of South Africans. The Continental liquidation was continued, among the shares chiefly affected being Tintos and Rand Mines; while in addition there was a certain amount of selling by stale bulls on this side who had been hoping for an early recovery, but found things getting worse instead of better. At the time of writing these markets are firmer, but the outlook is still very uncertain. There is the American difficulty, and it remains to be seen whether the settlement now in progress will go through without any trouble coming to life. People with Continental connections believe that the worst of the liquidation from that quarter has been experienced, but for the reasons given in my last Notes, an early sustained recovery is doubtful. In the recent depression a good many weak bulls have been forced to close their accounts, but there are no doubt some who have clung on, and will be tempted by a partial rally.

Last week I showed by means of a table the extent of the fall in Rhodesians; it may be of interest to give a similar table of representative Kaffirs:—

| Share. | Highest this year. | Now. | Fall. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Bantjes | 3¼ | 2⅝ | ⅝ |
| Central Mining | 17⅜ | 16⅛ | 1¼ |
| City Deep | 4 15/16 | 4 5/16 | ⅝ |
| *Crown Mines | 9 1/16 | 8⅝ | 7/16 |
| *East Rand Prop. | 5 23/32 | 5½ | 11/32 |
| Geduld | 3 | 2 1/16 | 15/16 |
| *Geldenhuis Deep | 4¼ | 3⅝ | ½ |
| General Mining and Finance | 2⅜ | 2 1/16 | 11/16 |
| Gold Fields | 6 15/32 | 6 3/4 | 5/16 |
| *Gold Mines Investment | 3 3/16 | 2⅞ | 5/16 |
| *Johnnies | 2 3/32 | 1 31/32 | 7/16 |
| *New Kleinfontein | 2 9/16 | 2 9/16 | — |
| *Knights | 4 1/16 | 3 7/16 | ⅝ |
| Knight Central | 2 5/16 | 1 11/16 | ⅝ |
| *Modderfontein | 14 5/16 | 11 11/16 | 2⅝ |
| Modder B. | 3 15/16 | 3 3/32 | 27/32 |
| Randfontein Central | 3 5/16 | 2 11/16 | ⅝ |
| Randfontein Estates | 2 13/16 | 2 3/32 | 17/32 |
| *Rand Mines | 9 21/32 | 8⅝ | 23/32 |
| *Robinson Deep | 4⅛ | 3 9/16 | 9/16 |
| S. A. Gold Mines | 3 1/32 | 1 31/32 | 1⅛ |
| *Van Ryn | 4 13/16 | 4¼ | 9/16 |
| *Wit. Deep | 5⅜ | 4¾ | ⅝ |

The depreciation, it will be seen, is not insignificant, but the percentage decline is not so great as in the case of the Rhodesians illustrated last week. Some people argue that as Rhodesians have had the bigger fall of late they are likely to be more sought after than Kaffirs when the revival does come, but if we go further back and compare current prices with the lowest of last year it will be found that Rhodesians are relatively much higher than Kaffirs even now. Of course, there is more scope for a gamble in Rhodesians, as comparatively little is known regarding not a few of the properties on the market, whereas in the case of a good many Kaffirs it is fairly easy to gauge prospects. Some people would rather buy a purely speculative share if there is a chance of substantial appreciation than acquire an interest in a more solid enterprise, although the latter may have prospects of a rise in market value. To such operators Rhodesians and West Africans afford more scope than Kaffirs, generally speaking, but they need to be careful in making selections even at the present reduced level of values. My correspondence indicates, however, that there are not a few who want dividends as well as appreciation, and prefer Kaffirs because it is possible to gauge to a certain extent the life of the mines. Most of the shares in the above table should appeal to such operators, especially as present prices in several cases include the dividends recently declared for the first half of the current year. I have indicated by an asterisk those which are "full of dividend" at the present time.

Inasmuch as they show only a small falling off as compared with the previous month, the June figures relating to the Transvaal gold production and the native labour supply are quite satisfactory. The yield was 625,181 ounces as against 634,170 ounces in the preceding month. May being a longer month, it was to be expected that the June output would show some decline. On the basis of the daily average production, however, last month's return is better than the preceding one. Following on a decrease of nearly 1,000 natives in May, a loss of 811 is reported for June, but, as I have explained before, this is the season of the year when the natives leave the mines to attend to their crops. The falling off this year is quite small compared with what it was twelve months ago, and although the returns for this month and possibly next may record a further decline, it is not anticipated that the total seasonal loss will be so heavy as in previous years.

Several letters have reached me the last week or two from correspondents interested in Cloverfields, asking whether they should buy more shares to average. The price has come down appreciably of late to the accompaniment of talk of a probable reconstruction, but now it transpires that an amalgamation with neighbouring properties is under consideration. Mr. Abe Bailey, who took over some time ago from the Oceana Company its interest in the Welgedacht Exploration Company, has made an offer on behalf of the latter concern to absorb the Cloverfield and Geygerle. The proposal has been agreed to by several of the largest shareholders, and as soon as details have been definitely settled the general body of shareholders will be advised of the scheme. This idea of amalgamation seems a good one, but to buy more Cloverfields before the terms of the proposed deal are made known would be little more than a gamble.

A Promising Kaffir—Gold Mines Investments' Improved Position.

Among the mining finance companies the Gold Mines Investment, I hear, has improved its position very much during the current year, and a purchase of the shares at the present comparatively modest premium (they are of the nominal value of £2) would appear promising from a lock-up point of view. Some of my readers may remember that a few years ago the merits of these shares were drawn attention to in Truth when the price was under £2. The company is entitled to participate to the extent of 20 per cent. in new business undertaken by the Consolidated Gold Fields, and through this agreement it has been doing very well of late. My information is that it has realised a big profit, amounting to about £100,000, out of its participation in the Shamva Mines deal and still holds some 15,000 shares in that concern quoted in the region of £4 apiece. It has an interest in the Lonely Mine at par, as against the present market price of 2½, and will participate on favourable terms in the flotation of the Golden Kopje property when it is brought out by the Gold Fields. Further, the Gold Mines Investment has taken part in the financing of several Jungle propositions, including the Gold Coast Amalgamated. For 1909 the Gold Mines Investment paid dividends totalling 10 per cent. (4s. per share), and has recently declared an interim distribution of 5 per cent. on account of the current year. There are 250,000 shares of £2 each in issue, so that a 10 per cent. dividend requires a sum of £50,000, or half the profit stated to have been made already on the Shamva Mines deal alone. In the circumstances it does not seem unreasonable to expect a moderate increase in the final dividend for the current year, although it is not to be expected that the directors will divide up to the hilt. They will no doubt take advantage of the opportunity afforded by a good year's results to add to the reserve fund, which now stands at £25,000.

The Mexican Gamble Checked—Instructive Report by Mexico El Oro's Local Director.

"On the information available it seems to me that the present prices of the shares discount possibilities a good way ahead." These were the words of caution which appeared in my last Notes in connection with the activity in Mexico El Oros and Carmens, while in the preceding issue of Truth I pointed out that the developments reported on the Mexico El Oro's eighth level were less favourable than those on the seventh. During the past week the gamble in these and other Mexican shares has been checked by, and prices have consequently subsided on, the publication of a report on the Mexico El Oro mine written by Mr. Raymond, the company's local director in Mexico. Mr. Raymond gives a carefully considered statement of the position, which runs to several pages of print. The report is a model of frankness, and as it waves a danger-signal it has found anything but favour in the sight of those enthusiasts who were recently talking the shares many pounds higher.

Mr. Raymond emphasises the importance of dealing with larger quantities of the low-grade ore and of not expecting too much from the richer west sulphide vein, and goes on to remark:—

> I do not fear that the mine is going to peter out on the 8th level, or the 9th level, or below that; but looking the thing fairly in the face, particularly at the main vein, I fear there may be considerable rustling around, looking for ore on those lower levels, and, possibly, a little deeper. . . .

With the good help the sulphide vein is giving Mr. Raymond thinks it is possible to increase the output and profits a little, and he has recommended the manager to raise the profits to about £15,000 a month. At that rate the annual gross earnings will be equivalent to about 100 per cent., the capital of the company being £180,000. But even if the company were to distribute 100 per cent.—which, of course, it is not likely to do unless the management sees its way at some future date to further increase the returns—the shares would not be really cheap at £9. In view of the ore reserves being apparently under two years ahead of the mill, most speculative investors would probably expect a yield of more than 11 per cent. per annum.

INDUSTRIALS.

British North Borneo—An Encouraging Report—Delahayes' Dashing Dividend.

Solid progress is indicated in the report for the year 1909 of the British North Borneo Company. The total receipts have risen to £243,185, which is a new record and compares with £152,945 in the preceding year. Expenditure at £95,870 was only £1,600 higher than in 1908, and the board has been able, after putting £50,000 aside as the nucleus for a reserve fund, to raise the dividend from 4 to 5 per cent. Most of the important revenue items showed expansion—land sales rose from £5,500 to £25,900, and concessions brought in £77,000 against £20,000. The lands and property account now stands in the balance-sheet at £834,000, which is equal to about £27 per square mile, or less than 1s. per acre. As the company is selling no land now for less than £1 per acre this valuation is significantly moderate. The company's issued share capital has increased during the year from £903,650 to £1,593,165, but since the balance-sheet was made up the whole of the debenture and bonded debt has been redeemed. The British North Borneo has a substantial interest in the shares of a number of rubber companies, several of which stand at substantial premiums, and although for the present it is incurring liabilities under its guarantee of dividends to those subsidiaries (advances last year being £27,800) there is little doubt that later on the rubber investments of the parent concern will materially swell its profits. The company's holding of £75,000 founders' shares in the British Borneo Exploration Company, received as consideration for the mineral concession, is another asset of considerable potential value. A first shipment of coal has already been made. Altogther the report leaves one with the impression that British North Borneo £1 shares bought at about their present price of 28s. will in a few years prove a remunerative investment.

Satisfactory results are shown by Lovell and Christmas and the International Tea Company, both of which have had no difficulty in maintaining 7 per cent. dividends. Delahaye and Co., the motor-car manufacturers, increased their net profit last year from £18,500 to £68,800, and the company is able to pay 10 per cent. against 7 per cent. on the preferred shares, and 15 per cent. against 6½ per cent. on the ordinary. To reserve £10,000 is being applied against £5,000, and a sum of £6,300 is appropriated for the purpose of finally extinguishing "preliminary expenses," after which £29,900 instead of £2,500 is being carried forward. Satisfaction at these results is greatly enhanced by the directors' statement that business for the current year has, so far, been considerably in excess of that for the corresponding period of any previous year.

OIL.

The Slump in Maikop Shares—A Fall Due Solely to Over-Speculation—Shares that are Worth Averaging.

With very few exceptions oil shares last week continued to dwindle, those in the Maikop group suffering the most. To those people who acquired shares in the recent oil boomlet this continuous shrinkage in values is disconcerting, although I am assured by people in the best position to judge that the explanation is to be found not in the financial position of the companies, but in the financial position of people who bought shares during the recent craze. A few months ago Maikop was a word to conjure with; people tumbled over one another to buy for immediate profits, and a great many speculators either bought shares they never meant to take up or many more shares than they were able to take up. They have since been rudely awakened to the fact that the boom was premature, and hence a period of long drawn out liquidation and receding prices. Meanwhile, beyond the present low price of Russian oil—which may be regarded as a temporary matter—I have failed to discover anything that warrants a modification of the hopeful views I have already formed (based upon the reports of leading experts and the preliminary oil "finds") with regard to the Maikop field. A period of waiting for tangible results was, of course, inevitable; reservoirs have to be constructed, drilling operations developed, roads made, and the pipe line completed before the companies can start as serious producers and exporters. But such preliminary work is actively in progress, and by the end of the year when the first pipe line will be laid Maikop should settle down to the business of profit earning. As speculative purchases I retain my good opinion of Anglo-Maikops, Black Seas, Maikop Pipe Line and Transports, Maikop Valleys, and Maikop Midlands, and while a revival in the market may have to be waited for, the present almost looks an opportunity for those who bought at much higher prices to average. One of the reasons which has all along prompted me to single out the companies just enumerated is their freedom from burdensome vendors' royalties, which in the case of a number of Maikop concerns may, with oil at a low price, make all the difference between success and failure. It is perhaps necessary, as I know my remarks are read by widows and others not in a position to touch aught but steady interest bearing securities, to repeat that my recommendations are intended only for the speculator able and willing to accept risk. The Anglo-Maikop's position is particularly interesting, for I am assured that the company has in hand at the present time cash to the value of £200,000, or sufficient alone to redeem the whole of the ordinary shares at their present market price. Two exceptionally good features during the week have been Spies and Egyptian Oil Trusts. The spouter just discovered by the Spies Company, to which I briefly referred a week ago, is of great importance as tending to prove the petroliferous character of a number of recently acquired plots. Egyptian Oil Trusts improved in connection with the issue of capital by the Gemsah Oilfields. The latter company will take over properties belonging to the Red Sea Company, upon which there are three existing wells, and will have a capital of £1,600,000 in £1 shares, of which £400,000 will be held in reserve. Of the remainder, £400,000 will go to the vendors—the Red Sea Oilfields—in part payment, 200,000 will be taken by the Shell Transport group, and 600,000 will be offered to the public for subscription at par. The Egyptian Oil Trust holds 240,000 shares in the Red Sea Oilfields.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

Rubber and Oil Acquisitions.

Mr. Adnam Sprange, secretary of Rubber and Oil Acquisitions, Limited, Whitehall House, Charing Cross, S.W., has not favoured me with the prospectus of that company which he is distributing through the post, but an obliging correspondent has let me have his copy. The prospectus invites subscriptions for 25,000 shares of £1 each, and states that the company has already on offer "valuable rubber estates in Malay, Sumatra, Java, and West Africa, and promising oilfields in Roumania"; also that "it is estimated that a profit equal to a dividend of 100 per cent. . . . can be secured almost immediately" from one of these properties. The directors are Messrs. Henry Greig, 24, Queen Victoria Street, Allan Leonard, 4, Warwick Mansions, Gray's Inn, and Edmund Smith, A.M.Inst.C.E., 29, Charing Cross. I have not before heard of these gentlemen as philanthropists, but their readiness to take the public into that 100 per cent. proposition, to say nothing of the others they have, seems to smack of philanthropy rather than business. Mr. Smith, I notice, is entitled to receive £1,250 in consideration of the payment of the preliminary expenses of the company, and the directors may proceed to allotment on a subscription of seven shares. Whether this can be regarded as a business-like arrangement depends entirely upon one's point of view.

British New Guinea Development.

My recent paragraph in reference to the British New Guinea Development Company, Limited, was promptly brought to the notice of the directors; but on June 25 the secretary informed a stockholder that "the question of replying to the criticism in the paper has not yet been decided." I do not know whether any decision has now been arrived at, but at any rate I have not so far been favoured with any answer to the paragraph which, as I explained, was based upon an article in an Australian newspaper. I observe, however, that in his letter to the shareholders the secretary alludes to two points. First of all he speaks of the care with which the company's properties were selected, "some being already under cultivation." This, however, is not inconsistent with the statement I quoted that most of the land acquired was scrub or jungle in its virgin state. Secondly, the secretary remarks that the bulk of the purchase price was satisfied by the allotment of ordinary shares. This is true, but it does not dispose of the criticism that the vendors took £50,200 in cash for properties for which they paid only £1,800 in cash.

Mandevilles, Limited.

Among the circularising firms brought to my notice are Mandevilles, Limited, 56, Moorgate Street, E.C., who just now recommend "call options" on American railroad shares, and undertake to send by wire or letter to those desiring it "any special information likely to prove of value." These invitations to speculate from a firm bearing the name of Mandeville inevitably awaken memories of the London and Paris Exchange, whose affairs appear to have been buried in the oblivion of Carey Street. It seems almost superfluous to say so, but in view of inquiries perhaps it may be well to mention that I certainly do not advise people to deal with Mandevilles, Limited, or, indeed, with any outside brokers. My invariable advice to my readers is that they should do their business through brokers who are members of the Stock Exchange.

The London Scottish Cover-Snatchers.

Two recent victims of the London Scottish Stock Exchange, whom I will call Mrs. X. and Mr. Y., have sent me contract notes and correspondence showing how neatly that bucket-shop has diddled them out of £30 each. Mr. Y. first of all remitted £20 for two shares in "Stock Union No. 27c." On June 16 he was advised that the "Stock Union" had been opened in Canadian Pacifics on a 1 per cent. margin; on June 17 he was notified that it had been closed at a total loss. A letter from the Exchange, signed "A. Murray, manager," expressed deep regret at this "untoward result," and added:—

> As we are most anxious to retrieve our position with those who have been associated with us, we have decided to immediately form Stock Union No. 28c, which we have little doubt of completing successfully.

How Murray must have grinned to himself when he penned the delightfully ambiguous phrase which I have italicised! Innocent Mr. Y. read it in good faith, forwarded another £10, and learned in due course that "No. 28c.," having been opened in Atchisons on June 27, had been closed at a total loss on June 28. Murray was again "exceedingly sorry," but after being twice bit Mr. Y. became shy, and declined an invitation to subscribe to "No. 29c." Mrs. X.'s £30 disappeared in the same way in the same "Stock Unions." In a letter of complaint she remarked that, of course, her loss "did not matter" to the Exchange. "In this," wrote Murray, who evidently loves a little joke, "you are very much mistaken." This was literally true, but Murray went on to insinuate a pretence put forward more nakedly in a statement in his prospectuses, namely, that as the Exchange's commission of 10 per cent. is payable only on profits, "palpably, unless a profit is made for subscribers our loss must be very heavy." That is the very reverse of the truth. The losses of the subscribers are the gains of the bucket-shop, and the supposed transactions in shares of which fictitious accounts are rendered are mere devices for extracting money from the pockets of the public.

Ignorance of the business of the stock markets may, perhaps, be an excuse for the failure of people to perceive the absurdity of all these bucket-shop fairy tales about 1 per cent. cover "operations" in American Railway or other shares. Really, however, it is rather difficult to discover any excuse for the credulity of those who imagine that firms capable of coining money in this way—"during the past year" the Exchange unblushingly asserts "we have closed some sixty stock unions at profits ranging from 100 to over 500 per cent."—would exercise their talents for the benefit of strangers, contenting themselves with a paltry commission to defray their expenses. It surely ought to be understood that this sort of philanthropy is not practised in the City of London, nor, so far as I know, anywhere else.

"Three Months' Trusts."

One of the flaming advertisements of McKinley, Alexander and Sons, which last week illumined the City page of the Daily Mail, winds up with this challenge:—

> Kindly compare our offer with that of any broker in Great Britain to-day, and it will prove to speak for itself.

By all means. Comparison with a circular issued in the nom de guerre of Hessell, Gould and Co. shows that the latter not only make a precisely similar offer, but in paragraph after paragraph use precisely the same phrases as McKinley, Alexander and Sons. Both bucket-shops exhibit the same sly humour by remarking that they are "appealing to the business instincts of the public generally" when they invite subscriptions to those Three Months' Trusts in American Rails with which my readers are already acquainted. Hessell, Gould and Co. are a newly-arisen firm—new under that name at least—whose earliest Three Months' Trusts have not had time to expire. Perhaps they are young and innocent, and do not yet know what a foolish thing it is for a business firm to conduct gambles on the condition that they shall bear all the losses themselves and hand over all the profits to their customers. No doubt Hessell, Gould and Co.—or possibly their customers—will find this out in due course. McKinley, Alexander and Sons have, however, been at work on this system long enough to realise the folly of it. They have had to tell expectant creditors, first, that they were so overwhelmed with clerical labour that they could not get their accounts made out; secondly, that part of the ledgers had "disappeared" through the carelessness of dismissed clerks; and, thirdly, that they required "patience" in the matter of payment. But despite all this they persist in spending large sums in advertising their anxiety to enrich every one who will let them have "£2 and multiples thereof." Only last week I had a visit from a solicitor on behalf of a client whose patience McKinley, Alexander and Sons had exhausted. In reply to his inquiry, I suggested that after the advertisement in the Daily Mail they ought to be able to pay up.

Charles Coventry and Company.

The warnings that I have given for years past against the bucket-shop keeper trading as Charles Coventry and Company—warnings founded upon the fact that he professes to advise his customers how to make profits by speculations while his object is to involve them in losses—receive additional force from a correspondence lately placed in my hands. The case was one in which the customer happened to have made a profit. The amount due to him was less than £40, but Coventry and Company desired him to sign an agreement to accept half the amount—to be paid, moreover, in instalments spread over four months—in full discharge and satisfaction, and when he demurred they referred him to their solicitors. I wonder whether these are the solicitors whom Coventry and Company give as references to prospective customers?

New Issues.

Taiping Rubber Plantations, Limited (Federated Malay States), is a company formed to acquire four estates comprising 5,332 acres, of which 1,820 acres have been planted with 361,660 rubber trees, and 170 acres are cleared ready for planting. The capital is £210,000 in 2s. shares, which have already been subscribed and the prospectus is now published for public information only.

The Argentine Hardwoods and Lands Co., Limited, has a capital of £325,000 in £1 shares, of which 225,000 are now being issued, the vendors taking 47,000 in part payment of the purchase price of the properties, and the remaining 178,000 being offered for subscription. The company is formed to acquire certain freehold forest estates, comprising an area of over 214 square miles in the Argentine Republic, together with private railways, saw mill, stock of timber, live stock, and to take over a timber business as a going concern.

The Amatongaland Rubber Corporation, Limited, whose nominal capital is £300,000, offers for subscription 220,000 shares of £1 each. The company, which is the first subsidiary of the recently formed Vine and General Rubber Trust, will deal with a total area of about 441,000 acres of rubber vine lands in Natal, acquiring under licence the right to use the patent Guiguet machines for extracting rubber direct from the vines.

Subscriptions are invited for 400,000 shares of 2s. each in the First B.C. Goldfield, Canada, Limited. The company, whose capital is £100,000, has been formed to acquire the Princess May claim, Skeena district, one of the first gold mining claims staked out on the Marmot River, near Stewart, in the Bitter Creek locality, British Columbia.

The Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. is making an issue at par of £1,250,000 5 per cent. debenture stock, which will rank immediately after the 4½ per cent. first debenture stock. The latter is quoted at a substantial premium. The company has recently absorbed the undertaking of the Steam Navigation Co.

"Vigilant's" Letter Box.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of Truth.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

Bombay.—A sound investment, but I do not regard yours as a case for averaging. Ben.—Hold these for a recovery, but it would be well to take up the shares if you can do so.

Circars.—Hold what you have, but immediate prospects not rosy enough to make me urge a further purchase.

Exmoor.—1. Mexican Southern Ord. 2. Nothing to go upon beyond a prospectus that was noticeable for the absence of several important details.

Foy.—Latest advices reassuring. I would not part with either just now.

Medico.—Too speculative to be attractive.

Nairne.—2. Sorry, but the company is unfamiliar. Have you given the name correctly? Nos. 3 and 4 are both well secured.

Pharaoh.—The company is a sound one. It has been affected by the poor cotton crop of last year, but, given a better crop this time, the position should show speedy improvement. As a lock-up I regard the shares as promising.

Simplex.—See answer to "Pharaoh."

Wilts.—1. I advised selling in an article on February 23, when the stock stood at 88. At the present price of 80 I should be less inclined to part. The stock is very speculative, but it has strong backers, who will not fail to give it a run if the next crop shows signs of being favourable.

Mines.

Anxious. 1. Sell. 2 and 3. Hold. Alluvial.—I think the enterprise has hopeful prospects, but so far as I am aware there are no shares on the market yet.

C. B. L.—I do not care to recommend you to keep the shares. Chalo.—Exchange into something more promising.

Da Kar.—1. I cannot say what the next dividend will be, but think it unlikely that it will be more than 10 per cent. 2. Estimated at about seven years. DRAPER.—1. You must finance the calls up to the special settlement. 2. I am not aware it is obligatory. DEWI.—1. May have some recovery later on, in which case realise. 2. I have not a high opinion of them.

EXON.—They have lock-up chances, but in my opinion you could make a more promising selection just now.

FAIRLEIGH.—1. Yes, in time. 2. They are, of course, speculative, as are all mining shares. FOOL (Cork).—All deals hold good unless a special settlement is refused.

GLENFLESK.—1. May have some recovery later on with the better class shares of the group. 2. Sell on a moderate rally. 3. You might average these if prepared to take them off the market for a time.

HOLMESDALE.—1. See note in another column. 2. Hopeful speculative lock-up.

IRLANDA.—I have a poor opinion of them.

LAQUA.—If your broker cannot get an offer for them you might try an advertisement in one of the financial papers. LADY.—1. Better exchange into something less speculative with better prospects. 2. I should be inclined to secure the good profit, as prospects are rather uncertain. LEX, Dublin.—1. May have some recovery, but I think you could employ your money to better advantage elsewhere. 2. I have not much information as to these, and know of no reason to anticipate much advance. LEX, Scarborough.—A purchase at the present stage of the company's affairs would be very speculative, as it remains to be seen what terms are to be offered under the suggested amalgamation.

MAUREEN.—Hold Kleinfonteins for the dividends. MARJORY.—Keep for dividends the shares you already have. MARTIN.—1. Towards the end of the year. They may eventually have such a rise. 2. I should be inclined to take less.

NATIONAL.—Spread your risk by putting the additional money into City Deep, Rose Deep, and Gold Mines Investment.

QUERT.—Both fair speculations from a lock-up point of view.

RUBIO.—1. Better spread your risk by putting the additional money into something else. 2. Hold in hope of some recovery.

SKIDDAW.—1. A purchase would be very speculative just now. 2. You could make a more promising selection than Jubilees. SIMPLICITAS.—Hold all for the present.

UNLUCKY.—1. These appear a hopeful speculative lock-up. 2 and 3. I should be inclined to sell on any recovery.

VICTORY.—The shares have come down with many others in the general market depression. There is nothing radically wrong with the mine, so far as I am aware, and I would hold the shares for a recovery.

WOODHOUSE.—No. 3 is a good selection for dividends; 4 and 5 are fair speculations for a rise in a good market. WINDSOR.—1. I am not greatly attracted by them. Although the company is a dividend payer, prospects are speculative. 2. I see no reason at present to advise the exchange.

MIXED SECURITIES.

The following list, which has been carefully compiled, will meet the requirements of a number of correspondents in search of sound investments yielding from 4 to 5 per cent.:—

4 to 4½ per cent.

Port of Bombay 4 per Cent. Debentures.
Southern Pacific Railroad Bay Shore Line 4 per Cent. Bonds (new).
South-Eastern Railway 4 per Cent. 1900 Preference.
Union Pacific Railroad 4 per Cent. First Lien and Refunding Bonds.
Kansas City Terminals 4 per Cent. Bonds (new).
Grand Trunk Pacific Railway 4 per Cent. Mortgage A Debs.
City of Budapest 4 per Cent. Bonds.
Buenos Ayres and Pacific Railway 4½ per Cent. Cons. Deb. Stock.
Cunard Steamship 4½ per Cent. Debenture Stock.

4½ to 5 per cent.

Cuban Government 4½ per Cent. Bonds (new).
New York Telephone 4½ per Cent. Bonds (new).
National Railways of Mexico 4½ per Cent. Prior Lien Bonds.
Atchison Railroad 5 per Cent. Preferred.
City of Constantinople 5 per Cent. Bonds (new).
Elder Dempster and Co. 5 per Cent. Debenture Stock (new).
Mackay Companies 4 per Cent. Preferred.
Central Uruguay Railway 5½ per Cent. Preference Shares.
Mortgage Company of Egypt 5 per Cent. Preferred.
Argentine Great Western Railway Ordinary Stock.

ALMIS.—The industrials are fair, if not ideal; you do not say which issues you hold, a matter that, of course, precludes my giving a proper answer to your second question. Keep the bonds. A. H., Trowbridge.—1. Leave them alone. 2. Might be held. A. B. C., Harrogate.—1. Sell. 2. Exchange into something more promising, such as Zinc Corporation ordinary. 3. I think there is a fair chance of your being able to realise to better advantage later on. ADMIRER (Belfast).—I should hold both; see Notes. ACORN.—1. See rule two. 2. Not much to go upon at present. There are more attractive things to be had. 3. Better hold them.

C. B., Nottingham.—1. Sell. Hold 2 and 3 for the next reports. COSHAM, Bristol.—1. They ought to be worth holding, judging from the chairman's speech at the statutory meeting. 2. See Rule 2. CADENABLIRA.—1. Hold for the report. 2. It is a very small concern, and there is no market for the shares. It would be advisable to obtain local knowledge. 3. At the present price they are worth holding. CICESTRIAN.—I think there is a fair chance of some recovery in No. 3, but am very doubtful about No. 4. Please note Rule 2. COCCLES.—Nos. 1 and 2 have been energetically hawked about by an outside firm. If you can get rid of them without much loss, do so. No. 3 is a fair investment.

FAIRFAX.—1. Keep them. Dividends are expected to be commenced towards the end of the year. 2. Better hold.

GAUCHO.—1. The position after 1911 is open to considerable doubt, because the original cost of construction is being greatly exceeded. Unless you are prepared to face a fair amount of risk it would be as well to get out now. 2. A sound investment of the kind. GUNNER.—Hold both.

H. T. S.—There are scarcely any suitable debentures of the kind that enjoy a free market here. The list of 4 to 5 per cent. investments given above contains a wide range from which you might select with advantage.

IMBER.—1. A company with good prospects. Hold what you have, but I do not see that it is a case for averaging. 2. They should go above 2¼ in a good market. 3. Early dividends are not to be expected, but the shares appear a hopeful lock-up.

J. W. W.—1. Sell. 2. Hold for some recovery. 3. The company has fair ultimate prospects.

KIRK.—1 and 2. Sell and put the money into something more promising. See my Rubber Notes. KIRK.—1 and 2. Hold both. 3. Sell on any recovery

LIMITED.—1. Should turn out all right in time, but company pursuing an expansionist policy which will restrict ordinary dividends for the present. 2. Hold for dividends. 3. Goodwill too big, reserves too small. Hence I do not look with favour upon the shares just because good dividends have been maintained for some years.

MOUNT.—1. Well secured. I do not advise a sale. 2. It is a sound concern, and the fall seems to discount the increased risks attaching to the "trade." I would not sell now. 3. A big writing down of the capital is inevitable, but, judging by the present price of the shares, the market has evidently prepared for it. It will be possible to judge of the dividend outlook more clearly when the scheme comes out. MASSAGE.—They are three well-secured stocks. No. 1 is perhaps the best of the lot; the agitation may possibly cause a slight reduction in the ordinary dividend, but the position of the bondholders is practically impregnable. MONKEY.—It came out under good auspices, and as a speculation the shares are not without promise. But I should prefer one of my own recommendations.

NAT.—Three wise suggestions. By all means act upon them.

OVERBURY.—1. They will probably have some recovery eventually. 2. Sell on a moderate rally. 3, 4, and 5. Hold for the present. You paid dearly for the oil shares. Better not buy more, though it seems hardly worth selling what you have just at present.

PLANTER.—I do not regard any of the stocks as very attractive investments. No. 3 looked fair at the quotation you name, but it is now over par. No. 5, too, would be all right at par, but at 107 there would be a substantial loss on redemption. As regards 3, estimated construction cost has been greatly exceeded, rendering the position when the guarantee expires in 1912 very doubtful. You might study the list of 4 to 5 per cent. investments given above. Please read Rule 2.

R. G., Guiseley.—I do not care for 1 and would sell. No. 2 is worth holding. Better for the present be content with your present holding of 3. As regards your other questions, see Rule 2. You will find a short list of 4 to 5 per cent. investments given immediately under the heading, "Mixed Securities." RAG.—You will find a carefully selected list above from which you will be able to make your own choice.

SON OF THE ROCK.—Keep your Bovril debs., City of London Electric debs., and Lyons preference, which are sound investments, and do not buy either of the suggested bonds, for which, so far as I am aware, there is no market here. The objections to these investments I regard as so much "blither"; do not allow yourself to be jockeyed out of such stocks in order to assist the unloading operations of the outside concern. See article in TRUTH of June 1. SEA SICK.—1. Prospects at present can only be regarded as very doubtful. 2. Hopeful speculative lock-up for eventual appreciation and dividends. STRATHAVON.—1 and 2. Both very speculative, and I see no reason at present to expect much advance. 3. I should be inclined to sell. SPES.—1. Having bought cum bonus and cum rights, you are entitled to both, and should claim through your broker. 2. I am not attracted by either at present. STRETER.—1. See list above. 2. You might sell part at any rate on a moderate rally. SUSTAN.—1. See reference to the concern in another column. I should be inclined to hold for the present. 2. Hold for a recovery and a profit. 3. Hold.

TRURO.—They are three sound investments and worth holding. But with a view to spreading your money as widely as possible, I would suggest that, instead of buying more of either, you select one or two securities from the list given above. A stock which pays a little over 5 per cent. and looks well secured is Anglo Argentine Tramways new 5 per cent. debenture stock.

VENTURE L.—1. No. 2. Better not average.

WOOD STANLEY, Nottingham.—1. I do not recommend it. 2. Yes. 3. You could make a better investment. See list above. WINEUM.—"Pitman's Stock Exchange," 5s., Pitman and Sons. 2. I should prefer Van Ryn and Wit Deep. 3. A high-class investment, and not dear at present price. WILD DUCK.—1. The prices were quite reasonable, if the shares were sold on Friday. I can only say that the firm named are members of the Stock Exchange. 2. An outside firm to be avoided.

OIL.

CECILIA.—Better keep the oil shares for a recovery.

DOUBTFUL.—1. Highly speculative. Do not buy more. 2. Rubber inquiries should be made on a separate sheet; but see my Notes.

GUNNER (Wicklow).—Sell.

HEDVIL.—I do not care for the shares and would sell.

J. W. M.—Hold them for the present.

LEDA.—Hold 1 and 2. Sell 3.

MOSSBANK.—2. Hold. 3. You paid a high price. Better watch for an opportunity to get out. MACO.—Yes.

PICKWORTH.—The prospectus struck me favourably. Hold the shares and await developments. PANURGE.—They are among the four most promising in the group. I especially favour 1 and 4. Of course, the field is at present in the preliminary stage, but if the estimates of established experts are borne out the companies you mention should do well. At present they are waiting for the establishment of the pipe line and the construction of adequate reservoirs.

SANAND.—The whole market is at present under a cloud, but as a speculation the shares might be held. SHORTY.—Unless there is something radically wrong with the calculations of the experts, a purchase of the shares at present price ought to turn out well in time. SHARES.—A fair speculative holding.

WITNITE.—I do not care for the shares, and would get rid of them.

RUBBER.

AGATHA.—Hold them all for recovery. AINO.—You have a good list of shares, all of which should pay dividends by next year. Hold them all for investment. There is a liability of 2s. 6d. per share on the Sungei Bahru and 7s. 6d. per share on the Sekongs. AJAX.—All should stand higher before the end of the year. ALPHA.—A good share, although rarely dealt in. Hold for investment. ANXIOUS, Wicklow.—Expected to go better in the autumn. 2. No. 3. Write to the secretary. AMOR.—1 and 2. I should sell these, but not just now. Wait for better markets. 3. (a) and (b) When your money is doubled in each case. ASSAM.—You have a good list of rubber shares, every one of which should show you a substantial profit during the next twelve months. Do not sell or exchange any of them. AARUN.—A good list. Hold for a revival. You may average 1 now and the others on any decline below present prices. ATHENEUM.—Yes, hold for recovery and further appreciation. ALPHA, Scarboro'.—You may safely hold your Linggis for a big profit, but be content with a small one on the other two shares, which do not possess such possibilities. ADDAX.—I still think well of them. They are likely to recover towards the end of the year. 2. No. Don't buy them. ARCTURUS.—1. Hold both of these for a market revival. The shares of all companies must be regarded as speculative until they have proved their dividend earning power. 2. It is a pity that your good old-fashioned broker, in his newly-awakened zeal, cannot find you a better rubber share than the one you mention. Do not buy at the present price or even lower. ALETHEA.—1. Not promising. Sell when you can. 2. They ought to pay a substantial dividend during the first twelve months. I expect to see a rise in the price shortly. 3. See second reply to "Clericus." ALVERSTONE.—1-3. I think well of all three. Retain for a good profit. With regard to dividends, you must write to the secretaries. ARGO.—1. No special reason. 2. These should go better before long. 3. You may disregard the views expressed therein. It is quite unreliable. ALGOL.—1. A good company, but price high enough for the present. 2. Not a satisfactory concern. 3. Good to hold for considerable appreciation. 4. Under good control, but rather highly capitalised. AJAX.—This is in good hands, but as the present price discounts future dividends and the shares do not enjoy a free market, I do not advise a purchase. ADSUP.—1. See my Rubber Notes. 2. You had better apply for the number you would like allotted. ALREWAS.—1. R. A. Smith and Co. are not brokers, but bucket-shop keepers. If a civil action against them a few months ago the jury recommended that the methods of business of such firms should be brought under the notice of the Public Prosecutor. 2. Keep for dividends. 3. I do not recommend options. The shares of the company are not a good purchase. ABONNE.—Your opinion of the company is probably correct, but in any case there is not much likelihood of your getting back the money you have paid. ARIEL.—1. Probably during the first half of next year. 2. Tapping has commenced. ARCADIA.—1. Ought to go to double present price. 2. Hold for recovery. 3. Worth keeping for the guaranteed dividend. AD.—See Notes. ANXIOUS, Filey.—1 and 2. I should hold for recovery. 3. Average if there is a further decline. 4. Yes. ADMI.—(a) Not until the end of the year at all events. Write again then. (b) You should hold for a profit. (c) One of the best companies in the list. You may safely retain as a permanent investment. A. P. T.—1. See reply to "Peter Barley." 2. See Notes. ANXIETY.—Never a great favourite of mine, but I am told that the estate is a good one. You had better write to the secretary about the dividend.—ACE, Leeds.—1 and 2. I should keep both these for better markets, but not hold them permanently. 3-10. Your remaining list is a fair one, but it would perhaps be well to exchange 5 and 8 when you can do so without loss. ADMIRER.—(a) A good rubber investment, but not much market. I do not care to fix a selling limit. (b) If you hold these sell when you can. AVENUE.—1-4. Good rubber investments. 5, 6, and 10. Hold for recovery and a profit. 7, 8, and 9. Good to buy at present prices. AARON, Dublin.—Hold 1 and 3 for a profit. When markets recover exchange 2 for a more promising share. ASCONDO.—I do not care to fix limits for these just now, but I advise you to hold all for recovery and appreciation. You may average any of them as the opportunity offers. ACME.—1. A well-managed concern; shares worth holding for dividends. 2. Yes. The "B" shares. ABBOTT.—If you hold the shares it would be more to your advantage to say so, and to mention the cost price when asking my opinion. I should not buy these now, as I think that there are better bargains to be picked up. If, however, you hold them, keep them for a time, but not permanently. ADOLPHUS.—As you mention six shares you should have numbered them 1 to 6, not two sets of three. Of the first group I should sell all when I could get a small profit. 1 is a good company, but at the best you will probably secure only a few shillings profit, as you bought fairly high. Of the second group, why not sell half, securing a splendid profit, and keep the other half, which will have cost you nothing. 2. I have no reliable information about this rupee company. 3. In good hands, but there is very little market. Retain for the present. ABED.—The smallness of the yield is due to the conservative action of the directors in not tapping trees under 24 inches in girth, but this must ultimately benefit the shareholders. AN ENVIER.—See Notes. ARGYLL.—No. A.—1, No. 2. Not likely to be very profitable. 3. Probably a flat-trap; be careful. ARGUS.—Your question is answered by the announcement just made that since June 23 the manager of the Madagascar Co. has shipped 18,700 lbs. of rubber and still has 40,250 lbs. awaiting shipment.

BROMLEY.—Retain for the guaranteed dividend and for eventual appreciation. BOUNCE.—All good to hold for much better prices. BEE.—The address of the company is 17, Philpot Lane, London, E.C. One dividend only has been paid. If you bought the shares in April and have not yet received the transfer it is quite time you became very impatient. Write to your broker, claim the dividend, and ask the cause of the most unreasonable delay. BACHELOR.—1. The company is likely to do well. 2. Perfectly right to dissuade her. Tell her to put the small amount in the Post Office Savings Bank. B. B.—All are good to hold for improvement, but I do not expect that you will get much profit on 6 by the end of the year. 3. Should revive and show a substantial advance by the end of the year. BANGALORE.—1. Retain these for improvement. 2. I do not recommend options. 3. This is a promising share, but as you "cannot afford to hold them" I advise you not to buy. BIRD OF PARADISE.—1. I do not regard the future of this concern as hopeful. 2. Yes. 3. About 10s. BUSH.—1. A fairly good prospect. 2 and 3. I should exchange these for more marketable shares when possible. BORNEO.—1. As the price has fallen below par, you had better keep these for a time. 2. I cannot give you much encouragement here. Get out when you can do so without loss. 3. Not much market. Take a small profit when you can. BUNGY.—1 and 2. Average your Crudes. 3. (a) 30s., (b) 12s. 6d., (c) double your money at the least. BRAH.—1. I should wait a month or so before taking my profit. 2. I should not buy them. 3. Beverley Tea and Rubber or Northumberlands. BIRDIE.—See second reply to "Clericus." BABAJI.—1-3. Hold them all for a revival; there is nothing wrong with these companies. BONAX.—1. Yes; see Notes. 2. Yes. BRITISH GUIANA.—As you are going abroad for four years I should leave instructions to sell, as you suggest. See Notes.

CÆSARIAN SECTION.—You have asked eight questions and enclosed one coupon. See Rule 2. Yours is not a good list. 1 and 2. Will probably turn out well. 4-6. Fair speculative holdings, which I should, however, exchange at a satisfactory opportunity. 3-5. Unsatisfactory concerns. As regards dividends, you must write to the secretaries. CAPITAL ERASURES.—I should take the first chance of selling all three. Not one of them is a promising share. Your pseudonym gives an inkling of your own opinion regarding the probable result of your purchases, and I think you are right. CAREFUL.—You could not do better. The dividend for 1910-11 should be sufficient to show a higher return than what you seek. CECILIA.—Many thanks for your letter. The firm is a good old-established one, but they appear to have done badly for you in this case. CHERITON.—Hold 1 for market revival and a good profit. Exchange 2 and 3 when you can. CLERICUS.—1. See Rule 2. 2. You need not be at all anxious about these shares. By November next there will be ten machines at work on the property, and your limit should be reached within twelve months. 3. Hold for recovery and limit. CURIOUS.—Do not buy them. CONOLLY.—1. A good company. 2. I am not impressed with its prospects. 3. Yes, when in full bearing. CHICKEN.—1. See my Rubber Notes. 2. Hold for a substantial profit. 3. Sell these when you can do so. CROGHAN.—1. A good purchase at present price. 2. Good for guaranteed dividend, but I do not expect much rise in the immediate future, as the market is not an active one. CHEVIN.—See reply to "Peter Barley." CHEROOT.—The Madagascar prospectus is not free from ambiguity regarding the dividend on the preference shares. Until these shares have received in the aggregate dividends amounting to 100 per cent., they are entitled to one-half of the profits of each year, and the other half goes to the ordinary shares. After 100 per cent. in the aggregate has been paid, the profits available will be applied—(1) in distributing annually a sum not exceeding £10,000 amongst the preference shares; (2) in paying a dividend of 5 per cent. on the ordinary shares; and (3) in dividing the balance pari passu amongst all the shares of the company. This is best understood by a concrete example. Assuming a divisible profit of £100,000 for the first year, the preference shares would be entitled to £50,000 (equal to the return of their capital) and the ordinary to £50,000. If a similar profit of £100,000 be made the second year, it will be distributed as follows:—£10,000 to the preference shares (20 per cent.), £15,000 to the ordinary (5 per cent.), and the balance pari passu to all the shares of the company, amounting to upwards of a further 20 per cent. all round. CYNICUS CALVUS.—1. Is a good company. 2. I should sell these on a recovery. COUNTRYMAN.—You should average your Malaccas. In the circumstances you name I do not advise you to sell the other shares you hold and reinvest in rubbers. CARTER. 1. I do not advise this exchange. 2. Quite likely. See reply to "Peter Barley." CARTON.—1. Cannot recommend. 2. An excellent concern. Likely to earn a dividend the first year. 3. One of the cheapest rubber investments in the market. See reply to "Cheroot" and second reply to "Clericus." 4. "Premium" is the cost price in addition to the amount paid up, not inclusive of it. CHINESE. 1. A good speculative investment. Company recently made excellent profits. Retain. 2. A promising share. Hold for investment. 3. Cannot express an opinion; no market on this side.

DIB. You ought to hold for nearly 100 per cent. profit. DAKAR. This year. DEWI.—1 and 2. Should take a profit when I could. 3. Average and hold for a profit. DURANCE.—See the tables and read the articles in the last three issues. DEVITIACUS.—See my Rubber Notes. DAPHNE.—I regard the position as hopeless, but as the shares are unsaleable you must keep them. 2. You gave a very high price, but the company is an excellent one and you had better hold for the price given. In the meantime you are getting a fair return on your money. 3. The same as 2. DIAMONDS.—1. The figures given for Kuala Lumpur were a conservative estimate based on the present planted area, no regard being paid to future development. It must, however, be remembered that the company has a reserve of 682 acres, which is more than a quarter as large as the cultivated area. 2. I should not hold them very long. 3. I should be content to cut a small loss on these when the market revives. DAISYVILLE.—1. See third reply to "Diamonds." 2. A fair concern, said to be going better. DUBITANS.—I. See Notes. 2. My opinion with regard to this share is unaltered. 3. Hold for a much better profit. DERBY.—If you are a regular reader you will have no difficulty in selecting shares concerning which I have a favourable opinion.

EXMOOR.—There is a little market for the shares. You will probably be able to get a small premium before long; then sell, as you would have to wait a long time for a substantial dividend, and in the meantime there is not much prospect of a speculative advance. EMERALD.—The shares about which you seem anxious will prove good purchases. I am not, however, quite so confident with regard to 2, 6, and 7. When you can sell these without loss, exchange them for more marketable shares. Do not convert your Malacca Debentures yet. EIRON.—Hold for double the price you gave. 2 and 3. You should wait for a substantial profit in these cases. E. O. J.—1. See reply to "Peter Barley." 2. See Rubber Notes. 3. Year ends in December. Meeting due shortly. Write to the secretary. EASTBOURNE.—1. I should exchange these when I could do so without loss. 2. Good to hold for a much higher price. 3. Yes. EPOP. 1. See Rubber Notes and average. 2. Yes. 3. I should not buy them.

FEATS.—1. No special reason. 2. Yes. One of the best. 3. I do not say that your limit will not be reached eventually, but at present it seems extravagant. FRANCE.—See my Rubber Notes. FORTUNA.—The shares you name are, of course, speculative, but it is believed that the next few months will produce satisfactory results in each case. FRISCO.—1. Beverley. 2. The secretary would perhaps be able to tell you. 3. The list opened on April 14 last.

GEORGE.—1-3. Hold all for a revival. They are good speculative shares which should respond to an increase in market activity. GUPTAR.—1. A fair speculation at present price. 2. I do not recommend options, and I do not see anything attractive in the shares of this company.—GREYSTONES.—Hold all until the end of the year, then write again for limits. GROUSE—1. See second reply to "Clericus." 2. Good to hold for the guaranteed dividend and much higher price eventually. 3. See Rule 2. GAP.—Not one of my favourites. Your best course to pursue is to await a revival and then exchange into a more promising share. GREYHOUND.—1. This is a well-established company, which during the last three years has paid increasing dividends. The future, however, seems to have been fairly discounted in the price, and in view of the lack of free market for the shares I should not advise a purchase at present quotations. 2. The preference. GRINDER.—It is believed that this will be the last of the small outputs. Wait for the next few months, when a distinct advance is expected. GLAS.—10s. GUNNER (Wicklow).—1. Do not sell at the present profit. You should double it by this time next year. 2. Hold for the guaranteed dividend and for a good profit eventually. GLENGISH.—1. See my Rubber Notes and hold. 2. Do not average; simply retain those you have until you can sell without loss. 3. Do not believe in this. 4. If you can sell at the price you gave I advise you to do so. 5. These will recover. 6. Quite promising. GAM.—1. No. It is a good estate, but there is no market. 2. Yes. 3. No. GRAFTON.—If you took up the new shares allotted in respect of the old shares sold cum rights but not transferred before the books closed, you will have to give them up to the buyer who now claims them, upon his paying you the amount of the issue price. If, however, you did not apply for the new shares, and the claim was delayed too long for you to get them from the company, you are not responsible. Refuse to have anything to do with the matter, and let the brokers arrange it between themselves. GENS.—1. I do not think you will see much of a profit before special settlement. 2. The price of these should improve during the next few months, but you bought at a high figure, and must not expect any great advance. 3. Average your Jequies. GLENCOTE.—Take a small profit when you can. I would not hold these shares. G. M. M.—See Notes.

HARASSED.—See Notes. HUNTS.—Not an investment, only a speculation, and not attractive at that. HUGO.—This question should have been addressed to the secretary. HIGHLANDER.—1. Not a company that I care to recommend. 2. I am told that this estate is not favourably situated, and that it will be well to sell the shares during the next twelve months. 3. Harpenden paid 3s. dividend in April, and 1s. last October. HOPE DEFERRED.—See reply to "Grinder." The questions as to meeting and dividend should should be addressed to the secretary. HILLSIDE.—1. Probably next year. 2. You ought eventually to get 20s. 3. You had better regard this as an investment.

IMPERIAL.—My "candid opinion" is that you have a very poor lot of shares which you should get rid of when you can. ISAAC.—Hold your shares. They will ultimately turn out to be an excellent investment. IMBER.—1. No special reason for the decline. Write to the secretary as regards dividend. 2. There should be an upward movement in these shortly. Do not sell at all events under 10s. premium. 3. 200. INQUISITIVE.—1. Cannot advise. 2. Yes. 3. These ought to show you a good profit. 4. Watch my Rubber Notes. "100."—I have always held an unfavourable opinion of the concern. You had better await developments without taking an active part.

JOE.—One of the cheapest investments in the market. See my Rubber Notes last week. J. M. P. (Kilkenny).—1. Sell at any profit. 2-3. Hold for a revival. 4. Sell if you ever see your price again, as, although this is not a bad company, you bought too high. 5. Do not sell under 10s. 6. Retain for a good profit. Going better in the near future. J. M. (Kerry).—All the companies mentioned are speculative investments of much promise. Take the new shares. JANG.—A and B. You had better regard these as speculations and take a fair profit when you can. C. This is, of course, in a different category; but you ought to have sold half and secured such an excellent profit. Do this when the quotation advances say 10s. on the present price. J. W. M.—1. Limit mentioned should be reached within two years. Write to the secretary with regard to dividend. 2. 15s. JETTISONED.—1. Price has improved, and is said to be going better. 2. See reply to "Grinder." 3. You had better write to the secretary. JABO.—The shares were never offered to the public, and a market has never existed for them. The only course to adopt is to seek advice from your friends who put you in. J. J. (Malvern).—I am not certain whether I have made out your initials correctly. In future please employ a simple pseudonym or write your name legibly. You have one of the best lists that I have yet examined, consisting of big producers, companies which are reaching the producing stage, and others of a more speculative type which should show considerable capital appreciation during the next year. I suggest that you keep them all until the end of the year and then write again.

KWANTUNG.—1. I regret that I cannot be of service to you. I have repeatedly said that I do not advise any one who buys rubber shares and cannot pay for them. Owing to inevitable fluctuations it is practically impossible to make profits by dealing with borrowed money. 2. See Notes. 3-4. Write to the secretaries. KILLINEY.—1. No. 2. A fair proposition. You will probably see your money back. KEYS.—1-2. Neither has paid a dividend yet. Write to the secretaries for probable dates.

LEICESTERSHIRE.—Hold for dividends, which should be commenced this year. LONDONDERRY.—You had better hold all the shares for the present. Keep 1 for a profit, but sell the others when you can without loss and put the proceeds in some of the shares recommended from time to time in my Notes. LOTT.—Be content with a small profit. LIFFEY.—1. Yes. 2. Yes. Average. 3. Madagascar Ordinary should show a substantial improvement by the end of the year, when there will be 10 machines in full work on the property. 4. A yearly one. 5. I should average.

MCANDREW.—1. I do not advise you to make the exchange. 2, No. 3. Sell if you can. MYFANWY.—You have a very good list. Of the twelve shares the only doubtful ones are 3, 4, 10, and 11. If at any time you can exchange these without loss it will be well to do so. MACO.—Sell when you see a small profit. M. T. F. (Naas).—If you look in the issue of the 29th ult. you will find the answer to your queries under "Mariner," which is the nearest I could get for what you wrote as a pseudonym. M. P.—See Notes. MAX.—1-3. These should all appreciate during the coming year. For the further purchase you think of making I should select from your list 4, 6, 8, and 9. MEDICO.—It will be more satisfactory for you to address these inquiries to the secretaries. MUCKROSS.—1. I do not recommend a purchase of these. They are 2s. shares. No dividend paid yet. 2. A promising rubber investment at present price. £1 shares. Paid 15 per cent. last year. MRS. GRUNDY.—1. I should take the profit mentioned. 2. You must ask the secretary. 3. No cause for anxiety at present. MOROCCO.—1. Not recommended. 2. Yes. Read Rubber Notes last week and the week before that. MISERE.—Do not sell. Hold for recovery. MERIONEN.—No market yet. Not at all promising. MOSSBANK.—See Rule 2; your other inquiries will be answered under the heading of "Oil."

NIBLICK.—Yes, you may average now. NEFER.—1 and 2. In excellent hands and probably worth holding for dividends. The vendors, however, took all the purchase price in cash. 3. I do not care to suggest a selling limit. 4. I do not desire to express an opinion with regard to a contemporary. NIGHT.—See reply to "Grinder." NEW READER.—You should see a profit on all the shares in your list during the next twelve months. NETEE.—1. See reply to "Grinder." 2. Take a profit, but not yet. Wait for improved markets, when your profit will probably be a little better. 3. Sell when you can do so without loss.

PORK CHOP.—1-5. All the shares named are good to hold for investment, but I would sell 1 at a small profit on the purchase price. 6. I do not care to recommend this. PETER BARLEY.—Do not be worried, but watch the outputs as from the end of this month. POMPADOUR.—1. Hold both shares for recovery. You should eventually see a good profit. PALGRAVE.—Do not sell until you can get out without loss. PANURGE.—Hold both until the end of the year, then write again. PILGRIM.—1. A good company. Hold for a substantial profit. 2. Not one of my favourites, but said to be going better. More speculative at the price than 1. PUZZLED.—See my Rubber Notes. PURLEY.—I do not endorse the recommendation of your friend. PROF.—Supposed to be a wild cat. Should the market be made sell at any price. POUMANU.—1 and 2. The company certainly seems a good investment at present price. I am obliged to you for advising me regarding Shanghai opinion, and shall always be glad to hear from you. PAX.—1. It depends upon the price you gave. I should fix the limit higher. 2. Not for a year or so. 3. I should average on any decline below the present price.

QUANTOCK.—See my Rubber Notes.

R. W. P. J.—I do not care to fix selling limits for the shares you name. 1, 4, and 5 are good concerns and should become profitable, but 2, 3, and 6 are doubtful propositions. RENROH.—More chance of a rise in 1 than in 2. ROMULUS.—1. The price should be higher six months hence, as the output will have increased materially. 2. Hold for 20. 3. 12s. 6d. R. F. L. L.—1. Easily over 5. 2. I cannot advise you in respect of carry-over transactions. 3. No special reason. R. S. B.—With regard to Crudes, see my Notes. The other two shares are good to buy at present prices, but you must write to the secretary regarding date of the next dividend. REX.—I have never recommended these, but I would not sell at a loss. 2. Hold these for a profit. 3. I regret that I cannot trace this company. ROB ROY.—Limits may be reached during the next twelve months. You may average your Madagascars or buy more Beverleys. ROMEO.—1. See reply to "Grinder." 2. See Notes. 3. Hold for recovery in the near future. RODDY.—1. Yes. See Notes. 2. Cut your loss when markets revive. REGENT.—1. See Notes. 2. 10s. premium. 3. A fairly good estate, but rather a long-waiting proposition. 4. About 30s. 5. This should prove a good investment. 6. Do not think this is likely to prove profitable. RESI.—1. No. See Notes. 2-3. Hold them all. ROSE.—I should keep these. The company is said to have made some judicious investments during the slump, and should be able to pay a good dividend.

S. G.—1. Average on any further decline. 2. Take the new shares. SUBSCRIBER.—I regret that I cannot endorse their opinion or otherwise, as I cannot decipher the name of the company as written. The other shares are safe to hold for a good profit. SURGEON.—1-2. May eventually go to the price named, but at present it seems just a little sanguine. 3. Doubtless this is a good estate, and I am glad to hear on such good authority that an excellent report is expected. SLAINTE.—1. Cheap, but does not promise to be quite so attractive in the near future as 2 and 3. Both of these should stand very much higher at the end of the year. when their profit-earning capacities will be seen. With regard to your second letter, I have not time to make the calculation before going to press, but will endeavour to give you the answer next week. SOMERSET.—1. A wild cat. 2. Hold the Merlimaus for a profit. Sell the others when your price is again reached. SIMLAH.—1. Yes. A good rubber investment. 2. These should also turn out well, but are more speculative than 1. SIDMOUTH (Monaghan).—1. The address is 107, Fenchurch Street, London, E.C. 2. You could do better at present prices. 3. Not now. Probably next year you will have a much better opportunity. SECCA.—Hold until the end of the year. Dividend just declared. SELINA.—I think this price will eventually be reached. SAVINGS.—1. See Rubber Notes. 2. Yes. You had better average if the price declines still further. 3. See third reply to "Diamonds." SOLATIUM.—1-2. I do not care to fix selling limits for these just now, but both shares will probably show an improvement by the time named. 3. See Rule 2. SAPONGS.—Thanks for your most interesting letter. Always glad to hear from out-of-the-way places. The Sapong estates are developing well, and the property will become one of the best in Borneo. The price should advance as soon as the results of the first tapping are made known, and ultimately reach £5. It is expected that next year Borneo companies will come more into favour; at present sentiment is somewhat against them. SEALDAH.—You have a good list, the only doubtful share being 2. I should, however, keep that also until the market becomes more active. SWING STOPPER.—1. Hold them all for higher prices. 2. Of course the two classes of companies cannot be compared, as they are so widely different in every way. If what you think is true, and you are looking for appreciation of capital, you might make the exchange you suggest. 3. No. I would not sell at present price. STANWELL.—See Notes. SAP.—1. Probably next year. 2. Three to four years. 3. After 7½ per cent. has been paid on both they rank pari passu. 4-7. See Rule 2. SHIKARI.—I should apply. STONEROW.—See Notes. SUSTAIN.—1. You may possibly see a small profit towards the end of the year, but as you gave a high price do not hold too long. 2. Take these up and hold for a profit.

THISTLE.—You hold three unsatisfactory shares. When you see a favourable opportunity sell, and buy some of the shares mentioned in my table last week. TAMBO.—Am glad to hear such a good report. Take up the shares, even if you have to cut a loss on the others. TADPOLE.—Information regarding shipments of rubber should be forthcoming shortly, and it is expected that the price will then improve. THADDEUS.—1. See reply to "Grinder." 2. Not in my opinion. 3. Yes. Said to have done well out of the slump. TORTOISE.—1. Wait for a small advance on your price. 2. I cannot recommend these. You had better hold for recovery and then sell. 3. See reply to "Grinder." TIN HAT.—1. I should not advise you to buy these even at the present discount. 2. Yes. 3. Cannot endorse the recommendation. TYRO.—1. Considered very good. 2. With a market revival. 3. I do not expect a great rise, but I should certainly wait a few months as you suggest. TOWERS.—I quite expect that the price will rise to the figure you name before the end of the year. TIMID.—1. Yes, average. 2. These should turn out well; do not be nervous. T. C.—You certainly have ground to ask for the return of your money, but it is hopeless to expect that you will get it unless you are prepared to fight an expensive law suit. You are, of course, liable for the further calls. THE QUARTER.—If it was a single allotment the secretary is right. You should have applied separately.

UNIQUE.—1. May go to 2s. premium eventually. 2. You must not assume that you will get a full allotment unless you underwrote on the distinct understanding that you took the shares "firm." Perhaps you will not get any. 3. This was quite nominal. 4. It would have been a most unwise procedure to have overdrawn your account in the way mentioned. UNISON.—Your list is a very poor one. I do not regard any of these shares as good, either from the investment or speculative point of view. You will do well to exchange into some of the good producers as soon as more active markets give you an opportunity of selling. UNDISMAYED.—See reply to "Tadpole."

VERY DOUBTFUL.—1. See Notes. 2. Yes, hold. VICTORIA.—The promoters took too much out of this concern, and I advise you to exchange into another share when you can. The prospects are much less promising for this company than for the others you name. VIOLET.—I should not buy them.

WINKUM.—1. If you write to the secretary he will probably send you a copy. 2. Before that can happen your capital will have been returned to you several times over, if the company's expectations are realised. 3. This view is not held by experts. WEATHERBEATEN.—You need not be unduly anxious about the shares you hold. 1. See Notes. 2. A recovery is expected during the next few months. 3. These shares will one day reach a higher price than your limit, according to the opinion of those who are familiar with the estate and its situation. In the meantime you enjoy your guaranteed dividend. WINKLE.—From the point of view of capital appreciation I should arrange the companies in the following order:—2, 3, and 1. W. W.—Best left alone. WEARY HOPE.—1. See Notes. 2-4. These are cheap shares which should prove very profitable investments. If you must sell something you had better select from 2, 3, or 4 that which shows the least loss. W. F. T.—1. See Notes. 2. Hold. WAIN.—1. Sell at 4s. profit. 2. Yes, good to buy now. WYE.—1. Your letter was written before you could have seen my Notes of last week. Any of the shares mentioned in the tables should suit your purpose. 2. You might sell this on a good profit being obtainable, or wait for dividends. 3. Hold for dividends. 4. Have not seen this yet. 5. I should take a profit when available. 6. Hold for recovery. WORRIED.—Do not get worried or impatient. You will find that you hold a profitable share. WOOLLY.—1. You have a good list, and should be able to raise the amount you will require next month without making a loss. You ask whether you will be able to do so "without losing a profit." Your profit will not be such a good one as it would if you could wait a few months longer. 2 and 3. Keep all the shares as long as you can, and do not exchange them. 4. Your assumption is correct.

XAB.—In two years' time Merlimaus will be the second largest producer in the Federated Malay States.

YEOMAN.—1-3. Tapping has commenced, and the price should now steadily improve, but I cannot predict that the price you name will be reached by October. YOKEL.—1. Hold for a few months, then write again. 2. You might put the small amount into Beverleys. YENDAHCEA.—This is a fair proposition, but is said not to be in the right district. You do not say what they cost you. I should not hold them permanently, but there is no necessity to throw them away.

ZOX.—1. Likely to be a good speculative investment. 2. A few shillings over the price you gave. 3. Worth holding for the guaranteed dividend and a good profit ultimately. ZERO.—1. You may safely retain your Jequies, and may buy Linggis, Kamuning "B," or P.P.K., as you suggest. ZEBRA.—You should see a profit on each of your shares during the next twelve months.

MISCELLANEOUS.

AUSTRALIA.—I have no reason to doubt that the burden is severe, but default is an extremely remote prospect, and I do not advise a sale. A. G.—I advise you not to deal with Mandevilles, Limited, or any firm of outside brokers; do your business through a member of the Stock Exchange. ASHFELT.—1. A bucket-shop which should be shunned. 2. Has often been adversely criticised on account of the disadvantageous conditions imposed on certificate holders. 3. No information. Perhaps the National Freehold Land and Building Society, 25, Moorgate Street, E.C., would suit your purpose. A. B.—Several warnings against Duncan, Forbes and Co. have appeared in TRUTH.

BACHELOR.—A sound industrial. I do not advise the suggested exchange. B. B. H.—Let the circularisers keep the shares.

CARDIGAN, Leeds.—The shares have speculative possibilities in view of the good trade outlook. But big dividends unlikely, as company in weak position, and it must do much towards building up reserves before it can deal liberally with the shareholders. CANTAB.—Sorry, but it is not a concern with which I am familiar. C. W. P.—It is a prosperous company, but the shares now look fairly valued. I should prefer one of the stocks listed under "Mixed Securities." C. D. G.—The United Stock and Share Corporation is a flat-trap of the same kind as the London Scottish Stock Exchange.

DON.—No.

ENQUIRER.—1. I am not sufficiently in the confidence of the board to say. 2 and 3. In view of the good results shown lately by kindred concerns, it would be as well to keep the shares for the report.

GLORIANA.—I do not advise dealings with them or any outside brokers. Do your business through a member of the Stock Exchange.

IN DOUBT.—By all means accept the offer.

IREX.—The company was formed in 1902, and has so far had a successful career. It carries on the business of an ordinary trust company, and takes on the duties of trustee in the same way as a private trustee.

J. J. (Liverpool).—Neither of them concerns which I recommend. You cannot get absolute safety with such high interest.

LISMORE.—They are of a speculative character and hardly suitable for a small capitalist.

MAUD.—1. The opinions quoted had no reference to the company promoting and share dealing business now carried on. 2. I cannot express an opinion until I have seen the prospectus. MOTT.—You should sell if you can, but I am afraid that in each case you will have great difficulty in finding a purchaser. 1 and 2 are quite hopeless concerns. MONKEY.—I certainly do not advise dealings with these circularisers.

NOVICE.—1 and 2. See list of 4 to 5 per cent. investments under "Mixed Securities." 3. Your request is having my attention.

POUMANCE.—Results so far have certainly been poor. As regards the outlook, you ought to be in a position to obtain a reliable opinion from local sources. If you decide to exchange into rubber you will find suitable recommendations given in my Notes. PARISHIONERS.—I cannot recommend the proposed investment. The bank in question cannot be classed with the average joint stock bank. If it be necessary to obtain 5 per cent., I would suggest putting the money into the new 5 per cent. debenture stock of the Anglo-Argentine Tramways Company.

R. Y. M.—R. A. Smith and Co. are notorious bucket-shop keepers who have often been exposed in TRUTH and in the law courts. 2. I know of no reason to anticipate much improvement.

SEASIDE.—No. 1 was adversely criticised when the public offer of bonds was made. No. 2 at par struck me as decidedly dear. Read articles of June 1 and last week regarding the Investment Registry. SEAVIEW.—I should hold both. SPEC.—I was not aware that registration was necessary.

UNEX.—I do not know any at the moment that seem particularly cheap.

VENEZIA.—1. Sorry, but the title is unfamiliar. Nos. 2 and 3 are of a speculative character, and I should be inclined to sell when a favourable opportunity presented itself. VERITAS.—The Royal Hungarian Lottery may be "genuine," but the ticket touts who call themselves a "bank" are possibly quite otherwise. If you want to buy tickets in Continental lotteries you must take the very considerable risk of being cheated by the agents. VIRGINIA.—Certainly not. A system under which the outside concern makes its profits out of the losses of its customers.

VIGILANT.

INSURANCE.

LIFE ASSURANCE FOR THE WEALTHY.—THREE COMMON MISTAKES.—FIVE PER CENT. COMPOUND INTEREST FROM A SAFE INVESTMENT.

ONE of the most curious delusions of many rich men in this country is that life assurance is of no use to them. They argue that they have sufficient capital to leave their families well off at their deaths, and that consequently a life policy is unnecessary. Unnecessary perhaps it is, but by no means inadvisable. Wealthy business and financial men are commonly great believers in life assurance, not only for others, but also for themselves, and in America most of the rich men are assured for very large sums. The Americans like to have the amounts of their policies published, accompanied by letters stating their reasons for thinking life assurance is good for them. In this country we are more reticent, and though I cannot mention names the fact remains that the shrewdest financial magnates even here very frequently have assurances on their lives for extremely large sums.

It is mainly rich men with limited knowledge of finance and with less ability in the investment of their money to good advantage who dismiss life assurance as a thing which has no attractions for them. I have dealt from time to time with life policies as the only satisfactory method of providing for estate and succession duties, and it is quite apart from provisions of this kind that I now draw attention to the advantages of life assurance for the rich

I may also dismiss briefly another point of much importance, which I have often explained. Depreciation in capital value is a very serious matter for a great many people; so much so that many investors would find, if they looked into their accounts, that securities bought, say, fifteen years ago are now worth so much less than was paid for them that if the whole of the dividends received had been applied to maintaining the capital intact they would have been insufficient for the purpose. A life policy is a security which cannot depreciate in capital value: the dividends, or bonuses, upon it, if it is with-profit assurance, may be more or less than was expected, but the capital value cannot decrease.

Attention has been called recently to a condition of the Finance Act which has escaped general notice. Incomes subject to super-tax are treated in a different way from smaller incomes in the matter of the deduction of the amount paid for life assurance. If a man has an income of more than £5,000 he can deduct premiums not exceeding one-sixth of his income, and if this deduction brings his income below £5,000 he is exempt from the super-tax to which he would otherwise be liable. This particular benefit cannot apply to any incomes except those from £5,001 to £6,000; but everybody who is liable to super-tax can save nearly 1s. 8d. out of every £1 paid for premiums up to, but not exceeding, one-sixth of his income. This means that a man can buy annually £1,000 worth of insurance for £920 16s. 8d., since he saves £79 3s. 4d. in income-tax at 1s. 7d. in the £. To be able to buy a security, which at its nominal value compares well with other investments, at a discount of 1s. 7d. in the £, or nearly 8 per cent., converts a thing that is otherwise good into a transaction that is attractive in the extreme.

Frequently when people are considering the results yielded by life assurance policies they calculate the rate of compound interest at which the total premiums paid would amount to the sum assured at the time an endowment assurance policy, for example, falls due for payment if the assured lives to the end of the term; in doing this two mistakes are made and sometimes three.

To illustrate this I will take the case of a man aged forty, who has an income that is subject to super-tax. I will suppose that he takes, at a premium of £1,086 annually, a ten-year endowment assurance policy, with profits, which secures the payment of the sum assured and bonuses to himself at the end of ten years, or to his estate if he dies previously. If he chooses his policy well it will assure £10,216 at the outset, and will amount to £12,130 at the end of the ten years.

(Par. A.) A man may say that if he invests £1,086 per annum for ten years at £2 per cent. compound interest, he will obtain £12,130 at the end of the ten years, and that such a rate of interest is quite unattractive. I am by no means sure that it is so very unattractive, since, in the first place, he avoids depreciation in capital value, and compound interest even at only £2 per cent. is none too easy to make.

(Par. B.) Now let me correct common mistake No. 1. It is true the man pays £1,086 to the life office, but if his income is subject to tax at 1s. 7d. in the £, he would save £86, and his net outlay would be £1,000 a year. He may recognise this fact, and from a book of interest tables may discovered that £1,000 a year for ten years, accumulated at £3 10s. per cent., would amount to £12,142, or almost exactly the amount the policy would yield. This may seem a good deal better, and he may recognise that in this case the income-tax regulations, and these alone, increase the rate of compound interest he obtains by 1½ per cent. per annum, which is a very considerable gain. If he fails to reflect upon the difficulty of investing his dividends the moment he receives them, so that they yield £3 10s. per cent., he may consider this return distinctly good in view of the security of the investment; but he is likely to regard it as less attractive than it really is, since at least ninety-nine people out of every hundred fail to realise the great cumulative effect of compound interest, and the practical impossibility of an individual obtaining it for himself.

(Par. C.) Now let me correct common error No. 2. If a man derives dividends from investments he has to pay income-tax upon them; the lowest rate of tax is 1s. 2d. in the £, but a rich man has to pay much more, nearly 1s. 8d.; he never has to pay quite so much as 1s. 8d. at present because £3,000 of his income is exempt from the super-tax. An income of £6,000 is subject to tax on the whole of it at exactly 1s. 7d. in the £. On the basis of 1s. 7d. a man must receive dividends at the rate of £2 3s. 6d., subject to a tax at 1s. 7d., if his net return is to be £2; and his dividends subject to tax must be £3 16s. per cent. if the net yield is to be £3 10s. Precisely where a dividend at the rate of £3 16s. is to be obtained with anything like the security that is afforded by a first-class life office I do not know. Remember this is compound interest, and the only trouble or expense in connection with it is sending a cheque to the insurance company once a year at a cost of one penny for the stamp on the cheque and one penny for postage. Other investments involve trouble, stamp duties, and commission.

(Par. D.) Finally, let me deal with common error No. 3. If a man died within twelve months of making his first net annual outlay of £1,000, his estate would receive £10,216, with, under the particular policy I am quoting, a bonus of more than £1,100. There is a clear financial gain to his estate of more than £10,000 on a net outlay of £1,000. The same principle holds good throughout practically the whole duration of the policy, but the amount of the gain diminishes from year to year. The first year the benefit of this insurance protection is worth at least £100, and I am under-estimating the value of this protection by putting it at an average of £60 a year throughout the whole ten years. Now let us look at things. The man pays £1,086 to the life office, but saves £86 in income-tax, so his net outlay is £1,000. He obtains, at a cost of £60 a year, a large amount of insurance protection, which is commercially worth more than this £60 a year, whether he lives or dies; just as fire insurance protection is worth what it costs whether he has a fire or not. A rich man may say that he does not want this life assurance protection, and that his family is well provided for without it. Maybe so, but all the same his family has the protection, which is commercially worth more than the £60 a year I have put it at, and this ought to be taken into account if the real nature of the transaction is to be understood. Thus, then, his net investment is really £940 a year, in return for which he receives £12,130 if he is living at the end of ten years. This is compound interest at the rate of £4 12s. 6d. per cent. free of income-tax, or almost exactly £5 per cent. per annum subject to tax at 1s. 7d. in the £.

(Par. E.) I can imagine some of my readers thinking this is a sort of fairy tale, such as they are told by sundry outside brokers and other romancers against whom I am continually warning them. So let me explain the reasonableness of these superlatively good results. The man pays £1,086 a year to a life office; on the average, £60 a year is used for insurance protection; so, apart from this protection, the company receives £1,026 a year. In return for this it gives the policy-holder £12,130 at the end of the ten years, which is equivalent to the return of all the money he has paid, accumulated at 3 per cent. compound interest, free of income-tax. This is a good rate, considering that the company has to pay expenses of management, but is by no means an impossible yield. The return is increased to a rate of £4 12s. 6d. net, or of £5 subject to tax by the income-tax regulations, the significant fact about which is that the higher the rate of income-tax which a man has to pay, the more favourably life assurance compares, as an investment, with securities of other kinds.

Let me summarise this article in tabular form, together with the comments upon it that might be expected from the wealthy man whose steps I am endeavouring to guide into the paths of safety and profit:—

| Paragraph. | Mistakes. | Rate % £ s. d. | Comments. |
|---|---|---|---|
| A | 3 | 2 0 0 | "No good." |
| B | 2 | 3 10 0 | "Pretty good." |
| C | 1 | 3 16 0 | "Very good." |
| D | 0 | 5 0 0 | "Can't be done." |
| E | 0 | 5 0 0 | "Can be done." |

Final conclusion: "Must be done."

COMPANY MEETINGS.

BRITISH EMPIRE TRUST.

Canada's Prosperity.—The Company's Investments.

Mr. Horne-Payne presided at the annual meeting of the British Empire Trust Company, Limited, held on the 11th inst. at Liverpool Street Hotel, E.C., and in the course of his speech said:—Your company has prospered during the year, and the work which we set out to do is being carried on with financial success, and what is still more satisfactory, I think we may claim that we are doing valuable work for the Empire. Our efforts in the past have been, and still mainly are, connected with the development of the Dominion of Canada, and year by year it has been my custom to tell you of the resources of that country. During the past year the knowledge of Canada has become so general and its illimitable wealth is so generally recognised and the Press of the United Kingdom has devoted so much space to it that it would be superfluous for me to say more on the subject. The work of this company is to seek out and put forward in convenient form, with all possible safeguards, investments in the colonial dominions of various classes, offering smaller or greater profits with smaller or greater risks. The securities with which we are at present associated give a yield varying from 3 to 6 per cent., and offer other advantages, and I do not think that there is the least danger of money being lost in any one of them. It may take a longer or it may take a shorter period for our companies to attain their full success, but so far they are one and all progressing rapidly, and we have every reason to be proud of their record. I think perhaps the last three issues with which we have been associated attract me personally as much as any that I have ever previously been interested in, each in its different way. The Duluth Winnipeg and Pacific Railway Debentures, yielding 4½ per cent., are as well secured as any railway investment in the world. The line runs through the celebrated iron range country, which yields a more profitable tonnage per mile to its railways than, I believe, any other country in the world, and it will also afford, by a long way, the shortest route between Winnipeg and the western provinces of Canada and Duluth, Chicago and the other great cities of the American Middle West. There is no question whatever as to the safety of this Duluth Winnipeg and Pacific Debenture stock, which stands entirely above suspicion as a genuine gilt-edged investment. The Five per Cent. Debenture stock of the Canadian Western Lumber Company stands in another category. We framed this security with the deliberate intention of affording English investors an opportunity of participating in some of the larger profits to be made out of the natural resources of Canada without taking the full risks inherent to Ordinary shares. The investor was offered £100 of Debenture stock for £88, yielding him 5½ per cent. on his money and repayable at £100 in thirty-five years at the latest; but there is a very large sinking fund, and if the company does as well as I think there is every reason to believe that it will do, the investor will get his £100 in a great deal less than thirty-five years. The investor has a safe 5½ per cent. investment in any event, and, in addition, the better the trading of the company turns out the sooner he will get his 14 per cent. bonus. The stock with which we are most lately associated is the Canadian Northern Five per Cent. Convertible Debenture stock, which I feel is the most attractive investment that I know, or perhaps have ever known, for any persons who are not absolutely dependent for existence on the income derived from their stocks. It may be regarded as a safe investment, being a direct mortgage security, redeemable in twenty years, and consequently no new class of security and no ordinary creditors can be placed ahead of it. It is true that it depends for its income on the earnings of the railway in each separate year, but as the company's available surplus income for the financial year ended with the month of June last will work out at about $1,000,000, the interest is fully covered. Nevertheless, it is possible that Canada may meet with a year of total crop failure or of commercial disorganisation, such as that through which the United States passed in 1907. The fact should be clearly understood and faced that, if such a year does come during the next five years, this stock may lose its interest for the year in whole or in part. This does not seem a likely contingency, but it is possible. Every man that settles in the railway's territory makes it more unlikely, and a very large number indeed are going in every week. The risk of temporary loss of income seems to me a trifling disadvantage compared to the advantage given to the stockholder of being able to convert his stock into the Ordinary shares of the Canadian Northern Railway, if he so desires, after January, 1916. The possibilities of the Canadian Northern Railway are absolutely limitless. Whatever the course of events may be during the next four or five years, one cannot have the slightest hesitation in saying—not the smallest doubt—that in six or seven years the Ordinary shares of the Canadian Northern Railway will be exceedingly valuable. Within five years' time the Canadian Northern will be a trans-continental system, or, rather, a world-wide system, as fully equipped by land and water as the Canadian Pacific is to-day. Canada is a big country, and I prophesy confidently that in two or three years after the completion of the Canadian Northern Trans-continental Line Canadian Northern shares will have gone a long way towards catching up the price of Canadian Pacific shares. In buying Canadian Northern Five per Cent. Convertible stock to-day at 96 I think you are buying something that will be worth a very high figure in six or seven years' time, and meanwhile you hold a safe investment. There are many other good investments in the list attached to the report, and I think about the cheapest of them are Canadian Northern Ontario Four per Cent. Debenture stock, Canadian Mineral Rubber Six per Cent. Debenture stock, Canadian Northern Prairie Lands Company shares and British Columbia Electric Deferred Ordinary, but all the securities of our electric companies are attractive and sound. The chairman went on to refer to the crop outlook in Canada, and said that since July 1 rains had been general and the prospects much improved.

The report was unanimously adopted, and dividends making total dividends for the year of 5 per cent. upon the Preferred Ordinary shares and 7 per cent. on the Deferred Ordinary shares were declared.

PERAK RUBBER PLANTATIONS.

42½ per Cent. Dividend.—Current Year's Estimate of Production.

The fourth annual ordinary general meeting of the Perak Rubber Plantations, Limited, was held on the 7th inst. at Cannon Street Hotel, Cannon Street, E.C., Mr. Keith F. Arbuthnot (chairman of the company) presiding.

The representative of the secretaries (Messrs. Rowe, White and Co., Limited) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman said: The accounts are drawn up in much the same manner as hitherto, and therefore require very little explanation from me. The only item which is new is the commission to the staff in the East. This is a matter which is becoming universal, and one which I am sure you will highly approve of. Our manager (Mr. Swaine) has been in charge since Mr. Gordon Brown left, in October last, and is carrying on the work on the estate in a satisfactory manner. His assistants, Messrs. Mack, Hobson, and McCoull, are also working well, and I am sure it is right that those to whom a great deal of our prosperity is due should benefit to some extent with us in our welfare, and I think it would be a matter of satisfaction to them to know that their efforts were not only appreciated, but would always be encouraged with a share in our prosperity. Our total acreage remains the same as last year; but we have increased our planted area, and now have 931 acres under Para rubber, of which nearly one-third is being tapped, and that produced a crop of 115,895 lbs. dry rubber, or, say, an average yield of 350 lbs. per acre. Our estimate for the past year was 100,000 lbs.; so that I think we may consider the actual outturn as satisfactory, although, had we had a normal year, I believe our crop would have been considerably larger still. As you probably know, our best months are November, December, and January, when the latex generally flows freest, on account of the rains and also owing to the relief given to the trees through the seed having fallen. These three months, however, proved somewhat disappointing, owing to the continued drought, the rainfall during these three months having only been 15 ins., against 33 ins. during the same period last year, and 30 ins. the previous year. Our estimate for the current year is 140,000 lbs. dry rubber, which, I think, is safe, as up to the present we are advised that our crop is 30,202 lbs., against 20,981 lbs. for the corresponding three months of last year, and, should the weather be more propitious during the current year, I hope the estimate will be exceeded. Our tapping has been light, and I am informed that it has been most carefully done, and the bark renewal is excellent. The method has been to divide the tree into four sections, one of which is tapped every day. We are now tapping on opposite sides of the trees simultaneously, on the alternate day system, which gives equally good results, does not harm the trees, and at the same time economises in labour. As I have already said, we are only at present tapping one-third of our total planted area, and yet we are in a position to pay dividends of 42½ per cent., besides carrying forward the large sum of £6,517 and writing off £500 for depreciation of machinery; so that, although eventually we may have to look for lower prices for rubber, our increase in crop, as the rest of our planted area comes into bearing, should amply compensate for any shrinkage in values—a possibility which it is as well to keep before us, although, in my opinion, we are in for a period of high prices, whilst in the immediate future the price of the raw material is much more likely to increase in value rather than to depreciate. At our meeting this time last year I told you that we had been bid 6s. 10d. a pound for our year's output, and I also said that I saw no immediate reason to sell forward. I am still of the same opinion—viz., that the time for forward sales is not yet; but, should your board change its views and deem a forward sale advisable, it might be a sound policy to sell a portion of our crop and to insure a substantial dividend; however, in any case information will at once be given to the shareholders. The price at which our rubber has sold during the past year, viz., 8s. 2d. net, or, say, 8s. 7d. gross, in Mincing Lane constitutes, I believe, a record, or at any rate a record for all companies which have published a balance-sheet up to now. But I verily believe that the present year will create a new record for us, not only in the price realised for our rubber, but also in crop and in the cost of production and naturally also in our dividend. (Applause.) I now beg to propose: "That the directors' report and the audited accounts be approved, and that the same be adopted."

Sir William Erskine Ward, K.C.S.I., M.A., seconded the resolution, and it was carried unanimously, without discussion.

The Chairman then moved: "That a final dividend at the rate of 30 per cent., making, with the interim dividend at the rate of 12½ per cent. paid by the directors in November last, a dividend at the rate of 42½ per cent. for the year, be declared and paid, and that such dividend be distributed as follows, namely: That a dividend of 6s. per share be paid on all the shares of the company which were fully paid up on March 31, 1910, making a dividend of 8s. 6d. per share on the shares which were fully paid up on March 31, 1909, and of 7s. 3d. per share on the other shares, except those on which there were calls in arrear on March 31, 1910, on which latter shares the dividend will be paid rateably on the amount paid up thereon at that date."

Mr. Montagu J. Battye seconded the resolution, and it was carried unanimously.

The Chairman: It is a great pleasure to me to propose the re-election of Sir William Erskine Ward. His long experience in the East and his connection with other rubber companies makes him a most desirable director, and he has been connected with this company since the start and gives up a lot of his valuable time to our business.

Mr. Mathew Lowden seconded the resolution, which was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. E. Stephenson proposed the re-election of the auditors (Messrs. James and Henry Grace).

Mr. Brownrigg seconded the resolution, and it was carried.

An extraordinary general meeting was then held to discuss the question of splitting the shares.

The chairman said: We have had a good many letters from shareholders advocating the splitting of our £1 shares into shares of 2s. each, and it is at their request that this meeting has been called. Of course, as you are aware, many of the best known companies have already taken this step, and I dare say it may tend towards making a freer market in our shares, and may also possibly give the smaller investor an opportunity of interesting himself in a sound undertaking which is producing substantial dividends. In fact, I see no reason why we should not do this if it is you wish that it should be done; but we should like to hear the opinions of other shareholders on the matter. It is for you to decide whether the shares shall be split into 2s. shares or whether they shall remain as they are at present. I propose the following resolution: "That the 85,000 shares of £1 each in the capital of the company be sub-divided into 850,000 shares of 2s. each."

Mr. Lowden seconded the resolution, and it was carried unanimously.

Mr. Stephenson proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman, directors, and staff, which was seconded and carried unanimously.

The Chairman, in acknowledging the compliment, said that he hoped the directors would be able to distribute a still better dividend next year.

WAY-HALIM (SUMATRA) RUBBER AND COFFEE.

The statutory meeting of the Way-Halim (Sumatra) Rubber and Coffee Estates, Limited, was held on Monday at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C., Mr. A. G. Angier presiding.

The Secretary (Mr. James Berry) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman said: The company was incorporated on March 26 last, and received a certificate entitling it to commence business on April 9. The shares which were offered to the public on the issue of the prospectus were all allotted. Turning to the accounts, on the receipts side up to June 30 £82,547 3s. 6d. had been received from subscriptions for shares, leaving a balance of £2,452 16s. 6d. still to come in. Since that date £1,530 10s. has been received, so that there is now only £922 6s. 6d. outstanding. The next item, a loan from bankers, £20,000, is explained by the fact that, in accordance with the purchase agreement, £43,000 had to be deposited with the Deutsche Bank, London, on or before April 10, and as the allotment and call moneys due to the company had not come in by that date, we had to arrange an overdraft of £20,000 from our bankers. This has since been paid off, as is shown on the payments side of the account. On the same side you will observe that £3,000 has been remitted to the estate. No other item calls, I think, for special remark, except the "amount on deposit at bank"—viz., £25,500. On June 27 our solicitors received advice by cable that the estate had been transferred, so that we are now in full possession of the property. Certain remarks having been made respecting the capabilities of the estate—one statement asserting that the Way-Halim Estate was not much better than a swamp, and could produce Rambong only, Mr. A. Stalmann wrote to his co-directors as follows:—"I can but say that that statement confirms the opinion that I formed when staying in London, that there are a great many people posing as authorities on countries in the East which they never saw and who will give 'expert' opinions on estates and countries though they lack every capability for giving such opinions. It is evident that this party never was there, or he does not understand the matter; in any case, what he says is absolutely untrue, because Way-Halim as regards soil and climate, and particularly for coffee and rubber plantations, is acknowledged the best estate in the Lampongs. This is confirmed by everybody who has seen the estates, i.e., Professor von Romburgh, Mr. Bingley, Mr. Meissner, Mr. Maschmeyer, Mr. Graasland, and myself—everyone of whom is acknowledged as being a first-class planter in Sumatra and Java. We lost no time in getting to work. On April 21 a cable was sent to the estate ordering a further 150 Javanese coolies, and giving instructions to prepare coolie lines, also nurseries of Hevea and Robusta, as quickly as possible, and to commence tapping without delay. Under the agreement we took over the crop of coffee stored on the property at 60s. per picul. I am glad to report that about 150 piculs have been sold at a profit of about 8s. per picul. The following cable has just come to hand from Mr. Bahrfeldt:—"Weather very fine for new plantings. Nurseries in a very good state. Crops not so bad as anticipated." That, I may say, refers to coffee. The season was not very good, and a little time ago he anticipated that possibly he would not get as much as he expected originally, but this explains to us that apparently he is doing better than he previously reported. "Rubber: The crop is very heavy. Extra labour engaged; 104 expected to arrive daily. Everything going on well."

Some questions by shareholders having been answered, a vote of thanks to the chairman concluded the proceedings.

BEVERLEY TEA AND RUBBER.

A HOPEFUL OUTLOOK.

The statutory meeting of the Beverley Tea and Rubber Estates, Limited, was held yesterday at 30, Mincing Lane, E.C., Mr. L. T. Boustead presiding.

The Chairman in the course of his remarks said: I have the pleasure to inform you that the titles to the properties have been duly transferred to this company and the purchase price paid. I must qualify the statement, however, by telling you that in the case of Kotapolla an area of some 21 acres, leased from the Government, has yet to be transferred; the transfer, however, is assured, as the lease is all in order and its transfer is merely a question of time and compliance with red tape. Next to the question of title perhaps comes that of the local management. In securing the services of Mr. Elwell we believe our agents have secured those of a thoroughly efficient manager, with considerable experience in both rubber and tea and in the handling of labour in a district where it was none too plentiful. The estates are well supplied with labour now, coast advances are by no means high, and we shall make it our business to see that every possible precaution is taken to keep the labour force satisfied and in good health, and to add to it from time to time, as occasion requires. So I think we may look forward to the development of these properties without any great misgivings on the score of labour. The next question perhaps that occurs to one is that of the purchase price of the properties and their prospective value as likely to be indicated by the probable return on the capital invested. The purchase price and preliminary expenses and underwriting stand the company in, all told, about £32 per cultivated acre, without putting any value at all on the 1,400 acres of reserve land. The purchase is represented by a tea estate of over 400 acres, in full bearing, well equipped with buildings and machinery, and 50,000 rubber trees, now averaging about three and a-half years old and some 10,000 of them now over five years old, and rapidly reaching the tapping stage, the total area cultivated with tea and rubber being 619 acres. It is almost dangerous to prophesy unless you know; but so long as rubber fetches only 2s. 6d. per pound I think we may safely count on a profit from these estates, when in full bearing, of £20 to £30 per acre. Our policy will be to bring these 50,000 rubber trees to a tappable size as soon as we possibly can, cultivate the tea with a view to a yield of 600 lbs. or more per acre, in place of 450 lbs., equip the tea factory with such additional machinery as may be required (we are advised that this amounts to very little), obtain permission from the proprietors of the neighbouring estate to connect our outlet road with theirs, so as to save transport, and utilise Singhalese labour for all extensions. The adoption of these measures should result in rapidly-increasing dividends from 1911 onwards and in our having 1,000 acres under cultivation in place of 629, costing, when all in bearing, not more than £35 per acre. I should mention before we part to-day that against an estimated output of 180,000 lbs. of tea this year we have had cabled advices that the crop from January 1 to June 30 amounted to 103,100 lbs., and that account sales so far received show that the tea has netted 41½ cents, or close on 7d. per pound.

ST. ANTONIO (PARA) RUBBER.

TRANSFER OF THE PROPERTIES COMPLETED.

Sir Thomas Barclay, M.P., presiding at the meeting of the St. Antonio (Para) Rubber Estates, Limited, held at Salisbury House, E.C., on the 11th inst., said the company had been such a short time in existence that there was not very much to tell the shareholders. The issue was very largely oversubscribed, the number of shares applied for amounting to £235,686. The transfer of the properties was completed on May 31, and the purchase consideration had been fully satisfied. They had received a cablegram from Mr. Crewe, the general manager, announcing his arrival on the estates, and that he had taken possession. He added that he found all the buildings and plant in good repair, and that the total of the rubber collected and shipped by the late owners for the last twelve months was 6,000 to 7,000 kilograms, which equalled from six to seven tons. The directors considered the telegram which he had just read from Mr. Crewe a satisfactory one. In the prospectus they calculated upon a net profit of 2s. per lb., but at the present prices the profits worked out at 5s. per lb., rather over than under. If they only turned out as much rubber as they did last year they would have a net profit of £3,500, which was only £300 under the estimate, and, taking into account that they were working with a larger capital, that during the past three years only a part of the estate was leased to somebody who had been working it with insufficient capital and to a small extent, it must be admitted they had a very good prospect before them. The directors certainly had nothing to report that was not entirely satisfactory to the shareholders. There was every reason to believe that the good promise held out in the prospectus would be realised.

The chairman, in reply to a question as to when they might expect to have any rubber sent over, said that the dry season commenced about the month of September, and tapping went on until the rainy season, which commenced at the beginning of February or March. The first shipment might be expected to leave Para about the end of October.

Mr. F. E. Steel said he had heard a rumour that there was some difficulty about the titles.

Mr. Maxwell said that as solicitor to the company he took most careful precautions to instruct a local lawyer to investigate the titles and carry out the transfer. He selected the lawyer on the recommendation of the London and River Plate Bank; in fact, he engaged their lawyer to carry out the work. The purchase price was deposited pending the transfer, and on June 1, 1910, he received from the Bank manager a letter stating that he had received a cablegram from the Para branch advising that the transfer of the property had been completed. Since then he had received a letter from the lawyer in Para confirming the fact that the titles were in order, and the transfer had been completed. They had also had a cable from the manager, who was now on the spot, informing the Board that he had taken over the property.

HEVEA RUBBER TRUST, LIMITED.

THE POLICY OF THE BOARD.

The statutory meeting of the shareholders in the Hevea Rubber Trust, Limited, was held on the 7th inst. at the offices, 139, Cannon Street, London, Mr. J. L. Shand (the chairman) presiding.

The Chairman, in the course of his speech, said: In the report, which has been in your hands for some days, you will notice that the receipts amounted to £33,161 10s. We have had a great many propositions laid before us, and we might have invested the money of the company again and again had we thought it prudent to do so. Many of the propositions put before us, however, were ones that we could not entertain, whilst we have every reason to hope that others will mature to the great advantage of this company. I am not going to tell you at present what these investments are, because I do not think there is anything so prejudicial to a company of this sort, and it is very undesirable that particulars should be laid before you, because other companies are very apt to follow in our footsteps and derive benefits from anything we may be doing in the East. Any undertaking that we may interest ourselves in will be such that we shall gladly receive shares in the concerns that we may underwrite. We shall not underwrite anything that we do not feel is a safe investment for the money of shareholders, and in any other investment that we may engage in you may take it that it will be nothing but what we are prepared to put our own money into. Shareholders may rest assured that, although we have not made much progress, their money is either invested in sound securities or is safe in the bank. We are fortunate in having on the board Mr. Thomas Huxley, a gentleman who is a partner in a leading firm in both Colombo, Ceylon, and Klang, in the Malay Straits. We are, therefore, fortunate in having at our disposal the guidance of a gentleman who has a thorough knowledge of the class of investment that we are likely to undertake.

In reply to a shareholder, the chairman stated that a special settlement in the company's shares had been applied for.

THE NEW ZEALAND OILFIELDS, LIMITED.

The statutory general meeting of this company was held on the 11th inst. at Salisbury House, E.C., Major-General Sir Norman R. Stewart, Bart., C.B. (the chairman), presiding.

The Chairman said the company was incorporated on April 5, receiving its certificate entitling it to commence business on the 14th of that month. A public issue of shares was made, one million shares of 2s. each being offered for subscription. Of that issue 721,092 shares were then applied for, but to date 736,660 had been allotted, all of which were payable wholly in cash. In respect of the shares so allotted the company had received, at the date of making up the account, £63,549. With regard to the titles to the concessions which the company was formed to acquire, their solicitors, Messrs. Pakeman, Son, and Read, were in communication with their agents in New Zealand, and so far as they had gone they were able to report that the titles to almost all of the concessions were in order, and that no trouble was anticipated in connection with the few others not yet definitely reported upon. The directors hoped within a very short time to be in possession of the whole of the properties which the company was formed to acquire. With regard to the important question of the commencement of active operations on the properties, the directors were not inclined to rush matters, believing as they did that careful consideration and calculation in the beginning was the wisest course, and that it was advisable to proceed slowly and carefully. Sources of petroleum were a national asset, and if the British Empire were to occupy the position which it should occupy in the world with regard to an adequate supply of petroleum in the future it would be necessary to bring to the notice of the investing public the many opportunities that would arise for the profitable investment of capital in our dominions over the seas. One of those was New Zealand, and the formation of the New Zealand Oilfields, Limited, was the first really serious attempt that had been made in recent times to solve the problem of the existence of oil upon a commercial basis in that part of the world. (Applause.)

QUEER STORY.

SHEIKH MEJDEL'S DAUGHTERS.

A Tale of the Bedawi.

FIVE girl-children had Almaz borne Mejdel, her husband, and never a son amongst them. It was monstrous—unthinkable! Already had Abd-el-Saba, the Sheikh of another and not too friendly tribe, woven derisive verses about it, teaching his people to sing that Mejdel was "The Father of Women." And Mejdel's hot blood, ever ready to boil, had well-nigh boiled over, and more than once had his lean brown fingers picked hungrily at the khangar in his girdle. He owed Abd-el-Saba several grudges as it was, and but for the deeah, which he could ill have afforded in these days of lean pasturage, he would have plunged the curved blade into the versemaker's merry heart and dragged it forth reeking. But there was yet another reason why he should bide his time. Allah had seen fit to give Almaz another chance of retrieving her name. Patience, then! They who waited would see. Even at this moment she lay in one corner of the tent gripping the wrist of a middle-aged unwieldy woman, who crouched motionless beside her, but uttering no cry; for what is written is written, and it is useless to complain.

Gathered upon his haunches Mejdel sat outside on the warm sand and waited. Though he held his sebiel in one hand he did not smoke—a sure sign that his frame of mind was unusual. Now and again he bared his strong white teeth in a slow fierce grin, as if he were in pain or perplexity—or both; but otherwise, for all the animation he showed, he might have been carved in seasoned wood, or mummified as were the Pharaohs of old.

Two ragged musicians, who had wandered from another part of the encampment, hoping shortly to proclaim upon their unlovely instruments the advent of the much-desired, squatted beside him; but though they exchanged guttural jokes with one another, they did not venture to address Mejdel.

The opalesence of an eastern sunset gave to the scene a curiously dramatic effect. Groups of low tents smaller than Mejdel's own—and somewhat dirtier—spread out fan-like on either side. Full-breasted women crept softly in and out, preparing the evening meal, whilst the men in striped abbas smoked pacifically and lounged about in every conceivable attitude of lazy ease.

Here and there naked children rolled and chuckled, and pelted one another with handfuls of their native desert. Even the untidy camels had ceased to grumble, and stretched out in grotesque abandonment, were devoting their energies to succulent heaps of Nile clover.

But Mejdel saw none of this. He was watching five small figures in the far distance—five small figures which toiled up from the green-fringed Nile waters a mile away, and were like unto so many steps in the matter of height. The largest was but a slip of a girl with a form that only whispered of approaching womanhood, and the smallest had but recently mastered the art of walking and carrying at all. On the head of each rested an earthenware kulla. And as he watched, Mejdel's eyes narrowed perceptibly, and the grin on his face became more sinister—for the five water-bearers represented the five heinous offences of Almaz his wife.

Truly had she come under the power of the evil eye. Some witchcraft was at work, willing her to produce naught but her own sex. Well, well, this should be the test; if she gave him a sixth daughter he would know that her case was hopeless. Five times had he forgiven her because of her wondrous beauty and the graceful trick she had of pleading with him, but Abd-el-Saba might taunt him till the tongue in his mouth rotted away if he let his heart grow soft for the sixth time. She had been of an alien tribe, but he had greatly desired her, and against the advice of his elders had taken her for his own, and contrary to the usages of his people had never since cast eyes upon any other woman.

And he worshipped her still—yes, despite the five little figures that loomed more distinct each second, he worshipped her still. But after all, what is love to the derisive sneers of an Abd-el-Saba, or the pity (which is worse) of one's own people? Love is for the softer moments only—pride endures with life. Yes, if she repeated her offence, some steps must be taken. He put his hand into a recess of his garments and brought out a small packet wrapped in a piece of linen. He opened it—inside was a fine powder resembling white dust. He gazed at it earnestly for a moment, and then restored it to its place. Allah be merciful! Almaz must not transgress again—but—if—she did——

The passion died from his face, and with his chin sunk upon his breast he resumed once more his attitude of sphinx-like immovability. . . . . Quite suddenly from within the largest tent came a shrill peculiar cry, half wail, half twitter, and the elderly woman waddled out and made towards him. Still twittering she stooped twice, and scratching up a few grains of sand placed them on the wide parting of her grizzled hair.

It was enough; the musicians slunk away as though the powers of evil had surprised them.

"Speak!" commanded Mejdel, grimly, but without even glancing in her direction.

"Alas! my lord!"

She crouched at his feet, and bending down raised the hem of his abba to her lips.

"Is it a girl-child?" Mejdel looked sideways at her, hissing the words from between his clenched teeth.

"May my Lord have pity!"

Mejdel answered not—only his narrowed eyes became mere slits as he rose and, brushing her aside, passed swiftly between the tents. No one addressed him—there was nothing to be said, and, besides, his face did not invite conversation. At length he reached the fringe of a palm grove, to one of the trees of which his favourite stallion—a full-blooded chestnut—was tethered. Casting himself upon its back he urged it into a gallop. It was saddleless, and save for its rough halter, bridleless too; but its wild unhampered freedom matched his mood, and he let it carry him away from the palm trees—away from everything—out upon the vast sea of sand, whither it would.

How long he fled through space he could not have told—it might have been two hours, it might have been ten—but at length, whether by his own unconscious will or by the will of his panting steed, he found that they had completed a half-circle, and were back in sight of the tents once more. The moon had risen, and stars like unto studs of living sapphire in a setting of dull blue velvet blinked down at him. He dismounted swiftly, and his hand travelled again to that inner recess of his dress—the packet was still there. All would be sleeping, he knew, and by the bed of Almaz would stand her kulla. At such times a woman's mouth parches easily, and she would doubtless stretch a languid hand for it at intervals through the breathless night—well, she should drink to-night—so deeply that the powers of evil would for once be baffled.

All at once the tum-tum of the zummara, mingled with the rasping of a darabukeh smote faintly on his ears. A look of fiendish rage darkened his face. It was not seemly that his people should rejoice on the night of their chief's humiliation. He threaded his way with a gliding feline movement between the silent tents until he came to his own. Here he paused, and the breath of his nostrils hissed to and fro in the extremity of his amazement.

They were the identical musicians who had hovered around earlier in the evening. Were they simply bent on insult? Was Mejdel, son of Mejdel the Well-Beloved, sunk so low as to become a mere butt for the vulgar jesting of the sons of his own race? He knew not how to act; pain, anger, and surprise had robbed him of worthy speech. Then, as he hesitated, from out the tent there stole towards him again the fat, squat figure of the woman who had kept her vigil by the side of Almaz. This time she did not grovel, nor did she sprinkle her pitiful locks with sand. "May the days of my lord be as white as milk!" she cried.

"May thy days be white also!" answered the sheikh mechanically; then he made an impatient gesture towards the musicians who were capering and grimacing with every possible sign of excitement. "What means this?" he demanded, hurriedly.

"If it pleases my lord to listen?"

"And it seems good to thee to tell?" He gabbled the formality and fixed his proud black eyes upon her almost entreatingly.

"Allah has indeed shown mercy—so are the spirits of evil driven for ever from the dwelling of my lord."

"Ah! He hath taken the girl child?" Mejdel spoke with a vindictive snarl. What greater mercy could Allah show?

"Surely he hath done a more gracious thing—He hath sent thee a man child also, so that the line of my lord may be never cut off from among his people. Thou hadst but gone one short hour, when——"

So absolutely unexpected was the news—such a complete and utter revolution—that Mejdel, strong savage as he was, would have fallen, had not he clutched at the tent pole for support.

With a muttered exclamation, and wholly disregarding the cringing demands for baksheesh set up by the minstrels, he stooped to enter the tent.

His fierce face was illuminated—his thin lips trembled—scarcely did he dare to believe even yet that the woman spoke truly. Almaz lay back on her pile of cushions, covered with a rug of camel hair.

Even in the dim light there was something triumphant in the outline of her oval face and small recumbent figure.

"Hail, my lord!" she whispered, faintly; and, drawing back the rug, she showed him two tiny yellow forms nestled together at her side.

Taking his hand in hers she laid it as in benediction upon the head of one infant—the darker and bigger head of the two

Then all the former passion for her surged back into Mejdel's heart; the pride of race, the realisation of his fondest hopes, gave back to his deep voice something of the young lover again.

"Diamond is thy name," he whispered, fondly, "and a diamond art thou indeed—the brightest ornament in thy husband's crown—for thou hast taken away his reproach; against the spells of iniquity hast thou fought and prevailed;" and his shaking fingers strayed proudly over the face of his son.

Almaz sank back and lay regarding them both with her shining, sunken eyes.

"Hast thou pardoned me, O my lord?" she asked, and her voice was eager, though fainter now than before.

"Pardoned thee? Almaz, my Flower of the Desert!"

He laid his hand upon her hand, and found to his sudden discomfort that it had grown icy cold. Fearful of he scarce knew what, he threw himself down at her side, and wound his arms about her. Of a surety, Allah would not stoop to mock him now in the very hour of his triumph. And then, as if in answer to his unspoken thought, with a sudden plop the little linen packet—he had forgotten its very existence—became dislodged from his garments, and fell to the ground. But Almaz did not notice it—she was beyond noticing anything ever again. Outside a camel moaned and a dog barked harshly, and over the encampment a dark, uncouth form flapped its wings in ever-lessening circles.

The elder woman crept back, and realising that which excitement had kept her from realising before, she fell to beating her breast and to mingling her twittering wails with the feeble cries of the newly born. But Almaz was content. She seemed even to smile. She had satisfied her lord and made him atonement. And, after all, life and death are but as Allah wills!

BOOKS.

I CAN imagine no greater contrast than that between the subjects of two biographies I have just laid down, Mr. Snead-Cox's "Life of Cardinal Vaughan" (1) and Mr. Lewis Melville's "Life and Letters of William Beckford" (2). The author of "Vathek" reveals himself in these letters as a kind of rococo Byron, a supreme egotist, a consummate poseur, who was so far from consuming his own smoke that he puffs it into the faces of all his correspondents. Murky smoke, too, for Beckford posed always as a bird of the night, solitary, melancholy, and mysterious. Nothing, perhaps, was more characteristic of this consummate poseur than his boast to Cyrus Redding that he had written "Vathek" at one sitting in three days and two nights, during which he never undressed; whereas his recovered correspondence with the Rev. Samuel Henley shows that its composition cost him over a year's hard work. Mr. Melville rightly dismisses as incredible Dr. Garnett's suggestion that, as Beckford in this conversation with Cyrus Redding was speaking fifty years after the appearance of "Vathek," his memory must have misled him; but Mr. Melville's own explanation, "that Beckford was speaking not of 'Vathek,' but of one of the episodes of 'Vathek,'" seems to me no less improbable. "It is not in keeping with Beckford's character," urges Mr. Melville, "that he should here be posing for effect;" whereas his correspondence (to say nothing of his pretentious Fonthill "Follies," his Tower of Babel and Great Wall of China) reveals a poseur of the first water. As the root of nearly all vulgarity is affectation, you would expect to find, and you do find, a vulgar strain breaking out more flagrantly still in this posing, purse-proud millionaire. You find it in many of his brow-beating letters to his collectors of books, pictures, and curios, and you find it also and above all in this letter from Paris to Thomas Wildman:—

> Happy, aye, thrice happy are those who in this good Capital and at this period have plenty of money—their Kingdom is come, their will is done on earth, if not in heaven. . . . . The finest dinner which ever Flanders or Saxony produced is scarcely thought worthy to garnish my side-boards, or be spread under my boots when I return in all the majesty of mud from dashing in the most invincible manner through the sloughs of the Bois-de-Boulogne, attended by half-a-dozen Captains and Lieutenants of the Garde Nationale. Don't suppose I wait one instant for my carriage at the Opera (where, by the bye, I have taken possession of the Prince de Condé's Box)—not a bit—down drives my coach upon the slightest signal to the admiration and desolation of penniless Dukes, Counts and half-pay Ambassadors.

This snobbery was after all to be expected from a young fellow who had never had knocked out of him at school or college the conceit engendered by the continual consciousness of being the richest commoner in England. What is surprising is the precocious command of a grandiose style precisely suited to the expression of his Werther-like egotism. That a lad of seventeen should have had the command of such a style is one of the curiosities of literature.

What a contrast to this spoiled child of fortune, who, like all spoiled children, was discontented in proportion to his acquisitions, was Cardinal Vaughan! His ideal was the renunciation and the mortification of self. What he laid down for his priests—that they should be satisfied with such salaries as would keep them alive—£50, £40, even £25 a year—he observed, as far as his station would allow him, for himself, while he flagellated himself twice weekly, and wore on his left arm an iron bracelet with spikes on the inside which were pressed into his flesh. Whether this "whipped the offending Adam out of him," of pride, intolerance, and lack of Christian charity towards opponents is another question. The Cardinal was fiercely intolerant, not of Anglicans and Nonconformists only, but also of every shade of belief (and there are many) within his own Church outside that of the straitest Ultramontanism. To a mere Protestant it seems strange that the Cardinal should have such a horror of the doctrines of Modernism and of the evolution of faith, when his own special devotion to the Holy Virgin and St. Joseph were, when they crept first into the Church, Modernist and evolutionary. The first preachers of Christianity never once mention the Holy Virgin, neither Peter nor Paul, nor James, nor even John, to whose filial care she was committed from the cross. Hence her worship and that of St. Joseph must have been Modernist whenever they were first introduced into the Church. For that matter Papal Infallibility was evolutionary, yet the Cardinal's offensive defence of it against Newman and all the most liberal and moderate Catholics of that day seems even to his worshipping biographer to have been as impolitic as it was intolerant. The truth is, as his biographer admits, the Cardinal lacked "the gift of putting himself in an opponent's place," lacked, in a word, imagination. It would, however, be indeed a bigoted Protestant who could fail to find interest and even edification in a life of such resolute courage and utter self-sacrifice, written not merely with exemplary good taste and admirable literary skill, but also with a candour in speaking of the Cardinal and a fairness in dealing with his opponents rare in biographies of Church champions.

It is not Church champions alone who are contentious, dogmatic, and, to the lay mind, distracting, but also, as Dr. Archdall Reid's extraordinarily acute and profound treatise "The Laws of Heredity" (3) will convince you, the champions of different schools of scientific thought. "The question of questions," answers the owl to the cat in Froude's parable, "is whether the egg came from the owl or the owl from the egg originally." "But," replied the cat, after a pause of bewildered thought, "that can never be ascertained." "Of course not," rejoined the owl, "and that's the beauty of it. It can be debated for ever." The effect on the lay mind of reading Dr. Reid's demolition of all preceding theories is only to suggest that his own will be demolished in its turn. "Solum certum nihil esse certi; et homine nihil miserius aut superbius." But however bewildering these conflicting theories, at least the facts brought forward in their support are extremely interesting and suggestive, and the latter half especially of Dr. Reid's learned treatise is in this respect of extraordinary interest and suggestiveness.

Three novels I have just been reading, Mr. Vincent Brown's "The Glory and the Abyss" (4), Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer's "The Portrait" (5), and Mr. Duncan Schwann's "The Book of a Bachelor" (6), transport you to worlds wide apart as the poles from each other. I lay the emphasis on "transport," because Mr. Vincent Brown is convincing only—but is then absolutely convincing—when he deals with peasant life. When he attempts to introduce you into the kind of world where Mr. Duncan Schwann is at home, he fails. His melodramatic seducer, Herbert Magnus, is stiff and stagey, and so, to say the truth, are Professor Biddulph, his brother, the vicar, and his daughter, the Parish Providence, Mrs. Haviland. But the Bonoor family, Peter and Charlie and Bob, Gladys and Elsie and their mother, are absolutely convincing peasants of the Southern Downs. Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer is as much at home with his eighteenth-century fine gentleman as Mr. Vincent Brown with his nineteenth-century peasants. It was a betting age, and "The Portrait" makes its modest start from a sort of auction of bets that one of four members of the Dilettante Club would find and marry the original of the girl who sat for "Celia in her Arbour." No one since Besant has caught, as Mr. Madox Hueffer has caught, the spirit of this roistering century, or has so succeeded in infecting you therewith from the first page to the last of a novel. "The Book of a Bachelor" is on a much lower plane, to be sure, but the author has certainly caught the light, cynical, misogynist tone of his rather worthless characters to perfection.

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

THE LARGEST ANNUITIES are paid by the SUN LIFE OF CANADA, 93, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C. Special consideration where the health is impaired.

An article of exceptional interest on the life and character of the late King Edward will appear in the forthcoming number of the Quarterly Review. By permission of the present King, the writer has had access to the private papers preserved at Windsor Castle, so that he is enabled to quote freely from documents of great interest which have not previously been printed.

Many are the gardens in which a wealth of bloom serves but to accentuate faults of arrangement. In a practical manual on the art of "Garden Planning" (Unwin, 10s. net) Mr. W. S. Rogers shows how gardens should be designed to present the most pleasing and picturesque effects. He deals in detail with the whole subject, separate chapters being devoted to "Walks and Drives," "Beds and Borders," "Sloping Gardens," "The Rock Garden," "The Rose Garden," "Grass," etc., and the volume has numerous plans and illustrations.

In the admirable edition of the works of Anatole France for which English readers are indebted to the enterprise of Mr. John Lane two further volumes, "The Elm Tree on the Mall" and "The Wickwork Woman" (price 6s. each), have just appeared. Both novels have been translated by Miss M. P. Willcocks.

"Mysterious Morocco," by Mr. H. J. B. Ward, is a little book which may be commended to all who are interested in that fascinating country, but especially to those who intend to see something of it for themselves. Thanks to the enterprise of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, Morocco has been brought within the sphere of the holiday tourist, and Mr. Ward's practical guidance will enable the most to be made of a visit, whether it be confined to a trip down the coast or extended to inland travel. "Mysterious Morocco" is not, however, a mere compilation of facts and directions for tourists, but gives a brightly written and interesting account of the country and the people whose life is still "the unspoiled life of the East." The book, which has many illustrations, is published (price 2s. 6d.) by Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall and Co.

Not a little of Mark Twain's inimitable humour was embodied in his lectures and speeches, a collection of which has just been published by Messrs. Harper. The volume, entitled "Mark Twain's Speeches," has a preface from the pen of Mark himself and an introduction by Mr. W. D. Howells. Messrs. Harper are about to issue a book entitled "The Ship Dwellers," by Mr. Bigelow Paine, the biographer and associate of Mark Twain. It narrates the writer's experiences in tracing the footsteps of "The Innocents Abroad."

"The Native States of India," a volume by Sir William Lee-Warner, which Messrs. Macmillan will have ready shortly, is a new and thoroughly revised edition of the author's work on "The Protected Princes of India," which appeared some years ago. The original title was open to some misconception, and it has therefore been changed to one which more fittingly describes the scope of the work.

In the introduction to the new edition of the late Walter Bagehot's "Lombard Street" (Smith, Elder, and Co., price 3s. 6d. net), Mr. Hartley Withers justly speaks of it as a wonderful achievement that a book dealing with the shifting quicksands of the money market should still, after forty years, be a classic of which no one who wishes to understand the subject can afford to be ignorant. There have, of course, been some changes and developments in the conditions of the money market, and of these Mr. Withers gives a brief sketch. It is noteworthy, however, that the chief movements and tendencies have been precisely those which Bagehot foresaw and predicted. "Lombard Street," as Mr. Withers aptly puts it, "has accepted the bill that Bagehot drew on it."

Harper's Library of Living Thought is certainly a most praiseworthy example of publishing enterprise, providing those of the public who care for serious things with original expositions by distinguished authorities of subjects of intellectual interest. Two volumes just issued (price 2s. 6d. each) are "The Elements," an illuminating study of the evolution of matter, by Sir William A. Tilden, and "Religion and Art in Ancient Greece," by Professor A. Ernest Gardner.

Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co. will publish next week a novel entitled "Early Victorian: A Village Chronicle," by "S. G. Tallentyre," the well-known author of "The Life of Voltaire" and other works. The novel is a study of character in a country setting in the early part of the reign of Queen Victoria.

Dr. Bernard Hollander, whose book on "Hypnotism and Suggestion" (Pitman's, 6s. net) has just been published, has yet another work in the press which Messrs. Rebman will bring out immediately. Its title is "Mental Symptoms of Brain Disease," and it will have a preface by Dr. Jules Morel, Belgian State Commissioner in Lunacy.

ART.

THE British Museum could scarcely have selected a better time for the display in the Print Room of its unique treasures of Chinese and Japanese painting. The key-note struck by the Japan-British Exhibition has found an echo in picture galleries, societies, and salerooms. I have never known a season with more unity of purpose or offering more advantages, whether china, bronze or painting, to the lover of Oriental art. On the whole, and in spite of the Japan-British Exhibition, the balance of Oriental art is on the side of China. This is as it should be. As an older and autochthonous civilisation, China has first claim to a position which circumstances of war, politics, and fashion have tended to accord to Japan. At the British Museum exhibition Chinese painting takes its proper place as the fountain-head of Japanese art; enthusiasts of the colour print, however, will find there ample food for reflection.

The characteristic that most strikes me in this collection of paintings, ranging from the fourth to the nineteenth century, is perhaps less the extraordinary artistic feeling of the Chinese artist—of whom, it must be remembered, only the best productions are here displayed—than the amazing receptivity of a public which could appreciate such works as his. The simplicity and spaciousness of his work are not the result of a primitive mind, but of a mind become simple through complexity. And such simplicity makes much greater demands upon the perceptions of its appreciators than does the art that leaves nothing to the imagination. Your primitive public insist upon blood-and-thunder melodrama because the imitative effect of red paint and a tea-tray conveys more to them than do the subtler horrors of pure imagination. Chinese art is largely an art of hinting and suggesting, and to a less sophisticated mind would have no meaning at all. It represents, I suppose, the greatest progress from incident to pure thought that has ever been known. The thought in all the Chinese paintings here exhibited implies public understanding of the highest order. Thus in the famous makimono of fourth-century Ku-K'Ai-chih, illustrating a book entitled "Admonitions of the Instructress in the Palace," vividly represented scenes are valued less for their wonderful artistic power than for the precepts they impart. One of the most vivid, in which a maid is dressing her mistress's hair, bears the legend, "All can adorn their faces, none can adorn her heart." The beauty, skill, and naturalness of the work are entirely subordinate to the moral therein. Perhaps even more in landscape does the art of suggestion appear. Wang Wei, for instance, of whom it was said that "his poems were pictures, his pictures poems," uses what might almost be described as a sort of shorthand in his exquisite landscapes, understandable only to a public far advanced in the expression of an idea. The very sureness and beauty of his work imply a public in whose minds a single word of command calls up a whole train of ideas.

In the choice of subjects, again, is the implication of an unusually general feeling for art. While other nations revelled in heroics in the grand manner the Chinaman by the fourth century realised that nothing was "common or unclean." Hence his intense concentration on such subjects as geese, carp, blossom, more usually regarded as accessories than as subjects in themselves. Of these paintings nothing could be more beautiful than some eleventh-century geese by an unknown painter, the delicacy of "Fowls and Mallow" of the Ming dynasty; the exquisite "Lotuses and White Heron," and the masterly and more naturalistic "Tiger," are all evidences of a full appreciation of nature by a highly complex people.

Finally, the Chinese recognition of the place of children in the national life is a great advance on the point of view which regards them merely as uncouth objects later to assume a conventional shape. "The Hundred Children," painted by Liu Tsun in the fifteenth century, is one of the most graceful things I have ever seen. Here are depicted with remarkable verve and naturalness the amusements of infant China. Here bald-headed, tufted babies are disporting themselves with what might almost be the puppet-show of Goethe's day; another is shooting arrows into the air; a third regales himself with uncommon vigour with chop-sticks, while that human nature will out even in China may be seen from a Liliputian fight wherein one infant seizes with unparalleled ferocity upon the hair-tuft of another and rolls upon him.

Of the Japanese paintings, perhaps the most interesting is "The Death of Buddha," wherein all creation, even to the forest leaves, wails for the death of the master. The visitor will do well to avail himself of the useful catalogue prepared by Mr. Laurence Binyon, which may be obtained for a modest threepence. Not only is this essential for a full appreciation of the exhibits, but it has the additional advantage of containing a short summary of the history of Japanese and Chinese painting.

The enormous prices fetched the other day in the saleroom by some noted bronzes have shown collectors that apart from their artistic value, bronzes are a very safe investment. At the present moment a very fine collection of old Chinese bronzes at the gallery of Mr. Larkin in Bond Street is well worth a visit. Many of them have been exhibited at the Burlington Fine Arts Club as well as at the Victoria and Albert Museum, and their genuineness is thus guaranteed. From earliest days the Chinese have been acquainted with the art of moulding and chiselling bronze, and the ritual vessels—as, for instance, a large sacrificial vase, and a curious conventionalised hippopotamus with a hinged lid on its back—show the perfection achieved by them. These bronzes are the result of forty years' collecting, and it will be regrettable if so much effort and selection should end in the eventual separation of the various objects.

MUSIC.

THE production of Strauss's "Feuersnot," by Mr. Beecham, on Saturday, was a very interesting and enjoyable event. The work is in the way of being almost forgotten in Germany by now (so quickly is musical history made nowadays), so that it was clearly time for us to hear it in London, though a good many years will undoubtedly pass before it becomes really old-fashioned. At present the average hearer will certainly find it abstruse and up to date enough, though it is, of course, by no means so stiff as "Salome" or "Elektra." The nature of the libretto prevented this. Strauss has taken a naïve old story and lavished on its music all the resources of his art, while at the same time preserving its unsophisticated folk's tale atmosphere. This is in its way one of the most remarkable features of "Feuersnot." Not for the first time he shows that he does not need to rely exclusively on the "big bow-wow" method to gain his ends.

In its wealth of simple, unsophisticated melody

"Feuersnot" has no equal among modern works unless it be, perhaps, in "Hänsel und Gretel," which it slightly recalls now and again. Still more marked is the suggestion of "Die Meistersinger," though not so much in the music as in the story and its setting—the old-world gabled street which provides the mise-en-scène, the twelfth-century costumes, the witchery of midsummer eve, the burgomaster and his daughter, calling cousins so directly with Veit Pogner and his winsome Eva, and so on, and not overlooking the vein of satire and parable common to both works. It may be doubted, however, if even Wagner, not wanting as he was in a good conceit of himself, would have shown himself quite so audacious under the latter head as Strauss, though he would certainly have felt pleased by the allusions to himself.

To what extent Wagner would have recognised Strauss's claim to be regarded as his lineal successor is an interesting theme for speculation. That he would have failed to recognise the beauty and distinction, the fragrance and originality of such music as this of "Feuersnot" it is hard to believe. The performance on Saturday was creditable in some respects, but might have been better. Neither Herr Oster as Kunrad nor Miss Maude Fay as Diemut could be reckoned quite ideal, but both were competent enough, as were Mr. Robert Radford, Mr. Harry Dearth and others in smaller parts, while the orchestra was quite superb under the direction of Mr. Beecham himself.

At Covent Garden lately the only new production has been d'Erlanger's "Tess," which was given very well, with Mlle. Destinn taking the title-part, which suits her admirably, and Mr. Riccardo Martin that of Angel Clare. He, too, was quite good, so that, with Sammarco also lending effective aid in the part of Alec d'Urberville, the composer had every reason to be satisfied with the presentation of his work. It is certainly quite a clever and effective opera, revealing indeed a mastery of technique on the part of its "amateur" composer which many a professional might envy, even though it hardly possesses sufficient individuality to be likely to win the permanent favour of the public.

The interesting announcement is made that Mme. Melba has now definitely decided to give an operatic season in Australia next year, beginning in September next, and extending over eight weeks—four in Melbourne and four in Sydney. The works will, it is said, be given in Italian, but "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser" will be included. Mme. Melba will, of course, sing herself, and Mr. John McCormack has, it is stated, been engaged as the principal tenor. Mme. Melba's notion of giving opera in Australia is one of long standing. Originally it was stated that such artists as Bonci, Zenatello, Plançon and Renaud would accompany her, and it was even announced at one time that she had hopes of persuading Nikisch to accept the post of conductor—a sufficiently absurd idea.

Mr. John McCormack has also been engaged, according to report, by Signor Campanini for an opera season in Italy which he is arranging for the coming autumn, which must be accounted another feather in the cap of this clever young Irish artist.

It always speaks well for the condition of any institution when it finds it necessary to enlarge its borders, and every one will hope that the Royal Academy of Music will embark on a new era of prosperity when a year hence it takes possession of the new premises in the Marylebone Road, the first stone of which is to be laid to-morrow (Thursday). The move is certainly not being made too soon, for it has long been a matter of astonishment that our oldest and most famous musical school should have enjoyed no better accommodation than that which it has suffered so long in Tenterden Street. The Royal Academy of Music boasts of a famous and venerable past, and there is no reason to doubt that it has in store a future equally distinguished.

A comparatively recent phenomenon is the composer-analyst, who not only provides the music, but also tells the public all about it—how this movement is good, that one less successful, and so on. Ruskin was one of the first to adopt this ingenuous attitude in regard to his own work, and numerous passages in which, in pursuance of this spirit of compulsory self-approval, he patted himself on the back, must be reckoned among classic examples of the art of self-praise. The average composer who attempts the same thing is, perhaps, liable to be misunderstood; yet why should he not? After all, he knows more about his work than any one else, and if after due consideration he is honestly of opinion that it is exceedingly good stuff, why should the world object to his recording the fact? Some analytical remarks conceived on these lines might be more entertaining than the works themselves, and whatever tends to lighten the tedium of the concert-room is surely to be commended.

Apropos of composer-analysts, the redoubtable Max Reger has, it seems, recently been trying his hand at some. Here is his own account of one of his newest compositions—a setting of the hundredth psalm:—

> The words of the Psalm are, doubtless, familiar to all who are not owners of harems. I do not know whether my composition of this Psalm contains themes; the critics will enlighten me concerning this. Key of D Major absolutely and strictly adhered to. It is said the Psalm is divided into three parts; particular warning is given against several very malicious (bosartigen) organ points. The principal theme, heard occasionally, is as follows:—

There follows a fearful and wonderful theme in seven flats and 7-4 time, bristling with sharps, double sharps, flats, and double flats, whose notation is evidently part of the joke. But Max Reger has always been noted for his humour, which is, however, at times no laughing matter.

Mr. Justice Parker's decision last week refusing the Gramophone Company's application to have the word "gramophone" registered as their exclusive trade mark settles a question which has long been a matter of difficulty in trade circles. For years past now the Gramophone Company have always maintained their exclusive right to the word, and by threats of litigation they have largely succeeded in getting their view accepted. The judgment just given, however, has proved that they were wrong. Mr. Justice Parker seems to have had no difficulty in deciding that they have no right to the exclusive use of the word, even though their claim had become largely recognised in the trade, and so it will be open to any to use it without let or hindrance henceforward. To meet the case, why do not the company just turn the word about, and call their instruments "phonograms"? This word they could doubtless register.

THE THEATRES.

THE past week has been a very quiet one theatrically, the greatest event being the revival of T. W. Robertson's comedy, "Society." I believe there has only been one previous revival of this play since its production in 1865, which seems curious, because it is clever and amusing, though, not unnaturally now, a trifle old-fashioned. As a picture of Bohemian life of the period it is very interesting, and the famous Owl's Nest scene is delightful. There is an excellent company at the Coronet, and no one will regret a visit there.

* * * * * *

At the Court Theatre the other evening I found Mr. Clive Currie's Rehearsal Company giving a most meritorious performance of "The Taming of the Shrew," and also presenting two short plays. One of these, a song cycle by Mme. Liza Lehmann, called "The Life of a Rose," was a very pretty trifle. Miss Adelaide Rind sang "off," while Miss Violet Furnival as the rose danced very prettily "on," and illustrated how the flower lived to cause delight until the storm scattered her petals to the winds. It was all very slight and dainty, but quite charming. Before this we were treated to a play by the lady who, for some inscrutable reason, chooses to call herself Gaston Gervex. It was called "The Bishop's Fortune," and proved to be a sublimely naïve affair. A millionaire millowner dies, leaving his money to his son, provided that son will cast off the mill-hand wife with whom he has contracted a mésalliance. If he will not do this, a worthy Bishop has the money to dispense in charity. The sturdy young husband cares more for his loyal little low-class wife than for millions, and refuses to sign certain curious documents which that haughty lady his widowed mother keeps in a drawer. As a result, mother and son are practically beggared, and the Bishop takes the money only to give it back to the son, he being, presumably, the first object suitable for charity he has come across! The curtain falls on a general reconciliation, for the haughty mother, having had her spirit broken by the threat of poverty, consents to take her humble daughter-in-law to her arms. The curiously unsophisticated writing and the weird points of law amused the house considerably, but Mrs. Montagu Fowler will have to do something much less artless if she wishes to live up to the name of Gaston Gervex.

* * * * * *

At the Empire the revised ballet, now called "Hullo —People!" goes with infinite spirit. The new scene at the Zoo is very funny, though ex-President Roosevelt might not be wholly pleased with Mr. J. F. McArdle's satire on his personality. The pot-pourri of popular plays is excellent nonsense. Miss Valli Valli makes a delightfully bad girl of the family, and Mr. Fred Leslie and Mr. McArdle give diverting studies of Sherlock Holmes and Jimmy Valentine respectively. The famous Chanticleer Trio still remains, while the scene where an imitation Sarah Bernhardt addresses rival stars is really clever. Altogether this revue is quite one of the best the Empire has had, and I found a packed house thoroughly enjoying it.

* * * * * *

Terry's Theatre is to open next month with an American success called "The Rejuvenation of Aunt Mary," in which Miss May Robson will play the leading part.

* * * * * *

Miss Evelyn Millard's next venture in management will be at the New Theatre, where she will produce an English version of M. Berton's play, "Le Rencontre." Mr. Norman McKinnel and Miss Sarah Brooke will both be in the cast.

* * * * * *

"The Speckled Band," which is doing enormous business at the Adelphi, will have to leave that house next month, but arrangements have been made for its transference to the Globe. The Adelphi will then become a musical comedy house, for Mr. George Edwardes will produce there a new play by Messrs. J. T. Tanner and Lionel Monckton.

* * * * * *

Miss Gertrude Kingston's "Little Theatre" is making rapid progress, but at present no date is announced for the first of her Tuesday productions. We are to have a novelty every Tuesday. Miss Kingston, I see, has made the interesting discovery that "the French stage is at least twenty-five years behind the English." I wonder!

SPORT.

RACING NOTES.

THE racing season of 1911 ought properly to commence on Monday, March 27, but the Stewards of the Jockey Club have decided that it will be "more convenient" to begin a week earlier, so Lincoln is to be fixed for March 20. The reasons for this change have not been disclosed, but no doubt the alteration will become a permanent arrangement. Newmarket Craven Meeting is fixed for April 19, and the Two Thousand will be run for on May 3. There is to be an interval next year of only four weeks between the Two Thousand and the Derby, which will be run for on May 31. As Easter falls about the middle of April, the Manchester Cup will be run for after the Derby. I am very pleased to see that the Stewards have followed the advice given to them on several occasions by TRUTH, and have arranged for an interval of two weeks between Epsom and Ascot, which is to begin on June 20. This is a most laudable reform, and it may be hoped that the same arrangement will be made in future years. It is exceedingly undesirable, for obvious reasons, that only one week should intervene between two such meetings as Epsom and Ascot, and the change is calculated to increase the fields at the later meeting, particularly in the races for three-year-olds. The sequence of the principal summer meetings is much as usual, the Newmarket fixtures being set for July 4 and July 18, while Goodwood is to commence on August 1. The postponement of Goodwood from the last week in July will cause an inconvenient clashing with Cowes Regatta and the various R.Y.S. festivities. The date of the Doncaster meeting has not yet been fixed, but the St. Leger will presumably be run on September 6. The Newmarket October Meetings begin on September 26 and terminate on October 27, and November 25 is to be the last day of the season.

As the list of fixtures is so frightfully overcrowded it would be as well if the Stewards were to announce officially that no applications for new meetings can be entertained. There are a number of speculative enthusiasts who are always ready to start a new race meeting wherever they find what they consider to be a suitable locality, and this craze does not seem to have been killed by the disastrous failure of so many such undertakings. A picturesque site at once suggests a racecourse and buildings, and many of the press puffs of such schemes remind one of the Frenchman who, on entering the vault under the Great Pyramid, exclaimed: Quel emplacement pour un billard!

Tuesday next is one of the great nomination days of the Turf year. Entries will then close for the Derby and Oaks for 1912. The conditions of both races remain unaltered, the Derby being worth £6,500, while the Oaks is a stake of £5,000. Last year the fund contributed £1,250 to the Derby, and £655 to the Oaks in order to make up the advertised value of each stake. This year there was a deficiency of £650 over the Derby, and of £455 over the Oaks. There are six races at Newmarket, including next year's July and Chesterfield Stakes, and the Boscawen Post Stakes of £100 each for 1912. The conditions of the July Stakes are supremely unattractive, the race being a sweepstakes of £50 each, and £30 forfeit, with not a penny of added money. The Chesterfield Stakes is a sweepstakes of £30 each, and £20 forfeit. The pecuniary conditions of the Hastings Plate and Zetland Plate (both for 1912) are the same, and they are utterly idiotic. There is an endowment of £500, with a sweepstakes of £10 each, half forfeit. The sweepstakes goes to the second horse, and the forfeits to the Fund. How much better to let there be a sweepstakes of £10 each, with an entrance of £3 or £5, to be the only forfeit if declared by the Tuesday after next year's Houghton Meeting. The races closing at Goodwood are next year's Richmond Stakes, and the Sussex Stakes for 1912. At Ascot there are the Coronation Stakes and St. James's Palace Stakes, both for 1912. The conditions of both these races are preposterous. There is a sweepstakes of £100 each, half forfeit, with £300 added, and £400 is deducted for second and third horses. The sweepstakes is in an excessive degree out of proportion to the added money.

A paragraph has gone round the press in which it is stated that of all the "big stakes" which were started some twenty years ago the Eclipse Stakes at Sandown Park only remains. Of course, this is all rubbish and balderdash, for the Jockey Club Stakes also remains with unaltered pecuniary conditions. This is a sample of the skimble-skamble fictions which are circulated by some of the papers, but it is not more slovenly as a blunder than the description of the Princess of Wales's Stakes as a race which "did not cost the Jockey Club anything, the owners of the horses engaged providing all of and more than the £2,000 offered." It is really too bad that such dunderhead trash should be sent round the country, as a glance at the conditions of the race shows that this statement is a farrago of nonsense. The Princess of Wales's Stakes cost the Jockey Club £2,000, being the amount of the added money, for the whole of the sweepstakes, with forfeits and entrances, went to the winner. The conditions of the race are of unexampled generosity for Newmarket, as they are on the Ascot lines, there being no deductions whatever. It is also untrue that the race was a stake of £2,000, for the winner received £3,457, and the liberal sum of £700 besides went to the nominator of the second horse, and the owners of the second and third.

Every year some horse is pitched upon as likely to be a good thing for the Stewards' Cup, but the early fancy has scarcely ever won this handicap. During the last two months Sunder has been the universal tip, but if Mr. S. Joel had meditated a Stewards' Cup coup with this colt surely he would not have been started at Ascot, when he won the T.Y.C. Biennial in a common canter. Another Goodwood tip is Solferino, but Lord Cadogan's horse appears to have altogether lost his form, as he has been badly beaten three times during the present season. Solferino has not won a race for more than two years. Princesse de Galles is a Newmarket fancy for one of the T.Y.C. handicaps at Goodwood.

I see that surprise is expressed that Lord Derby should have been absent from the meeting of the Jockey Club, which was held at Newmarket during the First July week. Lord Derby was kept away by an important public engagement at Liverpool.

Sunstar is said to be the highest-tried two-year-old that has yet been out, and I am told that he was not quite up to the mark when he was beaten for the New Stakes at Ascot. The Levant Stakes at Goodwood will be a very interesting race if it brings out Sunstar, St. Nat, Night Rider, Meleager, and Wrinkler. Seaforth and Sunstar may meet again in the Middle Park Plate, and Mr. J. B. Joel's colt is engaged in the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster.

Bachelor's Double won the Royal Hunt Cup "all the way," having the race safely in hand half a mile from home. Of course, many horses were eased when it was found that there was no chance of winning. If all the starters had been ridden out Eudorus (who was placed second) would not have finished in the first six. I fancy that Arranmore was really second best.

Nuage, winner of the Grand Prix, was bred in France, but his pedigree is thoroughly English. He is a son of Simonian, by St. Simon. This horse won the Brocklesby Stakes in the late eighties for the late Colonel North, and during the early part of his two-year-old career a very high opinion of him was entertained by the stable. I have a letter written at that time by Lord Randolph Churchill, in which he expresses the opinion that Simonian would turn out a Derby horse. He was a very handsome colt, but he disappointed his friends on the Turf. However, Simonian has been very successful at the stud in France. Nephte, the dam of Nuage, represents one of Sir Joseph Hawley's most successful strains of blood. Nuage is to be entered for next year's Ascot Cup, if all goes well with him.

The betting reported on the St. Leger is utterly fantastical. It is impossible to believe that any one suffered to go at large could accept the ridiculous odds which are stated to have been taken. If Lemberg had won the Grand Prix his price could not have been less than 2 to 1, and we are required to believe that these odds are now taken about him in spite of his ignominious defeat at Longchamp. Greenback's price is also absurd. There will be no genuine market on the St. Leger until within a few days of the race being run, and if it be true that Lemberg cannot move in deep going, every prudent backer will leave the Derby winner alone until the day. Nearly all the best of the horses engaged in the St. Leger have valuable engagements during the next few weeks, and the running may considerably alter the present aspect of the race.

In commemoration of Sir John Kelk's win with Loot at the recent Newmarket Meeting, the racing members of the Junior Carlton Club have made a presentation to Sir John of a unique two-handled Chinese vase of the Ming period, originally taken as loot from the palace of Pekin.

The Bibury Club Meeting at Salisbury was unexpectedly successful in that there were good fields for most of the races, but the class of the sport was not high. Night Rider won the Hurstbourne Stakes, as I had anticipated would be the case, but it was generally expected that Rhosmarket would be successful, as he had a great advantage in the weights. At Ascot, when Night Rider won the Triennial, he was receiving 5 lb. from Rhosmarket, and he beat him by two lengths. Now the American colt was giving 13 lb., so, on paper, it appeared as if Rhosmarket would win, but Night Rider had more in hand at Ascot than was generally supposed, and he is a smart colt. Rhosmarket is a degenerate own brother to Llangwm, for he did not run kindly, but swerved a good deal. Corfu was regarded as a good thing for the Champagne Stakes, and the Duke of Portland's colt was backed against the field with six starters, but he was cleverly beaten by the colt by Persimmon out of Tender and True, who had no price in the betting, and who is very backward indeed. This was a disastrous race for backers, as the Chelys colt carried a lot of money, but he got off badly. The winner had been beaten at Newbury the other day in the race won by Queen Tii.

Writing a fortnight ago about Lingfield I gave a plumper for Oliver Goldsmith for the Great Foal Plate, and on Saturday Lord Derby's colt won cleverly, having started at the satisfactory price of 10 to 1. Mary Carmichael, who finished second, was so general a tip that at the finish odds were betted on her in a field of twelve. I was told some time ago that Oliver Goldsmith would win the next race for which he started. Mary Carmichael was given for the Lingfield race in prominent type by nearly every paper, and she was regarded as emphatically the good thing of the week.

Next week there are meetings at Leicester, Ayr, Liverpool, Windsor, and Hurst Park. At Liverpool Persephone should win the Mersey Stakes if she is now all right, as I do not believe that either Seaforth or Night Rider could beat her at the weights. There are forty-four acceptances for this race. There are twenty-six three-year-olds left in for the St. George's Stakes of £2,000, including Lemberg, who is not likely to run. The probable starters are Rochester, Maid of Corinth, Sunningdale, Sanctuary, Montreal, Santa Fina, Yellow Slave, and Placidus or Ulster King. The Netheravon candidate or Montreal may win this race. There are thirty-eight acceptances for the Great Lancashire Breeders' Produce Stakes of £2,000, including St. Anton, but this race will probably be won by one of the dark lot. Whisk Broom is being prepared to run for the Knowsley Dinner Stakes of £1,000.

There are sixty-four acceptances for the Hurst Park Foal Plate of £1,500, and this race should be a good thing for St. Nat. Twenty-five three-year-olds are left in for the Duchess of York Plate of £1,300, including Lemberg, Tressady, Cardinal Beaufort, Swynford, Decision, Admiral Hawke, and Whisk Broom. These are the materials for an interesting race, but it cannot be dealt with at present.

There will be some heavy betting over the Eclipse Stakes between Neil Gow and Lemberg. I expect Lord Rosebery's colt will win. Cellini is a great Newmraket tip for the National Breeders' Produce Stakes, and there are several animals which have been reserved for this race. Cyllius has been erroneously described as brother to Lemberg, who is by Cyllene out of Galicia, whereas the two-year-old is by Cyllene out of Galéottia. Nicola, who won over this course in April, has been kept for the £5,000 race. It is curious that the general impression appears to be that the richest two-year-old stake of the year will be won by an animal which has been twice beaten.

"IFS" AT HENLEY AND ELSEWHERE.

There were a good many "ifs" about in the conversation of young men last week. If our men had won the toss at Henley when the station meant so much, or if Cambridge had gone in first against Oxford, and if the weather had only been decent—well, then, of course, things might have been different. Those of these young men who are acquainted with Greek, as a Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge once observed to the Senate, may recognise that in these "ifs" one is using the fourth form of conditional sentence as propounded in Farrar's Greek syntax law. I believe, like the venerable Dean's other writings, it is not as popular as it was, and as Greek is not what it was either at the public schools or Universities I explain. The fourth form of conditional sentence was the "if" about something that had not happened in the past, is not happening in the present, and cannot happen in the future. All of which conditions are fulfilled by an hypothesis as to what would have been the result at Henley or at Lord's last week if something had happened that did not.

I have rather elaborated this position because the intellectual reader will more easily appreciate the form of hypothesis to which I desire to call attention more particularly. This case would be the third form in the said syntax—namely, something that has not happened in the past, but may happen in the future. A foreign crew with the worse station make the pace against Leander and take their water in the first quarter of a mile. Well, if they did this and held their position by such a daring manœuvre every newspaper correspondent in the kingdom would be screeching about the beauties of the foreign style and the well-organised despondency of the modern pens would be bewailing the decadence of English rowing. But because the coach was not named M. Arcourt D'Or but plain Harcourt Gold, and because the crew that did this was an Oxford college crew and did not come from Belgium or Germany, and because the stroke is plain Fleming and not Van der Flemingo, nothing is said about the performance or the style. Nay, we are solemnly told that Henley demonstrates the success of the Belgian style because—who would believe it? and yet heaps of idiots will believe it—Anglian won the Thames Cup! No one wishes to belittle their success. It is their first win, and it will do the club a lot of good. Only those acquainted with the circumstances of Metropolitan rowing realise the difficulties involved in turning out a crew, let alone a winning crew, at Henley. But to compare the two styles is like comparing rotten apples with the best ripe peaches. Magdalen's victory in that heat on the worst day and in the fastest time of the regatta was a superb performance. They were more beaten than the losers. But this is what one would have expected. Jesus met them in the final, and rowed themselves to a standstill. Magdalen held them easily enough. The Cambridge crew had previously to go all out to beat Thames, who had the worse station, by two feet. The Metropolitan crew were admirably stroked by Richardson. The Cambridge men were also beaten by Balliol in the Ladies', so that there is a little hope that one may hear less fluff talked about the Jesus style. Fairbairn stroked then admirably, and while one admired his generalship, one could not help regretting his obsession for what he considers the Belgian style.

Eton had a ripping crew for the Ladies'; they had a fine race with Balliol when the stations were equal, and fairly held them and rowed them down. The funny thing about Fairbairn's rowing was that, with all his theories, he was quicker and longer in the water than any of his crew. His final was a splendid effort. In the Eton crew there were rowing names—Tinné, Pitman, Gladstone. First beat New College, and Pembroke, with the worse station, only just lost to Balliol, so that the Cambridge crews did not do at all badly. Balliol had a splendid stroke in Huggins, and in the Thames Cup one must not forget the hard plugging of the Royal Engineers and the genuine genius for stroking displayed by Sankey. As newcomers to Henley, one could welcome the Sappers again. Trinity Hall had no luck in the Mugs, but they turned up trumps in the Visitors' and Wyfold's. They won their races. They were stroked by Swann, a freshman whose reverend father rowed for Cambridge and for the Hall when, with the present First Lord of the Admiralty, they mopped the board at Henley in the Jubilee of 1887. Horace will not forget Kinnear, of Kensington, with a good long stroke which, Belgian copyists will please note, took the Diamonds from Lucas, the German, again a plucky runner-up. Thames had certainly the finest four for the Stewards', but they were not good enough to give the Winnipeg four the station on a bad day, and they were just beaten. This Canadian crew rowed down the heavy German four in the final of the Stewards'. I know the Canadians consider they won the South African war for us. They may now plume themselves that they have saved us from a German invasion. If the Germans had won, the Blatchfords and Arnold Whites and other journalistic German scaremongers would have written themselves to a standstill in their knock-kneed terror. Well, that disaster was averted; and, as a final salve to our national honour, two old Cambridge Blues, Burn and Thomson, of First and the Hall, beat the Dutchmen in the Pairs, though Burn nearly lost the race in the last hundred yards by catching a crab, and the situation was saved by Thomson's watermanship. And so ended a Henley with the finest racing and the worst weather on record.

The most egregious partisan of Oxford must admit that the Dark Blues had all the luck of the cricket at Lord's. They won the toss, and the bowlers could not get a foothold. They were all over the place, and yet took wickets. The reason was that the inclement weather had nurtured the bacillus of kuvio-neuritis which any Harley Street practitioner with an elementary knowledge of medicine and Greek will tell you is, being translated, Lord's nerves. It began to touch up the Oxford men badly. Four wickets were down for thirty, and then a certain international golfer named Hooman came in. A man who can win an International match on the last green at Hoylake has no nerves. He is immune. He stopped and he hit, and to him came Le Couteur, a Rhodes scholar from Australia, and he stayed. But his form was not a patch on that of Hooman, and the errant bacillus went to Cambridge, and catches began to be missed. Hughes fell a bad victim. He became hopeless and helpless.

He missed four catches. He made them a present of over 200 runs. He went in to bat. One felt sorry for him. Out first ball in the first innings and second or third in the next innings, clean bowled by Evans after making a scratchy short run. Poor fellow, but I should not play him at Lord's again. There was Susskind. The Oxford last man hit out and the score came to over 300, and thanks be to Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Hughes, Le Couteur made 50 per cent. of the runs. And then the bacillus grabbed the Cambridge batsmen, and they went down like ninepins. Le Couteur by streaks stuck them up. They followed on, and Ireland looked like treating the slow balls as they deserved, but he got caught, and Collins, who alone made any stand in the first innings, could not make up his mind to have a go for them. Old Blues wept for ten minutes of Jessop, Sammy Woods, or Francis Ford, who is not the new headmaster of Harrow. Lionel was, I think, the only Ford not to get his Blue. But he was the president of the Union. In both innings Le Couteur took wickets, and, just to show there were others, Pawson, the Oxford captain, put on Evans, a nice medium-paced bowler with a good length, to wipe off the innings with four wickets for 7 runs. And it was just as well that he did, for if the innings had not been finished off that day the match would have been drawn. No play would have been possible on Wednesday, and under the new scheme of county scoring the event would have counted as a lost match to each University.

This match was followed by one at Aldershot, in which the combined Universities met the United Services. Major R. M. Poore organised the match, and one can only hope it will become an annual fixture. The United Services won an interesting match, in which Baird played a fine forcing innings. The Oval authorities got together a really good team for the Gentlemen and Players. The former were beaten after an interesting game. Burns ought to be played for his bowling and batting in any representative match. By the way, Hooman plays at Lord's, and he has already played for Kent. Jessop has at last found his form, and by a hard-hit century and a half beat Worcester. There was plenty of good exciting cricket despite the weather, but there was nothing to equal Eton's remarkable win over Harrow by nine runs. Fowler's batting made it possible and Manners hit brilliantly in the nick of time, and Boswell, the last man, did as much for Eton as his namesake for Johnson by making 32. Harrow tumbled out for 45 runs. Fowler took eight wickets. His break-backs that had comparatively little luck in the first innings—just failing to get wickets—were unplayable, and young Steel's leg breaks finished off the innings after a plucky stand by the last two youngsters. The Eton and Harrow match and the Ladies in one week will make Eton more cocky than ever, say her admirers. But that is scarcely possible. After all, you can get statesmen and even cricketers from other schools, but not oarsmen. Much may be forgiven to Eton. The men that row do not swagger.

ECHOES OF THE PRIZE FIGHT.

("One negro was shot dead by an indignant citizen for boasting over Johnson's victory and showing undue exuberance in the presence of a white man."—Daily Paper.)

No. I.—The Reason Why.

The Yankee man with rage grew red,
He promptly pressed the trigger,
And with his Derringer shot dead
The contumacious nigger.

Nor can you blame the angry Yank,
That cheeky black had sought it;
He only had himself to thank;
On his own head he brought it.

For why? When first was spread about
The mortifying story
Of Johnson's knocking Jeffries out
In Reno's prize-fight gory,

This coloured worm laughed loud, did he (Perhaps he had a tight skin),
And showed a too exuberant glee
In presence of a white-skin!

Yes, right it served that nigger-boy.
Protest? Not I! No, thank'ee!
How dare he with his laugh annoy
A democratic Yankee?

No. II.—Cui Bono?

The fight it made a world-wide splash,
And caused no end of bustle;
Folks paid almighty sums in cash
To view the much-puffed tussle.

Yet proved it quite a poor affair
That Reno's ring provided;
Unequal the contestants were,
The contest too one-sided.

Jeff took black eyes and roasted ribs
And cash in compensation,
While Johnson took his share of dibs—
Without the castigation.

They've something both to show—the tin;
They've made financial fortunes;
But where do other folks come in?
That's what your bard importunes.

The fight (see what has since ensued!)
Has proved a nation's canker,
Has roused a flame of racial feud
And black, envenomed rancour.

In short, it was a potent curse
Bad passions to unfetter.
A hundred millions are the worse,
And only two the better.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

FAVOURABLE opinions continue to be expressed as to the conditions of the new Daily Mail offer of £10,000 for the futherance of aviation. Mr. Massac Buist, in the Morning Post, among others, makes a sound point in dwelling on the fact that the form of contest proposed, to wit, a prolonged circular tour extending over 1,000 miles, and involving frequent stops and restarts at definite points, is calculated to encourage this time the manufacturer and designer even more than the individual aviator. In other words, the contest puts a premium on improvements in the machines rather than the intrepidity of the pilot, and this is as it should be. Hardly any machine at present existing, however ably piloted, could hope to win the prize. The next step, therefore, rests with the designers.

Messrs. Rolls-Royce's recent denial of the report that they contemplate adopting the piston valve system in place of the mushroom variety will have had interest for many. The rumour arose from the fact that Mr. Royce applied some time ago for a patent in connection with a new valve of the piston type. Now the firm explain that it is not their intention to abandon the older method, and they have given their reasons, which is, perhaps, rather daring of them. The arguments which they advance in favour of the mushroom type are briefly:—(1) That it requires no lubrication; (2) that it can be made practically noiseless; (3) that it is the least liable to derangement; (4) that it is also the lightest; (5) that in efficiency it is second to none as tested by the power yielded; and (6) that it indicates when the safe limit of speed has been reached by setting up noise.

It is easy to imagine the answers which the sliding-valve advocates will be likely to make to many of these arguments. As to point 2, for instance, they would certainly point out that while the mushroom valve can be made quiet enough, it not infrequently is very much the reverse, and even if quiet originally tends with wear to become less so. Neither would they be likely to admit its superiority on the score of simplicity, while the sixth plea, as to the noise set up in certain conditions being useful as a warning, lends itself to an obvious retort. It is rather to be hoped, however, that the whole controversy will not be revived anew. The question was thoroughly thrashed out two years ago, when the Knight valve was first introduced, and the experts may now fairly agree to differ on the subject. Both types have their advantages, and as tested in practice there is not much to grumble about in either. If the mushroom type stills holds its own, the earlier objections urged against the Knight have certainly not been verified in the event.

Mr. J. Landfear Lucas, who initiated the idea of providing local guides for touring motorists, and the R.A.C. authorities, who have carried it out, are equally to be congratulated upon the celerity with which the scheme has been put in practice. It is only a few weeks since the notion was first put forward, but already the system is in working order and giving satisfaction. One of the guides whose "beat" covers Hertfordshire and Bedfordshire furnishes the following catalogue of local lions comprised within his ambit:—

> A cathedral, part of a monastery, sites of two battles, a buried city, one of the oldest earthworks in Britain, a Saxon church, the monument of the greatest philosopher, one of the earliest brasses of civilians in existence and a palimpsest, a Saxon fortress with a subsequent history of the greatest interest, one of the most beautiful parks in England and a typical home of an English gentleman, a grand view over about five counties, a simple English village with stocks, whipping-post, and ducking-pond, half-timbered houses with thatched roofs, a British earthwork and companion Roman ditto, prehistoric mounds, tumuli, and remains of villages, a Norman priory, some Roman roads, fortalice churches, and the homes of a great poet and novelist.

Presumably, however, one would be allowed to make a selection from this extensive menu; otherwise the plain man might be disposed to rebel.

The case of the chauffeur who fell asleep at the end of a long day's driving recently, and ran his car into a fence in consequence, is not so unique as some sagacious commentators have assumed. Not a few who have undertaken long journeys involving many hours at the wheel have had similar experiences, and cases are authenticated of well-known motorists who have driven miles without the least consciousness of their surroundings. The practice is certainly not one to be commended or encouraged, but it is none the less surprising what feats the body is sometimes capable of performing when the active control of the brain is apparently in abeyance. Sleep-walking supplies another instance of the same phenomenon, of course, and in time to come perhaps auto-somnambulism—or should it be somnauto-bilism?—will find its recognised place in medical text-books.

Complaints of taxi-cab drivers are always with us, and they are certainly not without justification under a good many heads, but there seems no occasion to exaggerate on the subject. Certainly I am hardly disposed to agree that matters are quite so desperate as has been recently suggested by a well-known authority, from whose remarks one might suppose that the highwaymen of old were polite and orderly members of society in comparison with the average taxi driver. Doubtless a good many of the latter drive a good deal faster than they should, take more chances than is advisable, and rely too implicitly on their brakes; but speaking generally they handle their cars nowadays efficiently enough, and I am inclined to doubt if the wear and tear resulting from rough usage are anything like so serious as is alleged. No doubt, alike as man and as driver, the average taxi chauffeur is capable of improvement, but I am disposed to think that his chief failings are more moral than mechanical.

A useful sundry which it is advisable never to be without on the road is a tape measure. In the event of a collision or other accident of any kind it is often invaluable for the purpose of measuring wheel tracks, distances, and so forth, and generally establishing in black and white data which may be of the utmost importance in the event of any subsequent legal proceedings. One never knows when, even if the most innocent and careful of drivers, one may not be involved in disagreeables of this sort. Not long ago in the country I was drawn up quietly by the side of the road engaged in scrutinising a map, when I was run right into by a young lady driving a trap. It was not a case of her horse bolting or anything of that kind, but sheer miscalculation on her part of the width of her wheels. Happily it was only a grazing collision, but the wing involved, though it has since been straightened and repainted, bears the marks of the mishap to this day. The tape measure was hardly required in this instance, though in the case of any dispute it might easily have been useful enough.

WOMAN.

THE WEAK END.

IF the lord of the castle—or, for that matter, of the cottage—in the country were placed in the Palace of Truth—from which Heaven defend us all!—it would be interesting to ascertain how much hospitality is willingly yielded and how much is gratefully accepted. Is the visitor or the visited the more deceived? Does the former really wish to abandon the comforts of home for the privilege of being out? And is the latter a mere martyr to a social custom deliberately destroying his chance of perfect peace in a kind endeavour to supply the wants of others obsessed by a conviction that it is blessed to receive?

Nowadays to remain in town from Friday to Monday is to argue yourself unknown and unwanted, and it has been hinted in suspicious circles that postponed propositions for a Saturday theatre or supper party based on "I am always away at week-ends" do not sit securely upon a foundation of absolute truth.

Let her or him who inhabits a country house during the early spring season beware of giving the address broadcast. In the multitude of motor-cars lurks the danger of the promiscuous guest. The motor-car must have its Mecca, and the grave is not its goal; and a reputation for merriment (and a good cook) will secure extensive patronage. Round the luncheon-table will crowd the dusty travellers who arrive just in time to be too late to wash; and it has often been found difficult to secure enough teacups for the strangers within the gates at four o'clock.

"Are you frightened of cows?" I once asked a dweller of the countryside when we were brought face to face with a herd in a narrow lane. "No," she replied, bravely; "there is only one thing I am frightened of down here—visitors!" She started a suspicion in my mind, and I have been tabulating the terrors of the situation, knowing that only a few people are born guests or hosts, while others achieve such habits by force of will and a determination to be in the fashion.

Under the ordinary circumstances of comfort, neither those of the millionaire nor of the economist, the mistress who is the housekeeper will find herself confronted with many difficulties of catering. The wrong fruit will be ripe and the railway people will omit to forward the ham for breakfast, while the dinner fish will arrive the worse for wear and the local laundress conclusively proves her limitations. Visitors either accentuate with embarrassing effusion their desire to please, or go their way with an airy selfishness thinly veiled with, "Don't bother about me; I can look after myself," or they may even commit the greatest indiscretion of not feeling well, when the hostess is expected to be at their command with a regular doctor, odd meals, and every spare moment of her rare leisure.

The impromptu party is as a rule a greater success than that planned a long time in advance, for at the last moment an unavoidable absentee may completely upset the whole programme, and to secure the total essential for games an invitation may be given without due consideration. The result may be an oddment incapable of wielding racquet, club, or pole, or even making that desirable fourth at bridge. Further, he may be beset with the notions that the joyousness of a gathering is best upheld by constant conversation, and that things are not going right merrily unless you sit up till two o'clock in the morning.

Incidentally I recall a host who suffered from this last belief, and I have known him drag a card-table out into the garden at dawn, when he would denounce harshly "those confounded birds."

The part of the entertained is as difficult to play as that of the entertainer, and amongst virtues to be cultivated by the feminine guest is the art of listening brightly to stories she has known for years, while she may be advised to practise a patient demeanour when these are submitted as each chance visitor calls. She must, too, persistently admire her hostess's children and approve her management, and she should envy all her clothes, and pet or condemn her husband and favourite dog as expedience may suggest.

"Directly people come to stay with me," said a perpetual resident in a delightful house, "and I have duly welcomed them, and given them tea, and sat with them while they unpacked, I find myself wondering what I shall do with them, and why on earth I invited them."

And why on earth did she? And why did they go? Why should it be decreed, when you can live in town at ease by yourself, that directly you get beyond the twelve-mile radius you are bound to give indoor relief to all and sundry, to receive as reward merited much severe criticism and some scant sympathy for your mistakes? Incidentally, too, you may be assured that the fullest appreciation of your misdemeanours will not insure you against the acceptance of your invitation next season. I suspect if the truth were acknowledged it would be found that man would sooner ramble alone, and woman would find it more becoming to rest each Sunday from the week's fatigues. The guest gains as little as the hostess, and is certain only of a change of scene, which must be discounted by the expenditure of energy, a few debts for a few new frocks, and considerable ready money for a few old servants.

The situation is based upon misunderstanding, each party misjudging and being misjudged. This cultivated craze for living in other people's houses or letting them live in yours, this making a fetish of the Friday-to-Monday-away-from-London habit, must be written down amongst the false gods of our idolatry, and should take its place on the list of the white man's burdens.

THE SEASIDE SCHOOL.

At this time of year the parent's fancy, additionally stimulated by poster and railway guide, turns lightly to the seaside girls' school. Scotch people in particular are devoted to the South Coast, largely, I am told, on account of the air and the absence of "burr." At the same time the very advantage of the seaside school over its inland fellows makes on the whole for a less satisfactory education, unless the greatest care is taken in selecting it. I have before me some dozen prospectuses of seaside schools for girls, all known to me more or less personally. All of them, as is natural, since you do not pay high seaside rates for nothing—place ozone and hygiene foremost on the list of their attractions. The parent is liable to fall an easy victim to ozone. Of the schools I have referred to, two alone lay real stress on a stimulating education resulting in girls who would be ill-content to have "finished" at eighteen. Their terms are moderate. A third dwells more on the social aspect, and since education and society, as far as girls are concerned, look upon each other with mutual suspicion, its terms are correspondingly high; the remainder wear uniforms—eminently attractive en masse—bathe, take gentle exercise in the form of work, and inhale ozone. The ideal school is, of course, one which does not divorce education from the social aspect. There is no other reason than convention why the two things should not go hand-in-hand, as they do in the case of boys. Usually head-mistresses are themselves academically inexperienced. Women of the world, with a few notable exceptions, do not take to school-mistressing; while the average school mistress has never had time—or opportunity, since she has to eke out a scanty living—for the acquisition of worldly wisdom. I have never found an ideal seaside school, but I know of a few which approach towards such an ideal. Unless your daughter is unfortunate enough to possess a liver there is no doubt of the hygienic efficacy of Folkestone, Eastbourne, Westgate, and the like. At the same time, though education may begin with ozone, it does not end there, and it is a little hard on girls that because their parents happen to be thoroughly weary of a compassless search for a seaside school, or because they happen to be dumped down in a more healthy place than is their next-door neighbour, they should, therefore, have to forgo in many cases the fundamentals of a good education.

I can only surmise that the lack of business teaching in schools is due to the ignorance of the headmistress of anything but school accounts. Yet there are girls who will eventually have bank books, there are girls upon whose shoulders a good deal of business routine will devolve, and yet who from a whole-hearted ignorance of simple business terms find it difficult, if not impossible, to grasp the simplest business problem. The day is past when one of woman's greatest attractions—and conveniences—was to know nothing of business. Stocks and shares are part of ordinary school routine, though, so far, without any apparent motive of applying them to such commonplaces as rubber or oil. What comes natural to a stupid boy is cause of utmost perplexity to a clever girl, who is forced to assume a stupidity she does not possess, and is too often left wholly unprepared to grapple with problems which the simplest knowledge of business terms should enable her to solve. In many of our colleges a college "Parliament" familiarises its undergraduates with Parliamentary routine; "business practice in schools" could be made equally attractive and even more instructive. Above all, girls should be taught to write—not a dashing letter on lavender paper, but a concise account of any matter in hand—tone, discretion, and judgment to count first.

MRS. A'S DIARY.

Tuesday.—The weather promised not, so I forgot that I had, and ignoring my responsibilities towards Florence's party for Henley Regatta, I took the more amusing path to Lord's. I really enjoyed the 'Varsity match more than usual. I was not so pressed to watch the game, and was able to sit on the lawn, commonly called "The Nursery," while the University babes were fighting well hidden from my view. William was my devoted attendant, and well tempered with tolerance his superiority as an Oxford man feeling quite certain of a win. I gathered from this jargon of cricket shop that twenty of the infants were on a level of skill or mediocrity; the remaining two, Le Couteur and Hooman, represented genius, and could go straight into an England team and play their part. The former, a modest Melbourne Rhodes Scholar, was a finished cricketer before he became an Oxford undergraduate, and Hooman, who is built on Titanic lines, he reported bored with the commonplace, and only doing himself justice when heroic efforts are required or forlorn hopes demand supreme endeavour.

The clothes of the women were not epoch-making, but better than yesterday, so I was told, when they were a fitting or ill-fitting complement to empty secondhand, untenanted landaus and the club tents and arbours, which housed sad-eyed waiters and damp strawberries. But there were a few smart dames about to-day in their new out-of-mourning garments recklessly braving the rain. There were an excellent white cloth coat and skirt of the newest and straightest worn by a young and pretty woman, whose white hair and clear blue eyes recalled the old miniature under its most attractive circumstances. I saw Olive Snell, who is making her name as an illustrator, in biscuit-coloured cloth with cornflowers in her black hat. She was talking to Mr. Duncan Schwann, the writer of the much-talked-of "Book of the Bachelor."

There were flocks of parsons parading in the usual way, and looking but just a year older than in 1909.

The best dress I met was of apricot and white foulard veiled with black chiffon, and worn with a hat encircled with black ostrich feathers. There were numbers of coats and skirts of the new infinitesimally ribbed serge, two in string colour and a third in pale pink being most worthy. The one in pale pink was broadly inset with écru hand-made lace. Pale pink, too, was the colour of a Shantung to whose roseate surface the sun had not been entirely kind; and I suspected it of not being born yesterday.

William when not too instructive was quite pleasant, but to enjoy a cricket match properly I am sure one ought to go with a man who does not really recognise the difference between a ball and a bat. If I am allowed to leave Henley on Thursday night I shall find an uninspired sportsman to conduct me to Eton and Harrow and welcome the dear old glories of Lord's—its coaches, its gaiety, its mountains of lobster salad, its molehills of "form," and its most gorgeous and essential charm of youth, well decked with blue cornflowers or the pale blue tassel.

Wednesday.—I duly arrived at Henley, and was as duly forgiven.

We drove over to the course this morning to find the craft unready even as Ethelred of history, but after the usual amount of fuss and distribution of guests into the two punts and the one canoe we embarked, full of unwise saws and modern instances of the indifferent conduct of the weather, of the insignificance of the attendance, of the comparative absence of the unmysterious musician, and the insular determination to welcome the foreign competitors and despise and detest their chance of victory.

I was placed in the canoe under the charge of Florence's husband, who possesses for the task the sublime virtues of perfect watermanship and a firm belief in the proverb that silence is golden. I had no anxiety about my physical safety, and managed to moderate my transports about the sport, and to use well every opportunity for observing that the company though dull was not small.

The best gown I saw was at Phyllis Court, made of very coarse white Shantung, with a collar of black velvet covered with a frill of Saxe blue chiffon, which again appeared at the wrists. The black hat was lined with blue, chiffon of the same colour being round the crown, and a large bunch of shaded pink chiffon roses and foliage was at one side. There was a pretty little girl in a dinghy wearing a new sort of bonnet made of hem-stitched, kilted muslin with two twists and a big rosette of ribbons shading from pale pink to cerise; but sun-bonnets were quite incongruous, put out of countenance by the clouds. I found Marjorie discussing the final heat of the tea-pot with a becoming masculine crowned with the glory of a blue cap, cross-scull embroidered, and bearing the magic O.U.B.C. in the centre. She was in front of a plateau of strawberries on a pyramid of ice-cream, and wearing a white frock and a bright blue Shantung coat and a Tuscan hat with black ribbons tying a pink rose to its crown. A conspicuous success was achieved with mauve linen crowned with green Tegal hedged with pansies, and a dark blue and white foulard belted with patent leather had charms; and eminently appropriate to time and circumstance were a white dress and tan-tinted knitted coat worn with a liberally wall-flowered hat. Blue serge costumes had many devotees, and the petticoat threaded with ribbon about the knees was an ungraceful object of constant recurrence.

None of the house-boats, save the Shamrock and the Miranda with its red flowers and golden privet, looked very well. There were only a few, and merely used as resting places by day, ships from which we pass in the night, furnished apartments where we feed—and feed well. I was admirable treated on G.'s launch, and in the intervals of being overfed I was fully instructed that it was my duty to-morrow to attend in her interests the London Corset Company's sale at 28, New Bond Street. Here I am to purchase for her a pair of à jour corsets for 31s. 6d., and another pair of thin elastic silk, eminently suited for the tea-gown hour, for the modest sum of 27s. 6d.; and I am to note, for my own benefit, that the Corset Company's extra long corsets have thin elastic gores at the sides, which enable one to sit down in comfort as well as stand at ease with elegance. These, under reduced circumstances, are to be secured for 47s. 3d. She also told me that I must obtain for her a tussore under-petticoat with a scolloped edge with fringe above a kilting, bordered with a frill, for which the price is 25s. 6d.—all too little! But G. cannot tell me anything I do not know about the London Corset Company, for it has always been a favourite shop of mine, yet I let her prattle on, and further inform me that the recent period of national mourning has induced them to part with their stock of coats and skirts and ready-made cotton frocks, embroidered blouses, and the like at prices that may be alarming to the sellers but will prove distinctly soothing to the buyers.

And then the men came to disturb us and to insist that we should go up the course again, while they all explained discursively the victory of Eton over Balliol. I extended my more or less graceful length in a punt after this, and noted at intervals the ugliness of the very narrow skirts and the exceeding becomingness of a dull-red hat trimmed with a bundle of purple irises tied with black velvet, and the happy disuse of extravagant dress and small-boat decoration. Simplicity was the prevailing note, and even the damp and the drizzle did not mar the gorgeousness of the green fields shot with scarlet poppies, which were a riotous exception to the subdued rule of the regatta—socially deceased, yet still lively in its sporting sense.

Saturday.—Robert, whose late immunity from comment in these columns might be tragic were it not for its comic cause, has ventured to protest that indiscretion is my besetting sin, and that to submit unmistakably labelled private occurrences to the public view is a serious drawback to domestic happiness. Nevertheless, he braved the consequences by having tea with me on a coach, which shall therefore be unowned, this afternoon, whence, at the Eton and Harrow match, we watched the dear big boys play cricket, as it is called, and the dear big girls indulge in a pastime recognised as "The Game." All parties were enjoying themselves, and the intervals revealed frocks of the most admirable, of foulard, or Shantung, and ninon, while the tight skirt reigned supreme, and reticence was an unrecognised quality in fashion's programme. Reminiscences were rife, and gossip as popular as lobster salad, while Virginia amused us with an account of the dolls' bazaar at Lansdowne House, where every one who was any one had worn black and pearls, and the elder generation had watched the young sell and barter with much pride and no prejudice.

But the most indifferent awoke to wild enthusiasm over Eton's ultimate and amazing victory, and Manners and Fowler will become as household names, and doubtless their great great-grandsons will be hearkening to the tale of their pluck and prowess when the next century will be dawning over a perfected pitch at Lord's.

Mrs. A.'s Letter-Box.

I have been persuaded to counsel through these columns all wise women who send me their dress difficulties to solve. But their inquiries must be clearly addressed to Mrs. A., "Truth" Office, Carteret Street, S.W.

M. J. B.—Send me one quite small specimen and the price for its making, and I will try and be of use to you in the future if opportunity serves.

Cissy.—I think your description excellent, and should really advise that you take to costume as a serious subject. You may be quite assured that the present method of a tight band above the ankles will not obtain continued favour. Lace stockings are wrong; they should be of the finest gauze silk, all other kinds being now considered quite unworthy of recognition. Hats, too, are not so definitely wide about the shoulders. You must be quite correct in your details if you want to succeed in what I suspect is a new métier.

Gaythorne.—Six and a-half guineas will buy at Jay's sale (or at least they would on Monday) a long linen coat worked à jour, and just the garment for Goodwood—if the weather should justify the prophets. I am very tired of that ankle-bound skirt, and quite confident of its early fall from favour. Yes, do write again.

WORK AND PLAY.

The Anglo-Spanish Tableaux Vivants, which were to have taken place at the Court Theatre on June 24, have been put off till November 17, as several royal personages had promised to attend, and, of course, could not do so, owing to the King's death, until six months later. The tableaux are organised by the Spanish Circle of the Lyceum Club. Costumes are designed by Mr. Heslewood, and Mr. Frank Woolfe, of the Lyric Theatre, is stage manager. The pictures are chosen from English and Spanish history and art, and various well-known Spanish ladies and gentlemen have given their services. Mrs. Kendal will recite, Mme. Blanche Marchesi will sing, and the tableaux will be, as before, under the direct patronage of the Queen of Spain, Princess Louise Duchess of Argyll, Princess Henry of Battenberg, the Spanish Ambassador, the Ministers of Mexico, Brazil, Columbia, Chili, and Nicaragua, the Chargés d'Affaires of Peru, Bolivia, and Guatemala, the Countess Feodora Gleichen, Evelyn Duchess of Wellington, the Duke and Duchess of Wellington, and many others.

The Central Bureau for the Employment of Women now has a regular lecturer, who will visit any schools or institutions for the education of girls and address the students on professions and how to prepare for them, or openings for girls. This seems an admirable move, as very frequently a girl does not think of what she is going to do until she has left school, which is, of course, rather late, and to have the various professions properly put before her must help to make her choice intelligent rather than one of mere inclination.

The woman worker in England has many advocates, and the new societies being founded all over the country to procure better social conditions for women are proof of the fact that, the vote apart, the welfare of women, and consequently of children, is a national pre-occupation at present. The first society to be formed will specialise on matters affecting shop assistants, the support of the wives of the managers of leading shops and other ladies interested in the question to investigate the living-in system and the conditions of work all over England having been obtained.

The unfortunate Baroness de Laroche, the first woman to emulate the fate of Icarus, was not only full of enterprise and pluck, but thoroughly skilled in technical knowledge of her machine. She held the pilot's certificate of the Aero Club of France, being the first woman to obtain it. Her tragic fate, though it is a sad enough warning of the perils of the new sport, need not cause a panic among would-be "air-women," for there is no reason to doubt that she was the victim of the same sort of accidents that have befallen many "air-men." Mlle. Marvingt is the only other woman at present holding the French Aero Club certificate, but there is another competitor for it in Mme. Herven.

Bournemouth, now celebrating its centenary and giving a great display of aviation, is one of the few places which has admitted a woman to the freedom of the borough. Lady (then Mrs.) Russell Cotes received this compliment in acknowledgment of her munificent gift to the town of her private residence, East Cliff Hall, for use as a fine art gallery. Sir Russell Cotes completed the gift by adding the contents of the residence, consisting of paintings, armour, statuary, etc. Lady Russell Cotes, who has travelled extensively with her husband, embodied some of her experiences in a book on Japan entitled "Westward from the Golden Gate," which was printed for private circulation amongst the members and friends of the Japan Society, of which she was elected a member in 1892. She is also a Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature. Sir Merton and Lady Russell Cotes are keeping their golden wedding simultaneously with the municipal festivities at Bournemouth.

MENUS A LA MODE.

Each succeeding season brings its own particular fad in the matters of dinners à la mode. One day people amuse their guests with an "all pink" or an "all white" menu; the next finds them sampling iced soup and sweet potatoes, or calling for sorbet and cigarettes in the middle of the courses. But though the dinner of to-day may differ ever so slightly from the dinner of yesterday, it is just that difference which makes for smartness or dowdiness as the case may be. The fact is that fashions in dining change slowly, but nevertheless they change surely, and intending hostesses will find there is much to learn concerning those special innovations that characterise this year's parties.

The "bridge" influence, which has done so much to shorten our menus, and has mercifully dealt a death blow to the Gargantuan feasts of yesterday, still holds sway. But if modern menus are less elaborate, they are infinitely more refined and far better arranged than of old. Restaurant dining has taught the diners-out not only to expect the best, and nothing but the best, but to see that they get it. The modern hostess finds cooking must come before everything else if she would make her entertainments popular, and she has consequently learned to put quality before quantity. Her task is the easier because the over-elaboration of dishes has declined as well as the number of courses. Everywhere one notices a disposition towards plain fare in place of the sumptuous exaggeration of a generation ago, when a new dish was chiefly valued for the number of its ingredients, like Soyer's famous "hundred-guinea dish," which was served in the year of the great Paris Exhibition.

One peculiarity of modern dinners is a tendency to dispense with the once essential dessert. Fruit, however, figures prominently all through the modern menu. Melon cantaloupe, or chilled peaches in the very pink of perfection, now often take the place of the once favourite mixed hors d'œuvre; while fruit salads are no longer confined to serving slices of oranges with wild duck, which used to exhaust the fruitarian ideas of most cooks. To-day we eat cranberry salads and sauces with all kinds of dishes. We serve lemon sauce in place of stodgy bread poultice with roast chicken, while salads of grape fruit, of bananas, apples, muscat grapes, and melon come to table dressed with a vinaigrette or mayonnaise dressing, and are served with fish, with game, and roast alike. A suspicion of Benedictine or Chartreuse flavours is a characteristic note of the salad dressings of the day, while the same flavours are to be detected in the hot sauces served with ices and cold soufflés—one of the most popular of the latter being hot maple-sugar sauce flavoured with chopped walnuts, which is served with strawberry ice cream. An innovation of this year's strawberry season is the serving of lemon juice and sugar in place of cream when this favourite fruit figures as dessert.

Cold entrées are always acceptable in summer menus, and give a great scope to the artistic gifts of the chef. But care must be exercised not to run the risk of over-doing cold courses, especially if the modern fashion is followed of serving sorbet between the roast and game.

LETTER FROM MADGE.

Dearest Amy,—Since you left us I have been to another sale, and found that the cheapness of the things exceeded far that of the bargains at the ones we attended together. You ought to have stayed in town and gone with me. You could have acquired a hand-embroidered linen costume for a few pence under 30s., well cut, and well finished, and at Sykes-Josephine's, too, where everything is always in such good style. Their sale continues throughout the month, and they have these linen suits in every kind of pretty colour, including white and holland shade. Shantungs, too, are very low-priced, and prettily trimmed foulards would tempt you to the acquisition of a useful and pretty frock. As to blouses, petticoats, and skirts, they are in quantities, all hand-made and all very low-priced. The underwear that has got a little crushed but needs only washing to be all right is being sold at reductions that make it foolish to deny oneself a few sets of these hand-sewn, lace-trimmed luxuries, made of fine lawn or batiste, with tucks and insertion. Princess petticoats in lawn and lace, with hand embroidery, are among these. Tea-jackets and dressing-jackets are marked down, and as to stockings, I have never seen greater variety, the newest being made in black silk with insertions or appliqués of white lace. The sale is attracting the economist to 208, Regent Street. The beautiful knitted silk or lustra coats in white or colours are acquisitions for holiday wear.

Where are you going for a holiday? Why not join us somewhere? We are told that the Peebles Hotel Hydropathic is a pleasant place to stay at. A booklet with illustrations shows the hotel as a lordly building resembling a royal castle, situated on a hill above the very interesting old town, which dates back to mediæval days. There is fishing in the Tweed—salmon, grilse, and trout. There are golf links, and the drives and walks are through pretty scenery. I send you on the little brochure that you may form an opinion for yourself. It would be nice to make a party and stay there in August.

There was plenty of activity at the Botanic on Thursday, when the Women Gardeners' Exhibition was held there. Not only horticulture but agriculture was represented, and there were dairy and poultry exhibits that prove our sex can hold its own in competition with the other. The size of the ducks and chickens prepared for table was surprising, and the live poultry seemed in the best of condition. Demonstrations in boning and trussing fowls were given. They seem difficult things to do, and no doubt these practical lessons are an enormous help. We were shown, too, how to bottle fruit. The plans for laying out gardens were very interesting. A garden on paper is the greatest help to the imagination, even if one should not follow the ideas exactly, but modify them to suit one's circumstances. We admired some of the table decorations, a lovely one consisting of cornflowers, with deep purple pansies.

The exhibition and sale are under the auspices of the Women's Agricultural and Horticultural International Union, and have now for some years been an annual event. Women seem so very much in earnest with their work. At each of the stalls there was some one eagerly explaining everything, quite different to one's usual experience of rather limp young men to whom it seems a trouble to even answer a question.

Sunday last was the Eton-Harrow great day at the Zoo. It is always so on the day following the match of the two schools at Lord's. Fortunately, the weather was fine—that is, there was no rain, though skies were lowering. Our own particular specimen of the genus homo adolescens (he pronounces it "I do lessons") bargained to be taken in time for the delicious Parisian luncheon served in the pretty garden in front of the refreshment bungalow, and he did justice in full to every item of the excellent menu. In particular, he lauded the turbot with Hollandaise sauce, the Chartreuse de fraises, and the coupe Marie-Thérèse, one of the nicest chocolate ices I have ever tasted, and of exactly the creamy consistency that I like, also not too icily frozen. "Jolly good chef they must have here!" was the pronouncement of our fifteen-year-old critic, and he added a word of commendation for the petits fours accompanying the coupe. The young man has a palate. The petits fours were the nicest I ever had. They were so deliciously flavoured with almonds.

I have inquired about the tennis balls, and am told they are excellent though so cheap—only 10s. a dozen. Aline says they are capital balls. The address is Messrs.

Spalding Brothers, Holborn. Let us hope there may be some decent weather for tennis before long. So far, it has been sadly disappointing.

That delicious perfume I sent you, "Shem-el-Nessim," comes from the factory of J. Grossmith and Co., Newgate Street, and is the result of a visit paid to Arabia in search of new scents. It deserves its second name, "A Scent of Araby." The fragrance is the soul of the flower. So remarked Mr. Grossmith to Mr. Stead, who at once replied that the former seemed to him "a kind of floral angel of the Resurrection, custodian of the garnered souls of innumerable flowers."

Winifred writes from Liverpool:—

I hasted from the shadows of blue mountains to tell you something about the Exhibition of Canadian Art which is on view at the Walker Art Gallery. I may just as well tell you that I didn't like coming back. The return is to me the disastrous part of the holidays. We women in these times want always to be going on, never turning back! Llanfair Caerinion, in the heart of Montgomeryshire, is worthy of consideration if you want a holiday among primitive and pastoral things and have a longing for the colitude of mountain tops. On the heights there is the beautiful estate and old family house of Mr. E. R. Pickmere, the Town Clerk of Liverpool. We drove between hedges of honeysuckle and wild roses to Llanerfyl, where we had tea with Mr. James, the rector of the parish, who showed us his quaint old church, which is set in a perfectly round churchyard, a home of halt-forgotten history, filled with stones raised to the memory of the long-dead fathers. Meadows were brocaded with buttercup cloth of gold. Foxgloves, like soldiers in brilliant uniform, lolled against the hedges; gay little blooms of forget-me-nots and speedwell laughed at us from their cosy nooks. The meadow-sweet trailed its laces over the grass. The perfume of the sweet earth lay all around, and in the rain-spangled, transparent day the whole land, hill and stream and wood, lay silver and gold before us. On Sunday we went to church at Llanfair, "shining Llanfair" it is called by the dwellers thereof, because the sun shines fair on roof and gable and grey church tower. We heard the lessons for the day read by a vicar-choral of St. David, a clergyman with a voice of music, who gave lyrical beauty and harmony to the ancient words.

Then I hurried away from this great serenity of living to see what a new land had to offer of an old art. I was much impressed with the quiet, easy manner and the pleasantly toned voice of the Hon. Sydney Fisher, Canadian Minister of Agriculture, who opened the Exhibition. Evidently the pioneers have much to tell us in the way of art, and, as is natural in progressive countries, women hold a high place. The French accent is at once discernible. The repose of British art is lacking. It is romance amid conventions. It gives an individual touch to glimpses of eternal snows, of mountain peaks, of corn in shocks, of forest sanctuaries, of golden days and twilight fields, cloud kingdoms, like and yet unlike to our own pastoral scenes. Mrs. Caldwell, Miss Florence Carlyle, Miss Elizabeth Knowles, Miss Helen McNicoll, Miss Laura Muntz, Miss Mary Reid, Miss Henrietta Shore, Miss Sydney Tully, and Miss Mary E. Wrinch compose the women artists who exhibit paintings in this notable collection. Among the fine portraits is one of Lady ...into by Robert Harris, in which a fair head and complexion, a white gown with a scarf of that indescribable colour of a wave on the turn, are beautifully painted. Mr. John Lea, Mr. Frank Leslie, and Mr. E. Rimbault Dibden, three men who work nobly for art in Liverpool, were present, and among the women I saw several artists. Mrs. Commins, who is one of our most beautiful women, had on a gown of old rose cloth, and a picturesque black hat adorned her white hair. Mrs. Permewan, one of that great Liberal family which has Mrs. E. Stewart Brown, Mrs. Le Gay Solly, and Mr. Max Muspratt among its members, was there, wearing a prettily draped black gown. Mrs. Malandrinos, the wife of the Greek Consul, had a charming young daughter with her.

On Thursday Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Lever gave a reception at the School of Architecture in Liberty Buildings, and Town and Gown met together for music and talk. Mrs. Lever wore a gown of black chiffon and lace and a black picture hat. Professor Reilly, whose arrangements for the reception were altogether most successful, was there, with Mrs. Reilly, who wore a black hat with a mist of gold tissue swathed about it, and a picturesque black gown.

Ever your loving Cousin, MADGE.

ALMAGAM

THE NEW COMPOUND FOR TREATMENT OF RUBBER.

WE ARE RETREADING MOTOR COVERS WITH ALMACAMISED RUBBER AT PRICES ABOUT

60% below usual prices.

88, ARTHUR ROAD,
BRIXTON.

Messrs. THE ALMAGAM CO.

Dear Sirs,

The two covers you retreaded for me with Almagam, at a cost of £1 4s. 8d. each, I am very pleased to say ran exceedingly well. One, which I have now taken off, ran a distance of 2,750 miles, and then the cover burst. The tread was still in good condition, and had the cover not been weak would have had considerably more mileage. The other one I have still on my cab, and it has done 3,050 miles, and looks fit to run the same distance again. This distance is registered by my taximeter, as you know I run these tyres on my taxicab. I have recommended several of my friends to you who have taxicabs, and I hope they will have as good luck as I have had myself. I will call and fetch the other two tyres when I am in your district.

Yours truly,

W. J. DEAN.

ISSUE AT PAR OF £1,250,000 FIVE PER CENT. DEBENTURE STOCK.

This Stock forms part of an authorised issue of £1,500,000, which is equal to the present paid-up Capital of the Company, ranking subject to and immediately after the 4½ per cent. First Debenture Stock of the Company. The Company was established by Royal Charter granted in 1839, and the Stock is created under powers conferred on the Company by a subsequent Royal Charter dated 7th March, 1882, and will be secured by a Trust Deed in favour of Trustees giving a charge by way of floating security upon the entire property and assets of the Company subject only to the charge thereon created by a Deed of Trust dated the 27th November, 1907 for securing the First Debenture Stock of the Company for the time being issued which is not to exceed in amount two-thirds of the paid-up Capital for the time being of the Company. The Trust Deed will contain a provision prohibiting the Company from specifically mortgaging or charging any of its ships in priority to the Debenture Stock. The right is reserved to the Company, should it at any time issue any further Capital, of creating and issuing from time to time further First Debenture Stock, ranking pari passu with the existing First Debenture Stock and in priority to this Stock to an amount equal to two-thirds of such further Capital for the time being paid up, and also of creating and issuing from time to time further Debenture Stock carrying interest at such rate as may be agreed, ranking in all respects pari passu with this Stock, to a total (inclusive of the present issue) not exceeding the paid-up Capital for the time being of the Company. After 1st January, 1918 the whole or any part of the Debenture Stock is redeemable at par at the Company's option at any time on six calendar months' notice to the Stockholders.

Payable by instalments as follows:—£5 per cent. on Application; £20 per cent. on Allotment; £75 per cent. on 22nd September, 1910=£100.

The Stock will be issued and will be transferable in any amounts not involving fractions of £1.

Interest on the Stock will be payable half-yearly on 1st January and 1st July in each year; the first payment of interest calculated from the dates for payment of the several instalments will be made on the 1st January, 1911.

Payment in full can be made on Allotment or at any time prior to 22nd September, in which case interest on the full amount of Stock allotted will run from the date of payment.

Scrip Certificates will be issued as soon as possible after allotment.

PROSPECTUS.

The Court of Directors of THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY have authorised Messrs. Robarts, Lubbock and Co. and the National Provincial Bank of England, Limited, and Branches, as Bankers of the Company to receive applications for £1,250,000 of the above Five per Cent. Debenture Stock of the Company.

The Bank of Liverpool, Limited, and Branches, as Bankers of THE PACIFIC STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, are also authorised to receive applications for this issue.

The Company was established by Royal Charter in 1839, and its powers have been extended by subsequent Royal Charters granted in the years 1851, 1882, and 1904. Under the supplemental Royal Charter of 1904 it is stipulated as a cardinal principle of the Company that it is to be and remain under British Control.

The Company's Fleet consists of 45 steam vessels with an approximate aggregate gross registered tonnage of 193,000 tons. There are also steam tugs and launches and freehold and leasehold properties at home and abroad.

The Company has recently entered into an agreement for the purchase at par of almost the whole (say 98 per cent.) of the fully paid shares forming the £1,477,125 Capital of the P.S.N. Co., which was incorporated by Royal Charter in 1840. This Company has accumulated Reserves amounting to £460,000, and has no Debentures or Preference Shares. It owns 40 steam vessels having an approximate aggregate gross registered tonnage of 177,000 tons besides other property. The combined Fleet of the two Companies will consist of 85 steamers having an approximate tonnage of 370,000 tons.

The property of the R.M.S.P. Co., upon which the Five per Cent. Debenture Stock will constitute a floating charge (subject only to the Trust Deed securing the First Debenture Stock), consists of the Fleet of Steam Vessels, Properties, and Plant at home and abroad, Stocks, Shares, Investments, and other Assets, standing in the books of the Company on 31st December, 1909, at the reduced book value of £3,320,088, inclusive of payments already made on account of new tonnage. To this must be added the shares of the P.S.N. Co. agreed to be acquired at a cost of about £1,450,000.

After providing for depreciation of the Fleet and Property, but before making transfers to Reserve and Insurance Funds, the profits of the R.M.S.P. Co. for the year ended 31st December, 1909, amounted to £177,942 14s. 7d. The amount required to pay the annual interest on the existing £1,000,000 First Debenture Stock is £45,000. The amount required to pay the annual interest on the present issue is £62,500, so that apart from the Revenue to be derived from the Pacific Steam Navigation Co.'s Shares, the average dividend on which for the past fifteen years has amounted to £73,856 per annum, the present issue is well secured

The opening of the Transandine Tunnel and the rapid development of Chile, Argentina, and Brazil point to an increased traffic with South America, and by effecting a community of interest between the two Companies a costly competition between them for this traffic will be avoided. Considerable economies in working should also result from the fusion.

The R.M.S.P. First Debenture Stock is quoted on the London Stock Exchange at a substantial premium. An official quotation for the present issue will be applied for in due course.

A brokerage of 5s. per cent. will be paid by the Company in respect of all allotments made to the public on application forms bearing a Broker's stamp.

Applications should be made on the Form of Application issued with the Prospectus and should be forwarded to the Bankers accompanied by a deposit of Five per cent. on the amount applied for.

A copy of the Royal Charter granted to the R.M.S.P. Co., 26th September, 1839, and of the further Royal Charters granted in 1851, 1882, and 1904, and a draft of the Trust Deed for securing the Debenture Stock, and of a letter to the Company from Messrs. Snell and Swaffield, dated 7th July, 1910, agreeing to guarantee the subscription of the present issue, in consideration of a commission of Three per cent., may be seen at the offices of the Company's Solicitors, Messrs. Bristows, Cooke and Carpmael, 1, Copthall Buildings, E.C., on any day while the subscription list remains open between the hours of 11 a.m. and 4 p.m.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application may be obtained at the offices of the Company, 18 and 57, Moorgate Street, E.C., 32, Cockspur Street, S.W., and at Southampton, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, and Glasgow, or from the Bankers, or from Messrs. Snell and Swaffield, 5, Copthall Buildings, E.C.

PROSPECTUS.

The Company has been formed to acquire the Princess May Claim, Skeena District, one of the first gold mining claims staked out on the Marmot River, near Stewart, in the Bitter Creek locality, British Columbia, where the recent gold discoveries have been made, which are generally described in the published reports as the greatest of modern times.

The Bitter Creek District is situate at the mouth of Bear River, at the head of Portland Canal, about sixty miles from the sea, and about eighty miles from Prince Rupert Island, with which it is in communication by steamer. A branch of the Canadian Northern Railway is about to be constructed up the creek, and it is anticipated that it will be completed in the course of the present year.

In 1909, the district was visited by Mr. R. W. Brock, the Director of the Canadian Geological Survey. In his report Mr. Brock states that throughout the entire length of the coast range in Northern British Columbia, areas occur which will probably be found attractive to the prospector, and that such an area exists in the Bear River District. He further states that arrangements have been made to build the "Portland Canal Short Line Railway" from Portland Canal up Bear River for a distance of 15 miles, by men interested in the Canadian Northern Railway Company, and it is expected that the road will be in operation during the present summer.

The four claims referred to below in Mr. Heming's letter, which are each 1,500 feet square, or over 50 acres in extent, and one of which the Company is formed to acquire, were staked out during the present year by prospectors (the discoverers) who were sent to investigate the mineral-bearing properties of the district by Mr. H. P. Heming, a well-known resident of British Columbia. It is largely due to the discoveries made by these prospectors that public attention has recently been so prominently directed to this district. No rent is payable to the Government.

In a letter dated 15th June, 1910, addressed to the Vendor, Mr. Heming states:—

"If you remember, I told you I had to be here to meet my prospectors that had been prospecting for several months. Yesterday they returned with wonderful tales of a strike they had made on Marmot River, Portland Canal District, B.C. Magee, my foreman, says that they prospected up this river about seven miles from the head of Portland Canal, and were the first white people in that district. He staked four claims, over a mile long, and averaging about 2,000 feet high, 1,500 feet wide. When he returned to Portland Canal and had his samples assayed news of his find spread, and now thousands are prospecting near my claims. He says it is really a most wonderful find and that hundreds of years could not exhaust the ore, which is silver and gold, and, we believe, free milling; it is not certain until we get inside. . . . . He assures me this find will surprise the world for richness and magnitude. He has staked and recorded these four claims for me, and was the first to stake claims there, so that there can be no dispute as to ownership. I hold the Mining Recorder's receipts. All that remains to be done is the survey and development work to secure the Crown grant. . . . . I really believe that it will produce millions, and probably it will not require much capital to work. This should be a mine after the Mount Morgan style, but many times larger, owing to its great height. . . .

"Please don't think I am carried away with wild cat information. I have the ore values, and vast mountains of it. Portland Canal District is a wonder, and no mistake."

Referring to the Bear Creek District in an article published in the "Canadian Mining Journal," of the 15th April, 1910, Mr. W. W. Rush, a well-known mining expert, states that the natural conditions are on the whole by no means unfavourable to mining operations. Timber and water power are abundant. Owing to the influence of the sea, winters are less severe than in many districts of the States. Several steamship companies will each provide regular service between Vancouver and Stewart this summer, and local boats will leave Prince Rupert almost daily. Food, fuel and water are abundant, and there will be no hardships comparable to those encountered in the desert camps or in the frozen Yukon.

As will be seen by Mr. Heming's letter, he believes the property will produce a very large return, that it will not require much capital to work, and suggests a working capital of £20,000 as sufficient for the development of the four claims which he has acquired.

As the prospectors employed by Mr. Heming had the choice of the whole district in which to locate the claims, the Directors anticipate that events will show that the claim to be acquired by the company is one of the most valuable in the district.

The Directors propose to proceed at once with the survey and development work necessary in order to obtain the Crown grant, which can be done for a small expenditure, and in due course to dispatch machinery to the property so that the Company's operations may be commenced as speedily as possible. The working capital to be provided by this issue, when subscribed, should be ample to cover the cost of the necessary development work and the provision of machinery.

The following are extracts from a few of the large number of Press references which have recently appeared in all parts of the world concerning this new gold discovery:—

"The Times," June 25th, 1910.

GOLD DISCOVERY IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.
(From Our Own Correspondent, Toronto, June 24.)

The Grand Trunk Pacific engineers report in the neighbourhood of Stewart, B.C., a remarkable discovery of quartz reef gold. They say that a thousand stamps could be worked for a hundred years on ground they have traversed, and scarcely mark the reef, which is many miles in extent, and in places more than 2,000 ft. high. There is, they report, a great mountain range of ore, and great porphyry dykes extend through the reef, and between them lies ore from 30 ft. to 1,000 ft. wide. The engineers declare that this will prove to be the greatest mineral discovery ever made.

"Daily Telegraph," June 27th, 1910.

GOLD IN CANADA.
MOUNTAIN OF ORE.
GREAT FIND REPORTED.

Writing on June 15, the Toronto correspondent of the Central News gives the following details concerning a great discovery of gold in British Columbia:

It is announced from Vancouver that rumours of a big strike of gold at Bitter Creek, seventeen miles from Stewart City, have been confirmed.

The gold reef has been traced twenty miles, and that was not the end of it. The discoverer describes it as a "range of gold," not a "mountain," and ore free milling samples have gone from twenty to fifty-nine dollars a ton.

The Toronto Globe's correspondent adds: "There is said to be enough ore in sight to keep a thousand stamp mills going for a quarter of a century."

The "Daily Mail," June 28th, 1910.

GOLD IN CANADA
RUSH TO THE STEWART DISTRICT.
(From Our Own Correspondent.)

VANCOUVER (British Columbia), Monday.

The reported discovery of a vein of free milling ore twenty-three miles in extent in the Stewart district, which is creating an unusual amount of interest, is stimulating the "rush" which had already set in for this territory.

The "Financial Times," June 29th, 1910.

The richest strike was made in the last week in May. It was a solid vein, 24 ft. thick, 200 ft. below the surface, and when opened it "glittered like a jeweller's shop window" with free milling gold, native silver, and other native ores. Mr. Stewart thoroughly believes the cabled reports, as he knew the district abounded in gold.

"The Times," July 1st, 1910.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

TORONTO, June 30.

The excitement is compared to that engendered by the Klondyke "boom" 13 years ago.

Reports state that a single property has shown £5,000,000 worth of ore, and that another possesses enough to keep a mine working for half a century. All these facts are emphasised in a special letter from Prince Rupert in the Toronto Globe to-day.

The "Evening News," July 1st, 1910.

Reports state that a single property has shown £5,000,000 worth of ore, and that another possesses enough to keep a mine working for half a century.

"Lloyd's Weekly News," July 3rd, 1910.

Amazing stories have been circulated as to the enormous wealth of the strike. The golden reef is said to be 1,000 ft. wide, and 2,000 ft. high, and the ore to assay as much as £12 a ton.

The engineers of the Grand Trunk Railway, who have been investigating the field, describe the find as the greatest mineral discovery ever made, and state that a thousand stamps could be worked for a hundred years on the reef, which is more than twenty miles in extent.

The "Portland Canal Miners" (Canada), June 10th, says:—

A mammoth gold reef, unknown extent, but which can be traced almost for twenty miles, lies at Stewart's very door, and, according to the miners who are there, it is the greatest free milling reef ever discovered in the North, and perhaps in the world. The discoverers are certain that they have found the reef from which the streams hereabouts obtain their gold deposits, and which has for ages been supplying gold to the famous Unak river and the Alaskan creeks.

The purchase consideration to be paid by the Company to Henry Walter, of Frogmore, near St. Albans, Herts (the Vendor to and Promoter of the Company, who pays all preliminary expenses up to the first allotment of Shares, excluding brokerage), is £80,000, payable as to £10,000 in cash, as to £10,000 in fully-paid Shares of the Company or in cash, at the option of the Company, and as to £60,000 by the allotment of 600,000 fully-paid Shares of the Company. Mr. Walter will, out of such purchase consideration, procure 360,000 shares to be allotted to Mr. Heming, of 1175, Fort Street, Victoria, B.C., and 40,000 shares to be allotted to Mr. Magee, of the same address.

The preliminary expenses are estimated at £3,000.

The minimum subscription upon which the Directors may proceed to allotment has been fixed by the Articles of Association at the nominal amount of seven shares, but the Directors will not proceed to allotment unless 150,000 shares of this issue are subscribed.

A contract dated 11th July, 1910, has been entered into between the Vendor and the Company.

The qualification of every Director is the holding of 1,000 shares in the Company.

The Articles of Association dealing with the Directors' remuneration are as follows:—

The Directors shall be paid out of the funds of the Company by way of remuneration for their services as follows, viz.:—Each Director other than the Chairman shall receive £200 per annum, and the Chairman shall receive £300 per annum, and the Directors shall also receive by way of additional remuneration in each year such further sum as may be equal to 2½ per cent. of the net profits of the Company in that year, after allowing for all outgoings and providing for depreciation, but without deducting any sum carried to reserve or carried forward, and such additional remuneration shall be divided among them as they shall by majority determine. All remuneration under this clause shall be deemed to accrue de die in diem. The Company in General Meeting may increase the amount of such remuneration either permanently or for a year or longer period.

The Board may do the following things:—

(a) Establish local boards, local managing or consulting committees, or local agencies in the United Kingdom or abroad, and appoint any one or more of their number or any other person or persons to be Members thereof, with such powers and authorities, under such regulations, for such period, and at such remuneration as they may deem fit, and may from time to time revoke any such appointment.

(b) Appoint from time to time any one or more of their number to be Managing Director or Managing Directors on such terms as to remuneration, and with such powers and authorities, and for such period as they deem fit, and may revoke such appointment.

(c) Grant to any Director required to go abroad or to render any other extraordinary service such special remuneration for the services rendered as they think proper.

A brokerage at the rate of 1½ per cent. will be paid by the Company on Shares applied for and allotted on applications identified as coming through Brokers and approved Agents.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application may be obtained from the Bankers, Brokers, and Solicitors, and at the Offices of the Company.

Dated 12th July, 1910.

A Prospectus has been filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, which states among t other things that:—

The SUBSCRIPTION LIST will OPEN on WEDNESDAY, the 13th day of July, and will CLOSE on or before THURSDAY, the 14th day of July, 1910.

100,000 Shares having been underwritten, the Directors will proceed to allotment immediately after the closing of the List of Subscriptions.

This Company has been formed with the objects contained in its Memorandum of Association and in particular for the purpose of exploiting extensive areas of Rubber-bearing land in the Colony of Natal, consisting of:—

(a) A concession granted by the Government of the Colony of Natal for the sole right for twenty-five years from the 12th October, 1908, to exploit and collect the Indigenous Vine Rubber over two areas of respectively about 60,000 acres and about 378,000 acres in Amatongaland.

(b) 5,000 acres (more or less) of carefully selected fertile land suitable for Rubber cultivation, situate in the district of Ubombo, Amatongaland, Natal, held under lease from the Government of Natal for 99 years from the 28th February, 1907. On this area there are already planted 19,000 Hevea trees, about two years old, in a good state of cultivation

The Company will also acquire under license from the owners of the patents the right to use the machine invented by Mr. Leon Guiguet, of Lyons, for extracting Rubber direct from the vines, which, as will be seen from the reports referred to below, are to be found on the above areas in great abundance.

Owing to the small amount of latex recoverable by native methods, the production of Vine Rubber has hitherto been a comparatively neglected industry, but by the employment of this machine, which extracts practically the whole of the Rubber from the bark, it is anticipated that Rubber produced from this source will eventually prove an important factor in the world's supply. The machine has already been adopted by other companies for the purpose of treating the vines in the forests of Madagascar and Portuguese East Africa, and is specially designed for easy transport by mule or coolie into the heart of the forests, so that the vines can be treated on the spot, thus effecting a great saving in transport and freight.

The Concessions which the Company will acquire have been most exhaustively reported upon by the Tongaland Rubber Commission (1901), and by the Conservator of Forests for Natal in 1902, 1903, and 1904, and the following extracts are taken from the various reports (full copies of which can be seen at the offices of the Solicitors of the Company).

"The Ibungu Vine is to be found in practically every bush or forest throughout Tongaland (and is believed to be the Landolphia Kirkii). . . . There is little doubt, in the opinion of the Commission, that in its present state the Government have in Tongaland and a portion of the Ubombo District a rich untouched rubber field."

"The Mangusi Forest . . . contains splendid high well-grown timber, and is the largest forest in this part of Zululand . . . It contains most Landolphia, and has several fine streams of very good water running through it. No forest I have ever seen yet contains so many Landolphia plants as this Mangusi bush, which is rich in Rubber; practically not worked at all. . . . Ubombo is within a few miles of the Mkosi River Forest, which contains, according to the reports of my native guides, far more Rubber than any other Forest. . . . A Rubber Vine of ordinary middle size 2½ inches in diameter, will give, if not previously tapped within 12 months 4 ozs. of dry Rubber." (This is by native methods only.)

Captain Alan Cameron, M.M., R.N.R., the well-known explorer, reports as a result of an expedition made through Tongaland occupying over a month that "the Ibungu is found practically all over Tongaland and grows in such quantities that it would be impossible to correctly estimate the number of Vines, but the lowest computation would be from about 70 going up to 300 to the acre." "The larger portion of the Mangusi Forest is situated in No. 14 Reservation. The Mkosi is situate round Kosi Bay. These forests and those round St. Lucia Lakes and in the Coast belt all contain this Vine in huge quantities. The Concession in Reserves Nos. 1 and 14 contains about 30 to 40 per cent. of forest land. The Vine is also found in lesser numbers in the trees and bushes over practically the whole of the more open country." He states that this Vine, "in its natural state should prove to be a valuable rubber producer, and, properly handled, should make a paying industry for years to come." He further reports that "the prospects of any Company planting Rubber in Tongaland are exceedingly good, as beyond the small Native collection it is hardly touched, and with proper care and cultivation nearly the whole country should prove a very rich property and compete with any other rubber bearing district in the world, both in quality and quantity of production. As, however, the Vines are full of latex, the bark of a ten-year-old Vine containing 2 to 3 lb. of Rubber, if this can be properly extracted by the Guiguet machine, the report of which I have only just seen, the production could be enormously increased, and quite apart from planting, Vine Rubber alone should prove a source of good profit, your territory being richer in wild Rubber than the fields explored by me in West and Central Africa and South America." Captain Cameron reports that labour is plentiful and cheap, about 15s. per month per head with food, which should be grown on the Company's plantations.

From tests made with the Guiguet machine in Lyons, it has been proved that the amount of Rubber extracted from vines shows a large increase as compared with the amount extracted by native methods.

Mr. William Chaplin, who is managing the business of the Madagascar Rubber Company, Limited, in that country, has estimated that on a conservative basis an average of one kilo (about 2 1-5th lb.) of dry Rubber can be extracted by the machine from the bark of each ten-year-old vine.

Messrs. Baillie and Dobree, of 82, Victoria Street, S.W., who inspected the Guiguet plant at Lyons in March last, report that:—

"The machine can extract over 90 per cent. of the Rubber in the bark. . . . . The use of the Guiguet machine will enable about ten times the value of Rubber to be obtained from 100 kilos of bark as now obtained by native treatment."

Taking a moderate estimate of 50 vines to the acre as compared with Mr. Chaplin's estimate of 80 per acre in Madagascar, there should be produced from each 1,000 acres of forest about 100,000 lb. of Rubber. It is calculated that one Guiguet extracting machine, the cost of which is approximately £650, can treat 250 acres per annum, and it is proposed to order in the first instance twenty of these machines, which it is estimated will be sufficient to treat 5,000 acres per annum and thus produce 500,000 lb. of Rubber.

Messrs. Baillie and Dobree have estimated the cost of extracting Rubber from the cut vine to be 4½d. per lb. Practical experience in Madagascar has proved that bark can be obtained in large parcels from the natives at an inclusive cost of 2 centimes per kilo, or less than one-tenth of 1d. per lb. The Directors therefore estimate that 1s. 6d. per lb. will amply cover the total cost of production, c.i.f. London, including all local and administration expenses, royalties and depreciation of plant. Arrangements have been made to secure the services of Mr. A. Braddon Davies, who has had several years' experience as a Government official in the organisation of native labour in this territory, and who has resigned his position with the object of placing his services at the disposal of this Company. He is on particularly friendly terms with the native chiefs, and states that his arrangements with them will ensure a plentiful supply of cheap and effective labour.

On the above basis the annual profits have been calculated as follows:—

|---|---|
| By sale of 500,000 lb. of Rubber at 4s. per lb. net ..... | £100,000 |
| Less cost of production at 1s. 6d. per lb. ..... | £37,500 |
| Net profit..... | £62,500 |

The above profits are based on working 5,000 acres per annum, but with the employment of a larger number of machines it will be possible to work a larger area with a consequent increase of profits.

The minimum subscription provided by the Articles of Association upon which the Directors may proceed to allotment is 80,000 shares, but as 100,000 shares have been underwritten the Company will proceed to allotment immediately after the closing of the lists.

Of the above amount, after payment of the cash portion of the purchase consideration, the preliminary expenses, underwriting commission, and brokerage, which are payable by the Company, about £40,000 will be available for working capital, which, in the opinion of the Directors, is ample for the purpose. In addition 20,000 shares are in reserve for future issue.

A brokerage of 6d. per share will be paid by the Company on shares applied for and allotted on applications identified as coming through brokers and approved agents other than applications from underwriters.

If no allotment is made the deposit will be returned in full. If the number of shares allotted is less than that applied for, the surplus paid on application will be credited to the amount due on allotment and the balance (if any) returned. Failure to pay any instalment will render all previous instalments liable to forfeiture.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Shares can be obtained at the offices of the Company or from the Bankers, Brokers, or Solicitors.

SECRETARIES AND OFFICES.

BRITISH NORTH BORNEO RUBBER TRUST, LIMITED, 104, Winchester House, London, E.C.

This Company has been formed with the objects mentioned in the Memorandum of Association, but primarily for the purpose of acquiring the following Para Rubber Plantations and Lands particularly favourably situated at Trong on the Government Road from Taiping, in the State of Perak, Federated Malay States:—

|---|---|
| St. John's Estate .. .. .. .. | 1,190 acres. |
| St. Patrick's Estate.. .. .. .. | 1,042 ,, |
| St. Andrew's Estate.. .. .. .. | 1,100 ,, |
| Adjoining area .. .. .. .. | 2,000 ,, |
| Total .. .. .. | 5,332 ,, |

AREA PLANTED.

Of this total some 1,820 acres have been planted with 351,060 Para Rubber (Hevea Braziliensis) and 170 acres cleared ready for planting. Considerable further clearing is in progress, and it is estimated, with the extensions intended, that there will be, during the course of the current year, about 2,290 acres under Rubber, with a total of approximately 422,160 Para trees. There are also 500,000 Para stumps in good condition in the nurseries six months old.

SITUATION.

The St. John's Estate at Trong is situate about twelve miles from Taiping, which is about three hours by train from Penang. A Government road in excellent repair leads up to the Estate, which has a good road frontage. St. Patrick's Estate also has a large road frontage and adjoins St. John's. St. Andrew's Estate is situated on the opposite side of the road. The St. John's and St. Andrew's Estates are at present owned by Mr. Alexander Rose, of St. John's Rubber Plantation, Trong, Taiping, Perak. The St. Patrick's Estate is owned in equal shares by Mr. Alexander Rose, Mr. John Leslie Rose, of St. John's Rubber Plantation aforesaid, Mr. Angus Rose, of Amo Tea Estate, Chandpur, Bazar, Sylhet, Assam, Mr. Patrick James Macdonald, of Messrs. Duncan Bros. & Co., Post Box 189, Calcutta, and Mr. William Macdonald, of Koomber Tea Estate, Kumbhir, P.O. Cachar, India.

TENURE.

The title to the above-mentioned three Estates is direct from the Government of the Federated Malay States under perpetual lease, subject to an annual quit-rent of One dollar per acre, increasing to Four dollars per acre, on the usual terms. The further area of 2,000 acres has been offered by Government to Mr. Alexander Rose, who has accepted it, and has agreed to transfer the grant, when issued, on payment of the usual Government fees of survey, etc., only.

MANAGEMENT.

The Estates have been opened up, planted and maintained under the care of the present owners. It is believed that arrangements can be made for a continuity of the existing management.

The statements in the Prospectus are mainly based upon the cabled Reports of Mr. Thomas Boyd, General Manager of the Gula-Kalumpong Rubber Estates, Limited, and President of the Malay Peninsula Agricultural Association, dated the 13th, 17th, 24th June, and 6th July, 1910, who visited the Estates in the early part of June at the request of Messrs. Sandilands, Buttery & Co., on instructions from London.

PARA RUBBER.

| Acres. | Age from date of Planting out. | Approximate Number of Trees. |
|---|---|---|
| 500 .. | 3 to 3½ years .. .. .. .. | 141,700 |
| 30 .. | 2 years .. .. .. .. | 6,540 |
| 490 .. | 1½ years .. .. .. .. | 77,620 |
| 600 .. | 1 year .. .. .. .. | 87,000 |
| 200 .. | 6 months .. .. .. .. | 38,800 |
| 170 .. | cleared and about to be planted with | 25,500 |
| | Total .. .. .. | 377,160 Para Trees. |

The ages given above are from date of planting out stumps.

The area under cultivation is planted as follows: — 150 acres 10×10, 470 acres 20×10, 1,000 acres 20×15, 200 acres 15×15.

Tapping has commenced on the St. John's Estate and a recent consignment of Rubber to London from that Estate was sold at the price of 12s. 4d. per pound, indicative of the excellent quality of the Rubber produced.

The Directors contemplate extending the present cultivated area by planting 300 acres with Para in 1910/11, say 45,000 trees, and a similar area in 1911/12, when some 2,590 acres would be under Rubber, with approximately a total of 467,000 Para trees.

Without including the produce from the trees now being planted and the extensions contemplated Mr. Boyd estimates the yield of Rubber for the five years from September next as follows:—

| 1st year. | 2nd year. | 3rd year. | 4th year. | 5th year. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1910/11. | 1911/12. | 1912/13. | 1913/14. | 1914/15. |
| 55,000 lbs. | 100,000 lbs. | 175,000 lbs. | 250,000 lbs. | 280,000 lbs. |

The present price of Fine Plantation Para Rubber is about 9s. per pound, while the cost of production and marketing the Rubber may be taken at about 1s. 6d. per pound.

Mr. Boyd has taken as the basis for his valuation a net profit of 4s. 6d.—4s.—3s.—2s. and 2s. per pound Rubber for the next five years respectively.

Additions to the labour force, which is at present inadequate, are shortly expected.

The whole area is excellent for the cultivation of Rubber. The trees are doing well and are of vigorous growth.

VALUATION.

Mr. Boyd values the properties, including the above-mentioned 2,000 additional acres, at the sum of £170,250, after making allowance for weeding, which he states to be necessary.

It will be noticed that the Vendors take the main portion of the purchase consideration in fully paid Shares of the Company.

WORKING CAPITAL.

After payment of the purchase consideration, the underwriting commissions and the preliminary expenses hereinafter mentioned, the sum of £25,000 will be available out of the proceeds of this issue as Working Capital and for the general purposes of the Company.

PURCHASE CONSIDERATION.

Under the Agreement (3) the T.P. Plantations, Limited, of 84/86, Winchester House, London, E.C. (the Vendors to and Promoters of the Company) have agreed to sell to the Company the above-mentioned Estates for the sum of £159,000, payable as to £55,500 in cash and as to £103,500 in fully paid Shares of the Company. The T.P. Plantations, Limited, has the right to apply for and have allotted to itself or its nominees at par so many up to 150,000 of the unissued Shares of the Company at any time within three years from the date of the incorporation of the Company.

ABRIDGED REPORT OF THE DIRECTORS for the Year ended 31st December, 1909.

ACCOUNTS.

The Working Profit for the year ended 31st December, 1909, amounted to £500,339 2s. 7d., which, added to the balance of unappropriated profit brought forward from 1908 of £59,551 4s. 9d., makes a total available profit of £559,890 7s. 4d. Out of this will be paid Dividend No. 5 of 15 per cent. on 1,874,000 (Ordinary) Shares, absorbing £281,100, and Dividend of £31 6s. 8d. per Share on 1,000 Founders' Shares, absorbing £31,333 6s. 8d., or a total distribution of £312,433 6s. 8d. After deducting extra remuneration payable to Directors and officials there is a balance of unappropriated profit to be carried forward to 1910 of £213,802 9s.

The usual practice has been followed of taking the Share and Stock holdings into the Balance Sheet either at cost or at the Stock Exchange making up prices current at the date the accounts were made up, whichever is the lower. The book cost of the share investments is considerably less than the market prices at the date of the accounts, but of this unrealised profit no account has been taken and in no case has an asset been written up. There is also a considerable appreciation in the value of mining claims above the cost at which they stand in the books.

GOLD MINING COMPANIES MANAGED BY THE CORPORATION.

The operations of the producing mines under the control of the Corporation show continued expansion and improved results. Collectively, the seven mines (the Meyer & Charlton, New Goch, Roodepoort United, Van Ryn, Aurora West, Cinderella Deep, and West Rand Consolidated) crushed 1,550,780 tons of ore, yielding gold and other revenue to the amount of £2,148,498, for a gross profit of £773,008. At the end of the past year 745 stamps were running, as compared with 655 in December, 1908. The total working expenditure of these seven mines for the year under report was £1,375,490, equal to 17s. 9d. per ton crushed, as compared with 18s. 2d. for the previous year, 21s. 5d. for 1907, and 23s. 1d. per ton for 1906. The payable ore reserves at the 31st December last amounted in the aggregate to 3,869,745 tons of an average assay value of 6·4 dwts. per ton. The Meyer & Charlton declared dividends for the year amounting to £65,000, or 45 per cent. on the issued capital; the Van Ryn distributed £225,000, representing 45 per cent. for the year; the Roodepoort United declared dividends amounting to £80,500, equal to 17½ per cent. on the increased capital of the Company; the New Goch declared its first dividend of 10 per cent., absorbing £55,000; and the West Rand Consolidated also declared its first dividend of 3¾ per cent., amounting to £74,228. The net profits earned during the year by the two remaining producing mines—the Cinderella Deep and the Aurora West—were expended on additions to their respective surface equipments.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed to acquire the extensive freehold Forest Estates, "Campo Colorado," "Santa Clara," "Valle Morado," and "El Potrero," situated in the provinces of Jujuy and Salta, in the Argentine Republic, together with private railways, rolling stock, saw mill, stock of timber, live stock, etc., and to take over, as a going concern, the timber business now carried on by Mr. Pablo Denti, as from the 1st July, 1910.

REPORTS ON ESTATES AND TIMBER.

The properties have been inspected and reported upon by Mr. Philip V. Davies, who has had a long experience in saw milling and the timber business generally. Mr. Davies formerly represented Messrs. Millars' Karri and Jarrah Company (1902), Limited, in India and the Far East, and went to South America to make the necessary investigations on behalf of the South American Estates, Limited (the Vendors to this Company), of which he is a Director and a Shareholder.

The following extracts are taken from the Report addressed by Mr. Davies to the Directors of this Company, under date of 24th June, 1910, copy of which report accompanies this prospectus:—

"The 'Campo Colorado,' 'Santa Clara,' and 'Valle Morado' Estates form one compact block of about 125,000 acres of freehold land and the 'El Potrero' Estate comprises about 12,000 acres of freehold land. The total area therefore exceeds 214 square miles. The National Railway passes through the 'Campo Colorado' Estate and the 'El Potrero' Estate, affording railway communication to the principal towns in Argentina. The Estate frontages to the railway are about six miles in length, one each side of the line."

"The present owner has recently erected at Yuto Railway Station a large saw mill, fully equipped with modern machinery (which is now at work), an hotel and general store, a manager's bungalow, and workmen's dwellings."

"There are ten miles of private Decauville railway, equipped with locomotives, rolling stock, etc."

TIMBER.

"The first three properties mentioned are practically all virgin forests, and I estimate the land contains 1,250,000 loads of good sound timber, easy of access and transport."

"The principal woods are Cedar, Quebracho, Urendel, Lapacho, Oak, and several others of good marketable value."

"The trees attract particular attention owing to their height, straightness, and uniformity of size."

VALUE OF ASSETS.

"The total amount, £65,476, which has been expended on the development of the properties up to the present is, in my opinion, well represented."

FUTURE DEVELOPMENTS.

"For future development I recommend the erection of another Saw Mill, with a capacity of about 20,000 loads per annum, so as to bring the total output of the two mills up to about 30,000 loads per annum."

"With a total yearly output of 30,000 loads, for which I estimate 45,000 loads of logs will be required, you will have 27 years cutting."

PROFITS ON TIMBER.

"Calculating the manufacturing profit at £2 per load, which is considerably under profits realised at present, the existing plant is capable of earning an annual profit of £24,000, and with the completion of the new mill the plant should be capable of earning £60,000. The firewood business is also an important source of revenue, and in this direction I consider it quite safe to calculate ultimately upon a yearly profit of £3,000. With the additional mill the total selling profit on the timber and firewood should not be less than £63,000 per annum."

DEVELOPMENT OF LAND WHEN CLEARED.

"The land when cleared will be good cultivable land, and there are many uses that the land may be put to, but the principal one is the cultivation of sugar cane."

"In addition to the cultivation of the sugar cane the land is very suitable for growing maize, alfalfa (lucerne), and other crops, and attention may profitably be given to these from time to time as the land is cleared."

"Cattle raising should, as the land becomes available after clearing, be a source of good revenue, and profits should be considerable on all moneys invested in this way."

The Directors have also requested Mr. J. F. Berraondo, the late Manager of the properties, who is at present in London, representing Mr. Denti, to furnish them with a report, which follows Mr. Davies's report in the print herewith.

Applications for shares should be made upon the forms accompanying the Prospectus, and sent to the Company's Bankers, the London City and Midland Bank, Limited, 66, New Broad Street, London, E.C., to Head Office, or any of the Branches, together with a remittance for the amount of the deposit.

Prospectuses and forms of application can be obtained at the office of the Company, or from the Bankers, Solicitors, or Brokers, London.

This prospectus has been duly filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies.

RESERVED FOR POSTAL SALE.

So unprecedented has been the demand for the bargains in Royal Worcester Kidfitting Corsets during the first week of our Great Summer Sale, that we can hardly hope the Bargains still for disposal will carry us more than a few days longer. We must, therefore, study the interests of ladies who have been unable to pay an early visit to the Sale, and we have accordingly set aside 1,000 pairs of these coveted bargains—so typical of the Peter Robinson Sale Value—for disposal through the post.

These thousand pairs comprise all sizes and fittings. They will NOT be drawn upon for counter sales—they will be reserved entirely for postal sale. Once disposed of, we cannot repeat them; early application is therefore respectfully urged.

This is a singularly favourable opportunity of trying a high-grade corset at a moderate price, particularly as the bargains offered will serve the Autumn mode admirably, the new corset base being so little changed.

All corsets of 14/9 and upwards—including the celebrated "Adjusto" figure-reducing corset (now 13/11)—marked down 2/- per pair throughout the sale.

Post orders receive careful and prompt attention.

Mention type of figure, and size required.

Money refunded in full if you are not delighted with your bargain.

The half-a-century reputation of Royal Worcester Kidfitting Corsets is a universally accepted guarantee of the smartness and stylishness of these bargains, which we are offering at these substantial reductions in accordance with our principle of clearing our corset stock twice every year.

Model, as sketch, 10/6.
Usual price 14/6.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best Epigram, Conundrum, Lipogram, Bouts-Rimés, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this Journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the Truth Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a quarter to the same competitor.

7. All New Contributors are Required to Forward with their First Answers their Real Names and Addresses for Registration; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed twelve, and must under no circumstances consist of more than fourteen, letters.

9. Competitors must on no account change the noms-de-plume they have once assumed.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed:—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," Carteret Street, Queen Anne's Gate, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,639.

I was talking the other day to a lady of my acquaintance, and the subject came up of the advantages and drawbacks of living in London. We both agreed that the advantages outweighed the drawbacks, and that, taking one thing with another, London occupied premier rank as a place of residence.

"But supposing you were debarred from living in London, yet had to live in some large provincial town," inquired my fair acquaintance, "what town should you select?"

I confessed myself posed. There are so many large provincial towns in the United Kingdom, and there is so much to be said both for and against nearly all of them. But the question set me thinking, and it occurred to me that it would make rather an interesting puzzle for my Truth competitors.

In this conviction, I now offer the usual Prize of Two Guineas for the best reply to the following query:

Supposing you had to Live in a Provincial Town in the United Kingdom of 50,000 Inhabitants or Upwards, and were Making a Selection of Three, in Order of Merit, What Three Should you Pick Out?

N.B.—For purposes of this competition, the figures of the last census (1901) are to be taken as the criterion of population. And no town may be included any part of which falls within a fifteen-mile radius of Charing Cross.

The Prize award will be made on a plébiscite basis.

All lists of three large towns must reach Truth office by the first post on Monday, July 25.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1632.

SIX MEN WHO HAVE MOST DISTINGUISHED THEMSELVES IN ASSISTING TO BUILD UP THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

I have now completed my collation of the enormous number of lists sent in for this competition. The result is to produce the following "ideal" list, viz.:—

Clive, Rhodes, Warren Hastings, Cook, Nelson, Wolfe.

I confess that, as regards two of the names at least, I am not in agreement with this "ideal" list. But as it was announced that the Prize Award would be made by plébiscite, I am, of course, bound by it.

Only one competitor, Allimac, has given all the six names aforesaid. Allimac, therefore, receives the Prize of Two Guineas.

"TRUTH" PRIZE, No. 1633.

THREE WATERING PLACES CALCULATED TO MEET THE VARIOUS REQUIREMENTS OF A FAMILY OF SEVEN PERSONS.

The list of three watering places already in the P.E.'s hands when the competition was announced reads as follows:—

1. Scarborough. 2. Eastbourne. 3. Bournemouth.

Only one competitor, Nymph, has succeeded in giving those three places in the right order. Nymph, therefore, is awarded the Prize of Two Guineas.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1,634.

The correct solution of the double acrostic set in the above competition is as follows:—

T ropi C
R alp H
U ndin E
T abith A
H au T

Eleven competitors have sent in correct solutions, exactly corresponding with the author's.

The noms-de-plume of these eleven are Browzer, Will, La Milo, Cuthbert, Eca, Quern, Korah, Prak, Mrs. B., H. Wynottie, Dummorix.

I have also received correct solutions from several other competitors, which reached Truth Office after the first post on June 20, and which, therefore, I have been regretfully compelled to disqualify.

I am open to consider appeals from Sæmund, Bibliothekar, Uncle, and Veni, in reference to certain alternatives, viz., "Relforth" (for "Ralph") by Bibliothekar; "Thyrza" (for "Tabitha") by Sæmund; "Filomma" (for "Tabitha") by Uncle; and "Phalassic" (for "Tropic") by Veni.

These competitors must, however, satisfy me that their alternatives fit the respective lines equally as well as the author's. Otherwise they will be rejected.

Such appeals must reach me not later than by the first post on Monday, July 25.

In the meanwhile I shall hold over the special play-off acrostic which I have decided to set for the determination of the Prize.

Answers to Correspondents.

 The real name, with the address, of Jessica, winner of Truth Prize No. 1,624, is Mrs. W. J. Cook, Wheatley, Holbeck Hill, Scarborough.

 The real name, with the address, of Edgerton, winner of one-sixth of Truth Prize No. 1,630, is G. W. Shaw, Esq., Botham Hall, Huddersfield.

 The real name, with the address, of Bel Demonio, winner of one-fourth of Truth Prize No. 1,631, is Miss I. W. Ferguson, Edenballymore, Londonderry.

 The real name, with the address, of Chester Keith, also winner of one-fourth of above, is Mrs. C. R. Kemp, "Grasmere," Seabrook, Kent.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT COMPETITION QUERIES.

Skylark.—By an anagram is meant the rearrangement of the letters of any given word, name, or collection of words or names, so as to form entirely different words. A well-known example is the name "Horatio Nelson," converted by anagram into "Lo, a nation's hero." In reply to your second query: All words printed as single words in that issue of Truth, whether German or otherwise, are admissible. Hyphened words, printed as such, are inadmissible.

Crescendo.—In Question No. 10 the trade name or description of a firm or company (such as, e.g., Jones & Sons, or Black, White & Co., or Grey's, Limited, &c.) is eligible.

ENTRE NOUS.

SEVERAL of the papers have been publishing conjectural announcements respecting the date of the Coronation, and a weekly journal announced the other day that the ceremony would take place on Wednesday, May 24, while another fixed Saturday, June 3, as the day. I understand that it is now practically settled that the Coronation is to take place either on Wednesday, June 21, or Thursday, the 22nd. It had originally been proposed to fix Wednesday, June 28, this being the anniversary of Queen Victoria's Coronation. It has been necessary to consider the arrangements of foreign Courts when fixing the date, as every country in Europe will be represented. It is not likely that any reigning sovereign will attend except the King of Norway, but several Crown Princes are expected. The Grand Duke Michael Alexandrovitch will represent the Court of St. Petersburg, and Ambassadors Extraordinary are to come from France and from the United States.

---

The King and Queen have been described by a contemporary as "holding their Court in Aldershot camp." The Royal visit to Aldershot was quite private, and there was a marked absence of ceremonial throughout the week. There was no pretence of any "Court" state, and the only entertainments were small dinner parties, to which the principal officers in the camp were invited. The inspections and parades were quiet and businesslike affairs, conducted without any fuss, and there was no elaborate review. The King had given special orders that his visit should be regarded as a private one.

---

The Royal Pavilion is really a large wooden bungalow, which was built in the late fifties at the suggestion of Prince Albert, in order that Queen Victoria might have a residence at Aldershot for occasional visits. It is opposite to the West Cavalry Barracks, but is hidden by a high fence and a plantation of trees and shrubs. On the other side of the Pavilion (where the principal rooms are) there is a terrace with lawn, and the view is very extensive. The Pavilion is neither handsome nor especially comfortable, and it is believed to be damp. The Duke and Duchess of Connaught lived there for some time, and it was afterwards occupied by Prince and Princess Alexander of Teck. King Edward greatly disliked this place.

The King and Queen are to leave London on Thursday afternoon for Portsmouth Harbour, when they will join the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert at the south railway jetty for ten days' cruising. The Royal children will probably make a short stay at Barton Manor. The extensive alterations in the grounds of Barton Manor, which were ordered by King Edward, are now completed, and the place has lately been visited by Lord Redesdale and Sir Dighton Probyn. The King and Queen are expected to spend about a week at Frogmore Lodge next month, before they go to Scotland, in order that they may give their own instructions as to some of the changes which are to be carried out in the private apartments of Windsor Castle.

Queen Alexandra has postponed her departure for Denmark until the beginning of next month, and she will probably pay a short visit to Sandringham before leaving England. It is understood that her Majesty and the Empress Marie will be conveyed from Port Victoria to Copenhagen on the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert. Queen Alexandra is going on to Christiania about the middle of August on a short visit to the King and Queen of Norway, after which she will settle at her villa near Klampenborg for the autumn. Her Majesty is not expected to return to England until the end of October, but the Royal yacht will come back to Portsmouth early in September to be laid up. Queen Alexandra will travel home overland.

---

King George has displayed the utmost kindness and consideration towards his mother, as he begged her to stay on at Buckingham Palace for as long as she pleased, and to take her own time in making her arrangements for the future. The etiquette and custom at most European Courts require the widow of a deceased sovereign to vacate the various palaces (except those residences which are assigned to her for life) directly after her husband's funeral. In 1838 Queen Adelaide left Windsor Castle for ever an hour after King William's funeral, which had taken place at night by torchlight. The widow left for Bushy Park at midnight after having witnessed the funeral service in the choir of St. George's Chapel from the Royal closet, which was occupied by Queen Victoria at the wedding of her eldest son.

---

Princess Victoria is going to Harrogate for a course of the waters before she leaves England on her visit to Denmark and Norway. H.R.H. will be accompanied by her cousin, the Grand Duchess Marie Georgievna, who arrived at Buckingham Palace on Friday evening from the Continent. The Grand Duchess Marie is the only surviving daughter of the King and Queen of the Hellenes, and she is married to the Grand Duke George Michailovitch.

The Queen of Spain has postponed her arrival in the Isle of Wight until the first week in August, and according to the latest arrangements, she will be accompanied to England by King Alfonso, and they are to travel overland, the Royal yacht Giralda being under orders to await their arrival at Cowes. King Alfonso may change his plans again, but if he does come to England he will stay at Cowes for only about a week, after which he is going to pay two or three strictly private visits in the North of England and in Scotland for grouse shooting. The Queen will remain with her mother at Osborne Cottage.

The Duchess of Albany is to leave Claremont Park shortly to spend two or three months on the Continent. H.R.H. will first pay a visit to her sister, the Queen Dowager of the Netherlands, at the Château of Soestdijk, and during her stay in Germany she is to be the guest of the King and Queen of Wurtemberg, the Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, the Prince and Princess of Waldeck and Pyrmont, the Prince and Princess of Wied, and of the Prince and Princess of Bentheim.

The King and Queen of the Hellenes are residing at the Château of Tatoi, their favourite country seat, which was created by King George in the sixties. Queen Olga is going back to Russia at the beginning of next month, and she will be absent from Greece until the end of November. King George hopes to spend the latter part of August at Aix-les-Bains, and he will pass the autumn in Denmark. His Majesty is to be away from Greece until the middle of November, and he will visit Paris, Frankfort, and Vienna during his absence. The Duke of Sparta, who will return shortly to Greece from Germany, will act as Regent during the King's absence from that country.

The Grand Duchess Xénie concluded her visit to Queen Alexandra on Saturday, when she left London for St. Petersburg, whence she proceeds to her villa in the Imperial Park of Peterhof, on the Gulf of Finland. The Grand Duchess Xenie is the elder sister of the Emperor Nicholas, and she is married to the Grand Duke Alexander Michailovitch.

---

Prince and Princess Frederick Charles of Hesse have arrived at Eastbourne from Frankfort on a short and strictly private visit to England. Prince Frederick Charles is the brother and next heir of the Landgrave of Hesse, and he is a first cousin of both Queen Alexandra and the Duchess of Connaught. The Princess is the youngest sister of the Emperor William.

---

The Greek Government has made an excellent choice in appointing M. Gennadius its Minister in London. He first became a member of the London Greek Legation in 1875, and from that date to 1892 he was either Chargé d'Affaires or Minister Resident, and in these capacities became a persona grata in English political and social circles, whilst he ably secured for his country large advantages. This was very fully recognised in the address presented to him on his leaving London by a committee which included the leading members of the Greek community in England and many prominent English statesmen, under the presidency of Lord Rosebery. At the end of 1892 M. Tricoupis, then Greek Premier, recalled all the Greek Envoys abroad on the score of economy. M. Gennadius was therefore no longer in the diplomatic service when the disastrous war between Greece and Turkey took place. He openly protested against the conduct of the war, and this gave great offence in high places.

---

Since his disappearance from the Greek Legation in London M. Gennadius has mainly resided in England, where he was married to a daughter of the late Mr. Samuel Laing, who had been Minister of Finance in India, and subsequently sat in Parliament as M.P. for the Orkneys. His many English friends will be delighted to see M. Gennadius back again in his old place. At the present juncture he will certainly find his work cut out for him; but whatever may be the outcome of the present situation in the East, a better selection for this important post could not have been made.

Lord Aberdeen returned to the Viceregal Lodge last week, where Lady Aberdeen soon joins him from Scotland. A party of visitors will be entertained at the Viceregal Lodge for the Horse Show week. Their Excellencies will attend the Show in State on the two special "society" days. The Viceregal procession will drive round the jumping enclosure as usual to the Viceregal box on the grand stand.

---

Some of the papers appear to suppose that Sir James Lamont, of Knockdow, who is one of the Birthday Baronets, is the late member for Buteshire, whereas he is that legislator's father. Sir James, who owns a large estate in Argyllshire, was himself the Liberal member for Buteshire in the Parliament of 1865, and his son, Mr. Norman Lamont, had sat for the county for a number of years until the last election, when he lost his seat. The Knockdow estate includes one of the best grouse moors in Argyllshire. The Lamonts are descendants (through the female line) of Judge Jeffreys.

---

The Duke of Richmond and Lady Helen Gordon Lennox will entertain a number of guests next week at Goodwood House, and about August 4 they will proceed to Scotland for a residence of three months at Gordon Castle.

---

The Duke of Bedford arrived on Thursday evening at Endsleigh, his place in Devonshire, accompanied by Lord Tavistock, and they will be joined there by the Duchess, who has been on a cruise along the west coast of Scotland in the steam yacht Sapphire. The house at Endsleigh was built about a century ago by the sixth Duke, at the request of his second wife, the well-known Duchess Georgiana, who was a daughter of the Duke of Gordon. The grounds are lovely, and the woods extend for miles along both banks of the Tamar, which is crossed by a floating bridge. Mr. Charles Greville wrote in July, 1848:

> This place is exquisitely beautiful, so is the country round about it; house perfection. It is a cottage, which cost between £70,000 and £80,000, and the grounds, laid out with inimitable taste, must have cost thousands more. There are sixty miles of grass rides and gravel walks.

Lady Lansdowne has left Berkeley Square for Bowood Park for the season. Lord and Lady Lansdowne are going to Ireland next month for a long stay at Derreen, their place on the coast of Kerry. Lord Lansdowne's place in Scotland, Meikleour House, Perthshire, has been let for the season to Lord Fitzhardinge, along with extensive shootings and a noted stretch of salmon fishing in the Tay.

---

Penn House, Lady Howe's place near Amersham, has been let for a few months to Lady Haliburton. Penn is a very nice house, with pretty gardens, and the place is surrounded by extensive woods. King Edward paid a visit to Penn House some years ago for a couple of days' pheasant shooting.

---

Much angry criticism has been provoked in the Isle of Man by the recent appointment of Mr. Bertram Edward Sargeaunt to be secretary to the Lieutenant-Governor (Lord Raglan), Clerk to the Council, Treasurer, Registrar-General, and Superintendent of Public Buildings. For some years Mr. Sargeaunt was assistant-secretary to the Royal United Service Institution. He has also been a captain in the Volunteers and assistant-editor of a military journal. Manxmen do not quarrel with his selection as secretary to the Lieutenant-Governor—a post created by the late Lord Henniker, and regarded as a sinecure. What they are concerned about is the pitchforking of an alien into the offices of Clerk, Treasurer, and Registrar-General, which might have been—to say the least—equally well filled by Manxmen. It is certainly difficult to avoid the conclusion that this appointment is a job—in fact, several jobs rolled into one—and that it makes a mockery of the Home Rule the Isle of Man is supposed to enjoy.

SUFFRAGETTIANA.

I.—The Magic Number.

I met a little Suffragist;
A thousand smiles her visage kissed:
She seemed agog with glee.
"Good morrow, pretty maid," said I.
"Good morrow, sir," she made reply
And laughed exultantly.

"A penny for your thoughts," I said.
She wagged at me her hatless head
And cried without demur:
"My thoughts? Oh, yes! I'll make them plain;
I'm just revolving in my brain
The magic number, sir.'

"What's that?" said I. "Well, sir," said she,
"The magic number some as three
And some as seven define;
Some number one's strong claims enforce.
They're wrong. The magic sum, of course,
Is number one-nought-nine."

---

Last week I pointed out that the statement of a daily journal that the Sovereign pays the cost of the visits of foreign sovereigns or princes is incorrect. On Thursday particulars were issued of an impending vote which includes items of £6,993 for the visit of the King of Portugal last November and £795 for the visit of the Emperor and Empress of Russia to Cowes twelve months ago. When the King pays a State visit to a foreign Court all his expenses are paid by the country; and this same vote includes a charge of £2,685 for the cost of the visit of King Edward and Queen Alexandra to Berlin in the early part of last year.

---

Three special Missions are to be despatched to the various Courts of Europe to announce the death of King Edward and the accession of King George, and they all involve a very considerable cost to the country. The ordinary travelling and other expenses of such a Mission are always heavy, and the Special Envoy is expected to present handsome gifts (such as gold snuff-boxes) to a number of the principal officials at each Court visited. I quite agree with Lord Willoughby de Eresby that "our Ambassadors already accredited to foreign Courts could communicate the news at less expense and with due decorum." It is odd that it should have been left to a nobleman of Tory principles to raise this question in the House of Commons, but economy has become quite unfashionable among Liberals of late years.

Mr. Harcourt was asked on Friday whether the £40,500 which is put down as the cost of King Edward's funeral is the total outlay, and his reply was quite satisfactory. It has not been forgotten that the Coronation really cost a very much larger sum than the vote granted by Parliament. This fact became known through the vigilant investigations of the Public Accounts Committee, and it was discovered that the deficit had been provided by an ingenious arrangement of virements.

Jeffrey & Co.'s New Artistic Wall Papers are on view at their Show Rooms, The Wallpaper Gallery, 31, Mortimer St., W. To be had of all Decorators. Factory: 64, Essex Rd., Islington, N.

Mr. Lees Smith carried most members with him last Thursday in his criticism of the arrangements made for the funeral of the late King. As I said at the time, the procession through London was not representative of the national grief at the loss of the Sovereign, being nothing more than a military pageant which would have done the same service for a Royal Coronation. Even naval officers were only present by invitation. The procession would have gained, not lost in splendour, had Parliament, the Law, the Church, and other learned professions been represented on the occasion. Field-marshals in gaudy uniforms on prancing chargers are better on view at Aldershot than on a solemn occasion when people come together not to see a display, but to mourn for their dead King.

The principles on which "Civil List" pensions are administered are very mysterious. Four years ago, I think it was, Dr. Sully, on resigning his Chair of Philosophy, received a pension of £200 a year. His name now appears for £75 a year more. That is a very unusual grant, and the reasons for it are not evident. Dr. Sully's acquirements and services are unimpeachable, but the whole fund only allows £1,200 a year of new grants, and I understand that the doctor belongs to a family of well-to-do people.

---

SUFFRAGETTIANA.

II.—A Sop to Cerberus.

(By a cynical M.P.)

I voted for the Women's Bill
To please the warlike tribe of Jill
And save myself from fuss;
It was the prudent thing to do.
In other words, my vote I threw
A sop to Cerberus.

Why not? To hunt me now they'll cease.
I gain a blessed spell of peace;
And as there's no pretence
This Bill the form of law can take,
My vote, in practice, doesn't make
The slightest difference.

Probably no one has ever said more nasty things about justices and justices' justice than I have; but I have never felt myself very deeply stirred by the Liberal grievance about the composition of the county benches. No doubt it is unfortunate that the political element should enter so largely into those appointments; but if all the Lord Lieutenants and Lord Chancellors were angels and archangels, they would still find their choice of fit persons largely restricted to Unionists, for the simple reason that most of the people in rural districts who have the leisure to undertake magisterial duties are Unionists.

Further, if these angels and archangels, by working miracles, could find as many suitable Liberals as Unionists, my impression is that the quality of petty sessions justice would not be very materially improved. We might see a little less disposition to strain law and evidence against the poacher, to treat poverty generally as a crime; but I am not very sure about that, and in any case it is not all that is wanted. There is no political grievance in the case of the borough benches. Are they above reproach? Let the files of Truth answer. One or two borough courts have at times made themselves notorious for their perverse attitude towards certain offences. Speaking generally, I should say that in point of stupidity and prejudice there is not much to choose between the two classes of magistrates, though each may have its own way of demonstrating these engaging qualities.

For these reasons I do not anticipate any very beneficent results from the report of the Royal Commission that has been investigating this subject, though no doubt its recommendations would make the method of appointment more rational, and do something to prevent the commission of the peace in counties being a close preserve of the Tory party, whether under a Halsbury or any other. But my view is that the amateur magistrate, Conservative or Liberal, is an anachronism. The only thing you can say for him is that he is cheap, and, considering how money is lavished in these days on raising the standard of all branches of public administration, there is no justification for stinting it in the administration of the law—the criminal law most of all. A great many social troubles have their roots and their remedies in the police-courts.

---

The letter addressed by Baron E. Nordenskjold, the well-known explorer and writer on ethnological subjects, to the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines' Protection Society is valuable if indirect confirmation of what has been proved in Truth in regard to the treatment of the unfortunate Indians of the Putumayo. Baron Nordenskjold, while travelling in Peru and Bolivia in 1904-5, and in Bolivia in 1908-9, investigated on the spot the relationship between the white and the indigenous population, and his observations lead him to the conclusion that there is a systematic enslavement of the Indians in the rubber districts of the Upper Amazon. He gives a number of instances of the manner in which this is brought about, the most atrocious being perpetrated in the forest of the upper reaches of the Rio Manuripi and of the Rio Tahumana, where one slave-hunter has earned a living by surrounding the villages of the Indians, butchering the adults, and selling the children to the rubber merchants at 400 pesos apiece. These are not the Peruvian Amazon Company's territories, but the conditions are everywhere similar, and the explorer's conclusions as to the widespread existence of the evil therefore corroborate the specific charges made in Truth.

I had hoped that the atrocities perpetrated by the employees of the Peruvian Amazon Rubber Company were unique in the annals of the South American rubber industry, but from the evidence of this impartial and wholly disinterested witness it is obvious that such is not the case. Baron Nordenskjold, however, makes reference to attempts made by both the Peruvian and Bolivian Governments to put an end to the exploitation of the natives, and points out the difficulties in the way of repressing evil practices in sparsely populated territories of vast extent. Every one will be glad to hear it, but far more reassuring would be the announcement that condign punishment had been bestowed upon some of the perpetrators of foul atrocities on helpless Indians.

SUFFRAGETTIANA.

III.—The Writing on the Wall.

(An Amœbic.)

She: As "Mene Tekel," long ago,
Did King Belshazzar's fall foreshow,
This shows our tyrant's fall;
For in last Thursday's victory grand
With fatal clearness may be scanned
The writing on the wall.

He: Stay, miss! But, as the Scriptures tell,
In that same night Belshazzar fell;
Fate followed hard on curse;
But your Belshazzar lives and kicks,
Still plays his old despotic tricks,
And, doomed, seems none the worse.

She: Pooh, man! Come, drop that vaunting tone;
In theory you are overthrown
Beyond all power to save;
A moral corpse, in fact, are you,
Consigned from this time henceforth to
An academic grave.

He: Since you, fair maid, contentment claim,
Why, cheerfully I do the same.
You're welcome—fact, no chaff—
To brick me in, in theory, tight,
And even, if you like, to write
My moral epitaph.

The tragic deaths of Mr. Rolls and of Herr Erbsloch and his four companions have evoked some very just and timely protests against the latest developments of "the conquest of the air." It is inevitable that lives should be lost in the evolution of aerial navigation, and nothing that anybody can say will influence the adventurous spirits who are attracted to this pastime, any more than it will prevent men throwing away their lives in dangerous mountain ascents or polar exploration. But the deplorable feature about the deaths of Mr. Rolls and the aviators who have gone to their graves before him is that these accidents occur in exhibition performances in which gate-money is a prominent feature.

---

Most of the aviators are flying as a matter of business. Their performances are very much in the nature of advertisements, and the competition in the business prompts them to strive constantly to make new records, regardless of risk. Mr. Rolls may not have been working for money, but he seems to have lost his life in doing a specially difficult performance, the conditions of which had been carefully laid down. This is very much like a competition in performing dangerous feats. And all for what? To draw a crowd and swell the gate-money. Death under these circumstances lays the guilt of manslaughter on the promoters and spectators of the exhibition, morally if not legally. The law has put a stop more or less to dangerous performances at places of entertainment. Why should it countenance gate-money aviation meetings?

---

There would be no misapprehension in the public mind about this but for the false glamour that has been thrown around aeroplaning by silly and irresponsible newspaper writers—not a little of it, again, for the express purpose of advertising newspapers. There is not up to the present moment the remotest prospect of any benefit to mankind from the art of flying by machinery The only utility that has hitherto been predicted for flying machines is in connection with military operations—in other words, the destruction of human life. Apart from this, the aeroplane is a toy, and offers no reasonable probability of ever being anything else. The crowds that assemble to gape at "airmen" risking their necks are drawn together by curiosity and nothing else. They have read columns of gushing twaddle about the miracle in their daily papers, and they want to see it for themselves, just as they want to see the new Russian dancers or the Hairy Ainos. Having seen it once, they will never want to see it again.

---

The very day after Mr. Rolls's death a number of women were to the front at Bournemouth, eager for a ride in an aeroplane. They subsequently described their sensations to the reporters for publication to an envious world. The tragedy of the previous day no doubt served to give an additional thrill to the adventure and to make each adventuress more proud of herself. If one of them had been killed she would, presumably, have been hailed as another martyr to scientific progress.

---

Surely this incident puts the aeroplane in its right place. A few years ago a captive balloon, hauled up and down by a windlass, was the crowning joy of the seeker after new sensations. Then we had the Great Wheel, which achieved the summit of its popularity when it stuck and kept its human freight in the air all night. I think it was Sarah Bernhardt who declared she would have paid £100 for that thrilling experience. After the Great Wheel, the Flip-Flap. Now the aeroplane cuts them all out. To be recorded in the papers as one of the dozen or so of women who have experienced this fearsome joy must be worth a big price—especially on the day after a man has actually been killed. But, alas, it is but a transient privilege! It will be common enough and cheap enough soon, unless the police interfere. And then the aeroplane must pass in its turn, to make way for a new sensation and a new nine days' wonder.

---

A paragraph went round the papers last week which stated that "two sons of Anthony Trollope settled in Australia, and one of them has just died there." Anthony Trollope's family was limited to two sons, and it was the younger one who went out to Australia as a sheep farmer in 1865 or 1866, and he died a few weeks ago at Sydney. Trollope went out to visit his son in the autumn of 1871, and he spent a year in Australia, and wrote a big book of experiences and impressions. Anthony Trollope's elder son was for some years a partner in a well-known publishing firm, and he has all his life been engaged in literary pursuits.

The library of Colonel Hargreaves, of Putney, which was sold at Sotheby's last week, included a very fine copy of the Shakespeare First Folio, from the library at King's Bromley Manor, Staffordshire. Its original owner was Colonel Lane, of Bentley Hall, who assisted Charles II. after the battle of Worcester. It was sold by auction about half a century ago for 157 guineas, and again changed hands in 1884 for £470, while in 1907 it was purchased by Colonel Hargreaves at the Buckley sale for £2,400. Last week the price fell to £2,000, the purchaser being Mr. Quaritch. The fluctuations in the value of books of this class are most mysterious, for every one would have expected so choice a copy of the First Folio to have risen in price, as the number of them is limited, while the demand is always brisk.

Twice lately the Daily Mail has mentioned Mr. Thomas Hardy as the only great writer left of the Victorian age. Of course, Mr. Hardy is a great writer. No one denies, or could deny, that. But is he the "last" great writer of the Victorian period? What about Lord Morley? So far as I know, he still lives. And what about Rudyard Kipling?

Sir George Douglas has been appointed Lecturer in Scottish Literature at Glasgow University in the place of Dr. William Wallace, who has resigned through ill health. Sir George is the author of numerous works, most of which relate to Scotland, and he edited "The Panmure Papers," which dealt principally with the Crimean War period. The post is in the gift of the University Court. The lectures are to be delivered between January and March, and they will form a quasi-sequel to Sir Herbert Maxwell's series of discourses on Scottish History, which will be delivered between October and December.

Inquiry as to how the leakage of questions at the recent degree examinations of the University of Wales came about is likely to reveal a very pretty scandal. Already a leading member of the Welsh University Court has issued a statement in which he definitely charges certain professors at the Welsh University Colleges with disclosing to their students the questions set for their degree examinations. This is one way of getting a reputation as a successful teacher, but not one usually associated with university methods, and the University Court owe it to themselves to make the fullest investigation into the allegations.

The President and Fellows of Queens' College, Cambridge, have presented the Rev. J. D. Best, Principal of Chester Training College, to the rectory of Sandon, near Chelmsford, which is of the net value of about £500 a year, with house.

Lord Rosebery has presented the Rev. G. S. Streatfeild, Rector of Fenny Compton, Warwickshire, with the Rectory of Postwick, Norfolk, which is of the net value of about £400 a year, with house, and vacant by the death of the late incumbent. Mr. Streatfeild is a distinguished leader of the Evangelical party, and he has a high reputation as a writer and preacher. He will be much missed in the diocese of Worcester. The living of Fenny Compton thus to be vacated is of the net value of £420 a year, with residence, and in the gift of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church. This benefice was held for some years by the late Dr. Bigg, afterwards Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Oxford, and Canon of Christ Church.

The Bishop Suffragan of Hull has collated the Rev. H. E. Keyes, late Vicar of St. Cuthbert's, Middlesbrough, to the Rectory of Nunburnholme, in the East Riding, on the presentation of the Archbishop of York. The net stipend of this living is about £250 a year, with house.

Several references have been made in Truth to the anomaly under which the Bishop of Kensington holds a rich City living while residing on the western outskirts of London. I have reason to believe that the Bishop of London contemplates doing something at an early opportunity to correct this anomaly.

Archdeacon Wilkinson, who died at Plymouth on Thursday, was a staunch but wide-minded evangelical and exercised considerable influence in Church affairs. He was Vicar of Plymouth for thirty-one years, and he was practically bishop of the town and district, as he was thoroughly trusted by Bishops Temple and Bickersteth, who gave him a free hand. He did much good work and carried out many desirable changes. He was a most successful organiser and an eloquent extempore preacher. He was collated to a prebendal stall in Exeter Cathedral by Bishop Temple in 1878, and in 1889 he succeeded the present Dean of Exeter as Archdeacon of Totnes on the nomination of Bishop Bickersteth. He was chaplain both to Queen Victoria and to King Edward. During his incumbency at Plymouth he refused five offers of good preferment.

The Rev. Henry Thornhill Morgan, whose death was announced last week, was the intimate and trusted friend of the late Bishop King, of whom he was one of the literary executors. Mr. Morgan, who had a distinguished career at Oxford, was for some years chaplain of Cuddesdon College when Dr. King was President, and he afterwards held benefices in the diocese of Oxford until 1894, when Mr. Gladstone presented him to the Crown living of Eckington, near Sheffield. In 1902 Bishop King transferred him to the Vicarage of St. Peter-in-Eastgate, Lincoln, which he held until his death. He was the author of some very successful theological works, and he had an extensive knowledge of French literature, and was a recognised authority on church architecture.

Disgusted at the emptiness of his church, due to an anniversary service at a Methodist chapel close by, the Vicar of Mochdre, Montgomeryshire, was moved to compare the attachment of Welsh and English congregations to their church. The Welsh, he declared, would even go to see a monkey on a stick. Taken all round Taffy is gifted with a fair amount of intelligence, and I presume he goes where he can get most edification. One naturally sympathises with a vicar who cannot contend against such humble rivalry as that suggested.

An edifying example of clerical intolerance is furnished by some correspondence in a Leicester paper. The Rectors of Market Bosworth and Cadeby had both promised to take a service for the Vicar of Sutton Cheney during his holiday. Before his holiday came, however, the vicar gave an address on a social subject in a Wesleyan schoolroom at Barwell. The Rector of Barwell protested against this "invasion" of his parish, and in consequence the other two rectors have refused to do duty at Sutton Cheney in the absence of the vicar. He has been informed that what he did was contrary to the unwritten law of the Church, contrary to courtesy and good manners, and contrary to the best interests of the Church and true Christian spirit. I like the latter touch. It is, of course, the three rectors who display the true Christian spirit.

Many of my readers may remember the "Endless Prayer Chain," which has been frequently referred to in Truth during the last two or three years, as well as in other papers. This silly composition apparently originated with a practical joker, and if he could only know how many thousands of fools are busy in all parts of the world in copying out the prayer and forwarding it to their friends, he would probably be deeply gratified at the success of his joke. In the original document the prayer was fathered on an American bishop named Lewis. But I am sorry to say that in a copy of the document which has just reached me from Nova Scotia the honoured name of the Bishop of London has been substituted for that of Bishop Lewis. This gives the joke a very cruel turn. Of course, it is the normal fate of a chain letter to get mangled beyond recognition after it has been copied a few dozen times.

The Abersychan Urban Council last week by six votes to five refused to sanction the opening of the Council's swimming baths on Sunday morning from six to ten, because it would have a tendency to desecration of the Sabbath. This is the first time that I have ever heard that a cold bath was the first step on the downward path to perdition. Even bishops have been known to take a bath on a Sunday morning, and the proximity of cleanliness to godliness has become a proverb.

---

An astounding story comes from Ilfracombe in connection with the conference last week of the Urban District Councils Association. Difficulty was experienced in collecting the amount required for the entertainment of the delegates, and at a meeting of the local committee a fortnight ago the hon. secretary mentioned that the sum of £9 11s. 7d., a remnant of the Patriotic Fund raised at the time of the Boer War, had been lying in the bank since 1901. It was coolly suggested that this money should be appropriated for the conference entertainment fund—the bank manager being willing to hand it over if three responsible persons would give him an indemnity—and on the ground that "it was for a public purpose" the committee adopted the suggestion.

I have rarely heard of a more impudent and disgraceful misapplication of trust money. If all legitimate claims upon the Ilfracombe Patriotic Fund have been satisfied, then the balance ought to be given to some charitable institution. To utilise it in eking out the town's hospitalities to urban councillors is, I should think, a proceeding as illegal as it is improper, and I hope that somebody will insist upon the replacement of the money.

Complaint was made at the Chester Education Committee meeting last week of the way in which the school children who are to take part in the forthcoming Chester Pageant were treated. No provision seems to have been made for their refreshment, and it was asserted that they were unable to obtain even a drink of water without paying 2d. for it, though they had been kept for hours rehearsing in the hot sun. This, of course, must be due to sheer thoughtlessness, but if I were a Chester parent I should take particular care that no child of mine should assist in a pageant where so little attention was given to the welfare of the performers.

Major-General G. F. Browne, who never fitted well into the War Office, has been succeeded by Brigadier-General C. F. N. Macready as Director of Personal Services, alias Deputy-Adjutant-General. General Macready is a Gordon Highlander, and did well in South Africa; but, like his chief, General Ewart, and his predecessor, General Browne, he would not have been placed where he is by the Duke of Cambridge, as he has never commanded a battalion.

It was represented to me recently that in the bestowal of rewards for distinguished and meritorious service retired R.A.M.C. colonels are passed over in favour of retired surgeon-generals. This was the case in the past, but will not be so in future. When two reward vacancies among retired surgeon-generals recently occurred Surgeon-General Evatt got one at £100 a year, while the other was split into two, Colonels Supple and Williamson getting £50 a year each. There are now four medical officers of colonel's rank in receipt of these rewards as against ten of general's rank. The disproportion is still too great, and should be rectified when the next death vacancies occur.

---

At present the Military Secretary selects officers for these rewards off his own bat, and submits their names to the Secretary of State for his approval. This hole-in-the-corner procedure should be abolished, and the duty of making the awards entrusted to the Selection Board—not an ideal arrangement, by any means, but better than the existing one-man system which is the cause of much heart-burning among those in waiting for these coveted rewards.

Under what authority, by the way, does Sir Thomas Gallwey, who is still serving, draw one of these £100 a year rewards? Article 576 (c) of the Royal Warrant limits those who are eligible for the rewards to "medical officers on the retired list." It appears to me that, as far as the R.A.M.C. is concerned, the provisions of the Royal Warrant are a dead letter, for they are systematically trampled under foot whenever it is necessary to whitewash a job or promote a favourite. Sir Thomas Gallwey is both distinguished and meritorious, but that is no reason why he should be given £100 a year before he is entitled by regulation to receive it, thereby preventing a retired officer from coming on to the list.

There is a great deal of dissatisfaction among the Artillery in India over the recently formed ammunition columns. Before he left the country Lord Kitchener determined to create twelve field artillery and nine horse artillery ammunition columns. Like most of Lord Kitchener's plans, the idea was good but the execution bad. Officers, men, horses, material were suddenly brought together by peremptory orders without any previous arrangements being made for accommodation. The men (chiefly natives) were put into tents and the horses picketed in the open, with no shelter from sun or monsoon rains. There has been much misery in consequence among the natives and loss of life among the horses.

No officers being forthcoming as volunteers for the ammunition columns, resort was had to forced labour, Lord Kitchener, with his usual high-handedness, directing his adjutant-general to pick a captain and three subalterns from where he pleased for each of the new units and transfer them forcibly for duty. Taken from their batteries, which are their homes, and dumped down to look after the heterogeneous collection of native attendants and horses scratched together by hook and crook from wherever they could be best spared, the officers have all the disadvantages of serving with natives without the pecuniary recompense which is given to their brethren of the Indian Army. This is unfair. Something must be done to remedy the injustice or there will be a further shortage of candidates for the Woolwich examinations.

The following appeared the other day in regimental orders for No. 4 Depot, R.G.A., Great Yarmouth:—

> In consequence of the prevalence of thefts in barracks, all passes for old soldiers and recruits living in A and B Blocks will be stopped after 10 p.m., and their kits will be shown daily at 1.30 p.m. till further orders. It is hoped that this general punishment may cause all ranks to use their utmost endeavours to bring the offender to book.

I do not understand on what this hope is founded. Men who have a thief at work among them do not generally want any artificial stimulus to cause them to do their best to stop his operations. The one effect which can be relied upon from general punishment of this kind is the creation of a general sense of injustice and resentment; and that result is particularly likely to follow where the men themselves may probably suffer from the offence which is thus punished.

It is denied on unimpeachable authority that Army Service Corps horses have been used to convey non-coms. to Masonic meetings at the Curragh, as alleged in Truth recently. After further inquiry, I think that my original correspondent must have mistaken the A.S.C. for the R.E. At any rate, it is certain that a Government van, Government horses, Government harness, and a Government driver have been regularly employed in the manner previously described, and which particular branch of the Army they are attached to is a minor consideration. As there has been no concealment about the proceedings, it is perfectly easy for any one on the spot who is interested in such matters to get at the exact facts. Apparently the Masons have paid for their rides, so their consciences may be clear, but it remains to be seen whether the Treasury gets the money, or whether somebody in charge of horses and vehicles is carrying on a sort of jobmaster's business.

---

Not long ago I asked to be excused from paying any more compliments to the editors and staffs of regimental journals, but I find it quite impossible to restrain my admiration for the last number of the Journal of the Leinster Regiment. It is really got up in a style that challenges comparison with the best illustrated magazines. How the overworked British officer can manage to produce in his spare time such a superlative publication, even once a quarter, must be a mystery to any civilian editor. I trust that my Service contemporary may never find questions being asked about it in the House by rival journalists.

To ensure regimental efficiency it is essential that a proper record of the training and progress of recruits should be kept, and a book facilitating this by no means easy task must be a boon to the Army and the Territorial Forces. Judging from the specimen sheets which I have seen, "The Regimental Standard Test Book," issued by Messrs. W. H. Smith and Son (price 5s.), is admirably compiled and arranged for this purpose. It provides spaces for entering the results of the standard tests of each recruit on a system making it a simple matter to mark his progress and to keep a "summary of results." Another useful publication in the same firm's "Kingsway" Service series is "The Soldier's Standard Test Pocket Book," a booklet designed in accordance with the latest musketry training regulations.

The explosion on board the Sutlej last week requires some explaining. This cruiser had only just completed a big survey and refit in Devonport Dockyard before taking part in the manœuvres. According to my information, several of her boiler elements and steam pipes were reported as in need of renewal, but the money allocated to her refit having been all expended, the ship went upon her trials with these defects unremedied. It is very difficult to allot blame in a case of this sort, where the real responsibility rests with the crippling system of finance. I do not suggest that the Sutlej was sent to sea in a palpably unsafe condition. She passed her commissioning trials with a few minor hitches. But an accident of this kind immediately after an overhaul and refit speaks for itself.

The battleship Hood was the last of the Irish port guardships under the old order of things. She has just gone back to Queenstown as the first port flagship of Admiral Sir A. W. Paget. Her active career is, of course, finished by her withdrawal from the "Baltic Fleet." But she may be expected to justify her salvation from the knacker's yard for a long time to come in her new rôle. I should like to see all the Royal Sovereigns utilised in similar fashion. The Barfleur and the Centurion made just over £26,000 apiece at the Portsmouth Dockyard auction last week—fifty shillings a ton displacement, machinery and boilers included! They should surely have been worth this to the Admiralty as floating oil-fuel reservoirs, mechanician workshops, or for any other of those harbour services upon which their Lordships are nowadays spending vast sums in shore establishments.

The tendency to consult the Fleet itself upon matters of administrative experiment seems to be growing, and is no doubt commendable. The Admiralty have invited commanding officers of his Majesty's ships to "report on the number of special service seamen borne, what proportion it is considered that the number of special service seamen should bear to the number of continuous service seamen in a ship, and an opinion as to the general suitability of special service seamen for the work they are employed in." Lord Charles Beresford has denounced the system of special service as misleading and dangerous, declaring he would sooner leave all the ratings of this class on the beach than take them into battle. It will be interesting to see whether the majority of naval officers share in this view.

Naval police are to be henceforth excluded from the Royal Fleet Reserve. I trust that this elimination will be justified by the extension of enrolment to other branches of the Service. At any rate, it is satisfactory to find that the organisation of this force is manifestly engaging the attention of their Lordships, for, as I pointed out last week, there is room for some useful modifications in its present composition.

---

The judgment delivered by the Court of Appeal on Monday precludes for the moment any observation on the merits of the dispute between Mr. Archer-Shee and the Admiralty. But whatever the issue of the litigation, it is to be hoped that it will incidentally bring about an amendment of the present rules regarding the withdrawal of cadets from Osborne. The regulation on this point runs:—"The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty reserve to themselves full discretion to request the withdrawal of any cadet if, after sufficient trial, he is, in their opinion, for any reason, unsuitable for the Naval Service." By what process of divination their Lordships are to decide this question justly in the case of a lad of thirteen or fourteen is beyond my comprehension. Under the old Britannia system there was no such process of elimination, and it has never been and cannot be suggested that the race of officers bred-up under this régime show the necessity for it. Of the first 588 Osborne cadets entered, 43 were withdrawn "for unsatisfactory progress," and this proportion has been fairly well maintained every year. This Kindergarten experiment has been carried far enough. No candidate should be accepted who fails to give satisfactory testimony of his qualifications for cadetship. If the age limit is too early for this, then increase the age limit.

---

The Admiralty and Outports Writers, and the Navy Medical Department, have been waiting many months for some sort of effect to be given to the recommendations of the Committees which investigated their claims. Mr. McKenna is reproachfully reassuring whenever questioned. As a matter of fact, I happen to know that the recommendations have been bandied between the Admiralty and the Treasury, until the one must be weary of insisting and the other of attempting to compromise. Meanwhile the Treasury is scoring by the delay. No doubt there are other similar examples in the Service of this favourite official game of battledore and shuttlecock.

---

The Lord Mayor of Manchester informed the Council the other day that he had refused to receive a memorial in support of the claim of the Mutual Telephone Syndicate to a reimbursement of the expenditure which they incurred in the public interest under circumstances narrated in Truth on April 13. Consideration of a motion on the subject, of which notice had been given, was avoided by the adjournment of the Council before it was reached. As a reason for his refusal the Lord Mayor said the claim had been three times rejected. This reminds one of the Alice-in-Wonderland theory that what is said three times must be true. What a majority of the Council have done thrice is not necessarily right, and in this instance a careful and impartial review of the facts suggest that a grievous injustice has been committed. Besides fifty-three members of the Council, about three hundred of the largest ratepayers have signed the memorial, and it is to be hoped that, in spite of the Lord Mayor's objection, the previous decision will yet be revoked.

THE GENTLEMAN'S BOOK.—OLD STYLE AND NEW.

["He could assure the Conference that the books written by women were far the worst, and that women were far more eager to obtain these books than men."—Mr. H. W. Keay, at Public Morals Conference.]

In my youth, when some author's invention,
Too daring, propriety shook;
His work blushing ladies would mention
As a "gentleman's book."

No woman, for any inviting,
Would deign at its pages to look;
Much less lend her pen to the writing
Of a "gentleman's book."

But the fair in this art now seem leaders;
The women, from Countess to cook,
Are by far the most numerous readers
Of the "gentleman's book."

Nor with reading such only they're bitten;
When a work shows the worst moral crook,
'Tis odds that a woman has written
That "gentleman's book."

So changed quite the sense of the phrase is,
Since women to Zola's style took;
Now the modest heap well-deserved praises
On the "gentleman's book."

But those who to spice are aspiring
To our feminine authors all look;
They would scoff at the thought of inquiring
For a "gentleman's book."

During the last week or two I have been receiving numbers of letters, and publishing as many of them as I can find room for, on the vexed question of the predatory habits of birds towards the early summer fruit. Men's passions always run on high on this subject with the coming in of the strawberries, and I do not desire to draw the fire of any belligerent on myself. But I wish that my correspondent who maintains that blackbirds never touch a strawberry till it is over-ripe, and then only in search of the slug that is always there at that time, could tell me why also these exclusively carnivorous vermin attack my cherries.

I do not find slugs up my cherry trees, nor any insects inside the fruit. But I observe that the blackbirds will strip the stone bare in the search for their animal food, and I will swear that they take away what they pick off, even if they don't swallow it. Moreover, while counsel for their defence asserts that they never touch a strawberry till it is over-ripe, I find that they will never leave a cherry till it is really ripe. If I want cherries, then, I must pick them while they are colourless and hard. If I leave them a day too long the blackbird is up before sunrise, and gorges and chortles till he sees me coming out. I wonder, too, what the bird is that removes—I will not say eats—my red currants the moment they are red, and what sort of animal food he finds inside them.

In November last I gave publicity to some allegations of a Greek firm in London against the administration of justice in Greece. The firm alleged that they had instructed an eminent Greek counsel to bring an action for them, paying fees and costs in advance, and that after about two years' delay they discovered that no action had been commenced, and had reason to believe that their lawyer had been retained by the other side. Subsequently to the appearance of this paragraph I received a communication from the Legal College of Athens inviting me to furnish further and better particulars of these allegations in order that they might inquire into the matter. I accordingly placed the secretary of the College in communication with my informant, Mr. D. Politi. Mr. Politi himself has since been in Greece, and he recently informed me that the matter had been explained entirely to his satisfaction, and that he desired to withdraw his allegations. I have now received from the secretary of the College a copy of the withdrawal and apology which Mr. Politi has made. I hardly think it is necessary to publish the document. It seems sufficient to say that the matter has been cleared up entirely to the satisfaction of the original complainant, and that all imputations are withdrawn. The promptness and thoroughness with which the complaint was taken up by the representatives of the legal profession in Athens are in themselves a pretty good answer to the allegations of general corruption which Mr. Politi made in the first instance.

Only two or three weeks back I extracted from the New Zealand papers the information that the New Zealand Government was appointing a Royal Commission to investigate the title to the famous Mokau Estates. Since then I have heard that the Government has discovered that it has no power to appoint a Royal Commission for this purpose, and was falling back on some other method of untying the knot. The history of this business reads like a fairy tale. Twenty times during the last fifteen years the difficulty has seemed to have reached the eve of solution, but at the last moment events have always taken some new turn and frustrated a settlement. Possibly by this time some new development has occurred in New Zealand, for my news is nearly six weeks old.

The employment of boys as police spies, or, in more colloquial phrase, as "coppers' narks," is not one which will commend itself to the ordinary citizen. The Wigan magistrates, however, apparently see nothing obnoxious in such a practice, for in a betting case last week, where convictions were secured by the evidence of a boy who was employed by the police to take bets to the defendant, the Mayor, as chairman of the bench, declared the objection of the defending solicitor to such a practice to be in "very bad taste." The Worshipful the Mayor of Wigan may be an authority on questions of "taste," but it is evident that he has much to learn on the subject of familiarising youth with crime. It was, by the way, the Wigan bench which was responsible for the committal of youthful offenders to Preston Gaol, upon which I commented last week.

---

To do the Great Unpaid justice, it is only fair to say that as a rule they deal pretty faithfully with offenders who neglect children. But there are exceptions, and the Blackpool and Lincoln benches supplied examples last week. The Blackpool magistrates, expressing the desire to give him another chance, only bound over a man, described by the police as "a brute," who had eloped with a woman to Llandudno, leaving his three children, one of them ill, to starve. The Lincoln bench merely imposed a fine of 40s. upon a man who was in the habit of leaving his motherless children alone in the house from early morning until eleven o'clock at night without food or attention, while he spent his money in public-houses. In neither case were the offenders deserving of the consideration shown them.

---

Paul Nassif, the Greek who figured in a case tried by Mr. Justice Darling last week, has long been known to Truth as a singularly audacious and versatile swindler. He was first pilloried in these columns some years ago in connection with his Turf frauds. Posing as "A. Montmorency" of the firm of "Montmorency and Co.," stock and share brokers, he welshed bookmakers with whom he opened a betting account in the character of a backer. Simultaneously he welshed backers by professing to be a bookmaker under the alias of "Levy and Marshall." He was an undischarged bankrupt then, and he remains one now, but that is a position causing little or no inconvenience to gentry of his type. He has contrived to live very well, having an address in Maida Vale and a house at Margate, running a motor-car, and making holiday excursions to the Continent.

The case tried last week arose out of one of Nassif's Continental trips. At Aix-les-Bains he became a patient of Dr. S. M. Rendall, who practises there in the summer and at Mentone in the winter. Describing himself as a stockbroker, Nassif, who has carried on a bucket-shop business as "Montmorency and Co.," lured the guileless doctor into various speculations in mining and railway shares. George Nassif, a brother of Paul, who has also conducted a bucket-shop in the name of "Sutherland and Co.," was sent to Mentone to get more money out of the doctor, and as the outcome of the brethren's joint efforts he was eventually swindled to the tune of about £5,000. To recover possession of bills that he had given and obtain repayment of cash that he had parted with Dr. Rendall sued the Nassifs. Paul did not attend the Court, it being represented that he was ill at Margate, and George's absence was persumably due to the fact that there is a warrant out for his arrest. The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff on the ground that he had been defrauded, and Mr. Justice Darling directed that the papers should be submitted to the Public Prosecutor with a view to the prosecution of the Nassifs.

Royal Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.—6,550 convictions last year. Complaints marked "Private" absolutely confidential.—Secretary, 105, Jermyn Street, London.

Incidentally this case brought to light a remarkable system of moneylending in connection with the motor-car business of Friswell, 1906, Limited. In a second action this company and its managing director, Sir Charles Friswell, sued Dr. Rendall as the holders in due course of three bills that he had given to Paul Nassif for sums amounting to about £3,000. Nassif induced Friswells to discount the bills for him, Sir Charles charging on two of them "as much as 77 per cent. in the ordinary way of business." Prior to this Nassif had twice obtained a loan from the company by the process of selling them a motor-car with an option to buy it back at a price which represented interest at the rate of 90 per cent. per annum. In reply to Mr. Justice Darling Sir Charles Friswell said:—

This method of buying a car and selling it back again afterwards at an increased price was their regular method of lending money; they adopted it originally under the advice of their solicitors to avoid having to register themselves as moneylenders.

In this action also a verdict was given in favour of Dr. Rendall, the plaintiffs Friswell failing to satisfy the jury that they had taken the bills for value in good faith within the meaning of the Bills of Exchange Act. The verdict ought to be a salutary lesson to Friswell, 1906, Limited, and its managing director.

COMFORT FOR CRIMINALS.

Under a Home Office order, in future prisoners without hard labour may wear their own clothes and need not have their hair cut.

Dear Truth,—The reason hitherto
I've looked on crime with loathing
Has been the thought
That I, if caught,
Must put on prison clothing.

I've so far walked the narrow way—
Though much against my marrow—
Because arrest
Meant being drest
In buff—and the broad arrow.

Another thought that has deterred
The schemes I once did harbour—
It may sound odd—
That, once in "quod,"
I'd have to see the barber!

The pride I've taken in my hair
Has saved me yet from "trouble,"
For I should dread
To know my head
Looked like a field of stubble.

Therefore, these regulations new
Have strangely stirred my blood;
For "chokey" I
Can now defy!
Yours faithfully,
A. Dud.

As I anticipated in a paragraph in Truth last week, the pair of peripatetic Assyrian beggars brought before the Burton-on-Trent magistrates turned out to be members of the mendicant tribe of Jilu. They are now doing two months' hard labour preparatory to deportation. In sentencing them to this term the magistrates cannot be said to have erred on the side of leniency. After all, the soft-headed and soft-hearted clergymen who encourage these attractive foreigners are partly to blame for their presence here, and if the magistrates had sentenced them to seven days' imprisonment and ordered the money found on them to be spent in defraying their fares back to their native land, substantial justice would have been done. There is no need to entertain them at the State's expense for two months.

The illustrious company who adorn the pages of Truth Cautionary List must feel a thrill of pride on learning that one of their number is "wanted for murder." The man Crippen, who has loomed so large in the public eye during the past week, appeared for the first time in this year's edition of the Cautionary List; but I have known his name for a good many years past. Some five or six years ago I was instrumental in knocking on the head one of the most monstrous medical swindles ever worked in this country—the "Drouet Institute for the Deaf." When it was on its last legs Dr. Dakhyl, who had been its medical adviser for a time, started the libel action against Truth which went on in one shape or another for over three years, and, after being twice tried, ended in a verdict for the defendant about two years ago.

During the Dakhyl case the Drouet Institute disappeared from its old quarters, and after a time I learned that this man Crippen had acquired the whole bag of tricks—very cheap, I should think. He thus became the last depository of the epoch-making discoveries of the immortal Drouet, out of which various rascals, and a much larger number of newspaper proprietors, had drawn a magnificent revenue for many years. Crippen, however, obviously had neither the capital nor the skill to set the swindle on its legs again. He shifted from one address to another, and finally I lost sight both of him and the ghost of Drouet.

Gentry of this type, however, are never out of sight of Truth Office for long. In the spring of last year Crippen again obtruded himself on my notice in the guise of the "Aural Remedies Company," of Craven House, Kingsway. He had dropped the venerable Drouet legend, doubtless finding that age had rendered it unsavoury, but he was still using under the new name the stock-in-trade, medical and literary, of the old firm. Notwithstanding the warnings given against him in Truth during last year, and the inclusion of his name in the 1910 Cautionary List, he must have done a good deal of business at the expense of the deaf—who seem to be the most profitable section of the community for the operations of the quack medico. He must have advertised pretty freely in India and the Colonies, for I have had innumerable inquiries about the Aural Remedies Company from those parts, even down to the last week. It seems, though I did not know this till the other day, that he also ran a dental business in Oxford Street. The "M.D.," on the strength of which the press has raised him to the dignity of "Dr.," is a by-product of an American homœopathic college, and I have always understood that Crippen is a native of the Great Republic. Of course, the fact that a man

A moneylending circular printed in colour with a gold underlining in the gaudy style affected by the late Isaac Gordon is now being sent out broadcast by Fred Watts, 95, Jermyn Street, W. Peers, privy councillors, clergymen, solicitors, and in fact men of all sorts and conditions have commended this pest to my attention. His alias and his real name (David Freedman) have, however, been inscribed in the Truth Cautionary List for some years past.

A collector named Barnard has lately been working Slough and its neighbourhood on behalf of the London and Suburban Philanthropic Association (No. 25 Truth Cautionary List). He purports to be a B.A., but I have no means of knowing what university is claimed by him as his alma mater, though from his present profession one would imagine that if not already a graduate he will soon be entitled to academic honours in the art of begging.

From an inquiry received a few days ago it seems that the lady who calls herself Eleonora Gordon-Cumming is still begging at large under colour of disposing of her pictures. She is begging pretty successfully, too, as shown by a subscription list in which no less than £36 is credited to half a dozen subscribers. A recipient of the appeal asks my advice about it. All I can say is that people's names are not put into the Truth Cautionary List without good reason, and in view of the public proceedings in which Mrs. Nakeska—to give her the only name which she has any right to—has figured, it is surprising that so many wealthy purses should be opened to her.

The free portrait gentry change their names and addresses so freely that I hear with surprise that the Munich Artists' Guild (No. 702 Truth Cautionary List) is still trading under its old name at 21, Cowper Street, Leeds. The information comes from a Lincolnshire gentleman into whose house one of the firm's touts forced his way on the plea that he was expected by the lady of the house, who is an invalid. Unfortunately, my correspondent was away from home, or his intrusion would have been followed by a forcible extrusion.

MANNERS OR MORALS?

["Your morals are only your habits; do not call other people immoral because they have other habits."—G. S. Shaw.]

The burglar bold who bursts the bolt,
  The footpad on the prowl,
The "tough" who wields his deadly "colt,"
  The gipsy, poaching fowl,
The "flat-trap" fishing for the "jay,"
  The welsher on the course,
The spark who loves and runs away,
  The culprit in divorce,
The burly brute who beats his wife,
  The man who kicks his dog,
The alien handy with his knife,
  The coachman on the flog.
All these in G. B. Shaw's regard
  Are equal to the best,
Nor should they coldly be debarred
  Of social interest;
Far less should we such folk accuse
  Of immorality,
Because the "habits" that they use
  Seem strange to you and me.

A Canadian correspondent who has not seen the references in Truth last year to the Women's Domestic Guild of Canada has from personal observation arrived at practically the same conclusion as myself, that the Guild is nothing more than a scheme for exploiting servants by Mrs. F. W. Francis, of Montreal. The figures he gives in support of his conclusion are interesting. Any one wishing to engage a maid from the Guild is charged one dollar registration fee. When the maid is secured the mistress pays two-thirds of the wages to the Guild until the amount reaches 45 dollars, the cost charged to the girl for bringing her out. As the cost of emigration through the ordinary shipping channels is 30 dollars, the Guild thus secures 15 dollars profit per head. In addition there is the Government capitation grant of 10 dollars, making the total gross profit per head 26 dollars. My correspondent has been told on application at the Guild that the girls are all bespoken before their arrival, so that there can be little expenditure in connection with the finding of places for them. As on my last reference to this concern Mrs. Francis was warmly defended by apologists in this country, I should be interested to hear what they have to say to these figures.

A legal friend who has been looking into the conditions of the "record offer" of Answers, referred to the other day in Truth, argues that it is inconceivable that any one will ever win the £5,000 prize. I am not so sure about that, for the reasons already given. In these birth-rate competitions the limits of variation in the birth-rate in any given place can be ascertained pretty accurately from the records, and it is simply a question whether the competitor will spend enough money in coupons to submit the number of predictions that is necessary in order to make him virtually safe of having one of them right. Whether he has to do this in the case of one town or eight does not affect the principle of the thing. What, of course, it does affect is the amount of money that must be spent on coupons. The wicked part of these competitions seems to me to be that the strongest possible inducement is held out to those competitors who really mean business to put in all the money they can afford, and possibly more, and that those whose expenditure is limited are the most certain to waste their money.

---

It is, of course, possible that no one will give all the right numbers. There will be sixteen of them altogether, as both deaths and births have to be predicted in eight places. In that case the "record offer" comes to nothing, and the winner takes only a prize of £1,000 for the set of predictions which come nearest to the official figures. Whether £5,000 is paid, however, or £1,000, the promoters can probably reckon with fair certainty on making a profit out of their generosity. It is only a question whether the profit is to be £4,000 more or less.

Recently an advertisement appeared in the Manchester Guardian stating that an author, journalist and editor of a London paper required a well-educated pupil assistant, to whom was offered a good salary and sub-editorship when competent, in return for a moderate premium. Response to the advertisement produced a reply from a Mr. Eustace Smith, of Hendre Hall, Llwyngwril, Merioneth, who enclosed a card which revealed him as manager of the Wake Up England League, with which is incorporated the Peace Promoting Society. The League owns a paper called the Alarum, and it is in connection with this publication that the pupil assistant is required.

Mr. Eustace Smith's ideas have evidently enlarged since last March, when I referred to his Peace Promoting Society. The two enterprises might not at first sight appear to run in parallel lines, in spite of their amalgamation, but there is precious little difference between the methods adopted by the promoter. My attention was drawn to Mr. Eustace Smith by the fact that he was advertising for branch managers, to whom he offered salaries of £3 a week, subject to security in the shape of a deposit of £50, and there is a striking similarity between this method of recruiting Peace Promoters and asking for premiums from journalistic pupils. The prime object of the League is "to rouse the country from its lethargy," and this method might conceivably have an inspiring effect upon a portion of the community, whose action would, however, hardly promote Mr. Smith's peace of mind. In the interests of all parties, therefore, I would suggest that Mr. Smith's Alarum should be regarded as a note of warning rather than as a call to instant action.

THE SPADGER AND THE EAGLE.

A Fable.

The birds—so ancient poets sing—
An eagle chose to be their King;
And all to his control deferred
Except one little spadger-bird,
Who lost no chance his view to state,
That kings and such were out of date.

So when the eagle held his court
With pomp and show of every sort,
This spadger-bird, as spadgers will,
Turned up thereat his little bill,
And unconcealed contempt displayed
For all the servile fuss they made.

Now one sad day, it fell at last,
The eagle to his fore-birds passed;
But when the owl sent out invites
To join in the funereal rites,
No invitation he conferred
Upon our little spadger-bird.

The spadger-bird was very sick;
He said it was a meagre trick
To rob him of his right most plain
Of hopping in the funeral train;
So to the owl he did a flit
And asked him what he meant by it.

The owl replied: "Dear spadger-bird,
From you this protest seems absurd.
When all things Royal you despise,
Why value Royal obsequies,
And feel aggrieved you can't adorn
A servile show which moves your scorn?"

SCRUTATOR.

PARLIAMENTARY BREACH OF PROMISE.

I AM not myself a suffragette, but humani nihil a me alienum puto, and I can heartily enter into the feelings of suffragettes in regard to the dealings of the House of Commons with Mr. Shackleton's Bill. After debating this measure exhaustively for two days, the House voted its second reading by a majority of 109. Having done this, it proceeded to consign the Bill to perdition by a majority of 145. The 161 Liberals who voted for the second reading were reduced to 100 when it became a question of giving the Bill a chance of passing; the 87 Unionists were reduced to 29. Only the Nationalists and the Labour men made a show of constancy in their affection for the female voter. Well may the suffragette exclaim that men were deceivers ever! They may dabble one foot in the sea of feminism, but the other remains firmly fixed on the shore of masculine ascendency.

For the most part this has ever been the attitude of the M.P.s who have plighted their troth to the political woman. At the best sentiment seems to be but platonic. Only here and there, in the case of a Mill, or a Courtney, or a Maclaren, does it take the form of a great and absorbing passion. Not infrequently it resembles calf-love, which dies a natural death with the growth of the beard and enlarged knowledge of the world—and of women. A mere change of air from the country to Westminster will often cure an infatuation of this type, for absence does not always make the heart grow fonder. But in the vast majority of cases the parade of affection is mere pretence and humbug. It generally begins with a thoughtless flirtation at election times, when the candidate is saying sweet things to everybody as a matter of business. The fair charmer is at such times on the war-path—almost putting herself up to the highest bidder. The candidate is lured on to say one indiscreet thing after another, until she suddenly proposes to him, and he is afraid to say No. Having spoken the fatal word, he feels that he may as well go through with the thing decently, and he loses no opportunity of beslavering the beloved object with fulsome compliments, and vowing eternal constancy. He comes up to Westminster an engaged man, trusting to the chapter of accidents to deliver him from an action for breach of promise. Then one day, to his dismay, she confronts him on the floor of the House and calls on him, by the mouth of Mr. Shackleton or some other stalwart champion, to redeem his pledge. His plight is pitiful. He is ready to seize on any subterfuge that offers temporary respite. He will be called away to the Continent on business; he will have an attack of influenza or an important appointment with his dentist. Luckily for him he is only one of a great body of fickle swains all in the same boat. Between them they can generally engineer some dodge for giving their ladies the slip. At one time they used generally to devote themselves to getting the Bill talked out. Lately, owing to the increasing persistency and astuteness of the females, they have been compelled to come up to the scratch and vote, leaving the ultimate result to the chapter of Parliamentary accidents. But never till last week have they made such a demonstration of their faithlessness and insincerity as to carry the second reading and get rid of the Bill by a side wind all in one sitting.

One need not be a woman suffragist to resent this calculated perfidy. To trifle with the affections of confiding females is bad enough. But the Parliamentary supporters of votes for women trifle with a good deal more than that. Unfortunately, this question is a man's question quite as much as a woman's. I am not one of those who see the opening of imaginary "floodgates" and the consequent subversion of society in every novel political proposal; on the contrary, my experience is that even the most drastic political measures generally produce very much less effect in practice than is predicted of them in theory. But the transference of the balance of political power in this country from men to women, which is what the enfranchisement of women must lead to sooner or later, cannot fail to have very serious consequences for men, either for better or worse. At present the great majority of men consider that it would be very much for the worse. Whether they are right or wrong, they are strongly opposed to this measure, and they have a right to protest when other men lend countenance to any such proposal half-heartedly and insincerely. It has always been notorious that half the members who have voted for Women's Suffrage Bills have done so comforting themselves with the reflection that the question was purely academic, and that there was no chance of their votes leading to any practical result. But, as a matter of fact, we can see very substantial results. By conveying a false impression of the attitude of representative males towards the women's movement these votes in the House of Commons stimulate the agitation and weaken the opposition to it. It is a disquieting fact that the votes in favour of Women's Suffrage Bills in Parliament tend to grow, without any evidence of increased conviction or sincerity of purpose on the part of the voters. If this sort of thing goes on, we may awake some morning to find that the Legislature has conferred the Parliamentary franchise on women in a fit of temporary aberration, and without the slightest intention of doing anything of the kind. There has never before been any such frivolous trifling with big questions of political reform. Why should it be reserved for the most far-reaching of them all?

EXIT MAJOR CHRISTOPHERS.

There has been of late a most marked disinclination on the part of the gentry who consider themselves aggrieved by remarks made concerning them and their doings in Truth to face a judge and jury. One after another they have withdrawn their actions, and thereby practically admitted the justice of the criticisms I have passed upon them. The last of these belligerents who has arrived at the conclusion that discretion is the better part of valour is Major Christophers, D.S.O., the late secretary to Tattersall's Committee. Major Christophers considered that he had been libelled in articles which appeared in Truth on October 23 last and the following weeks, and he accordingly issued a writ. The action followed the usual course. When it became necessary for him to answer certain interrogatories, Major Christophers, like so many other plaintiffs in libel actions, found it inconvenient to do so. Messrs. Lewis and Lewis obtained an order of the Court dismissing the action, with costs, unless he made an affidavit of his inability to comply with the order directing him to answer the interrogatories. The affidavit has not been made, for the very good reason that the gallant Major is now on his way to New Zealand, and the action therefore stands dismissed.

The circumstances out of which this abortive action arose were as follows:—On December 31, 1907, a lady, whom it is sufficient to describe as Mrs. A., received a letter from a firm of starting-price bookmakers styling themselves Richard Brown and Co., then of 12, Suffolk Street, and afterwards of 35, Old Bond Street, soliciting her business, and giving the name of Major Christophers, who was at that time secretary of Tattersall's Committee, as a reference. Naturally any backer could not expect to receive a more satisfactory reference than the secretary of Tattersall's Committee, and in due course Mrs. A. opened an account with R. Brown and Co. Eventually she won a sum of £17 13s. 1d. R. Brown and Co. refused to pay, giving as their reason that the place of origin of her telegrams making the bets was given as Post Office, London, N., while the lady lived in the West End, they deducing from this fact that their client had broken their rules by lending her name to a third party. Mrs. A. furnished immediately the sufficient explanation that the "N." was merely the mark of the Post Office to indicate that the telegram had been telephoned through the National Telephone Company. R. Brown and Co. still refused to pay. Mrs. A. thereupon placed the matter before the Turf Guardian Society, who invited the firm to submit the case to them for adjudication. When the case came before the society for hearing, Major Christophers was disclosed as proprietor of the business of R. Brown and Co., and he himself appeared before the committee. Judgment went against him. He still refused to pay, and at this point the matter was laid before me. That an officer holding the D.S.O. and lately the secretary of Tattersall's Committee should be guilty of conduct indistinguishable from that of a common welsher was clearly a matter deserving publicity, and what made his conduct worse was the fact that at the time these transactions commenced Major Christophers was actually occupying the position of secretary to Tattersall's Committee, and under the alias of R. Brown and Co. giving himself as a reference to persons whom he approached with a view to getting them to open an account with him. I accordingly published particulars of the transaction with appropriate comments. The immediate result was that I received a letter from Major Christophers' solicitors, and on my declining to modify my opinion of the Major's conduct, he commenced his action.

It is no matter for surprise that he has now thought better of it and left the country, for had he come to trial, I should have been able to prove, not only the facts above stated, but also that when instructing his solicitor to inform me that he had no connection with the firm of R. Brown and Co. on December 31, 1907, he was wilfully stating what he knew to be false.

All cheques and P.O.O.s should be made payable to The Manager of Truth, and addressed to Truth Buildings, Carteret Street, London, S.W.

To do this it would only have been necessary to submit to the jury certain documents in my possession. These consist of accounts furnished by R. Brown and Co. to a client prior to December 31, 1907, together with undoubted specimens of Major Christophers' handwriting with which to compare them. The similarity in the penmanship is so marked that it would probably satisfy any juryman that they were the work of the same hand. But to make assurance double sure, I have had the documents submitted to Mr. Gurrin, the well-known expert in such matters, and his analysis leaves no possibility of doubt in the matter.

The reader will understand after this why Major Christophers has set out for the Antipodes rather than face the music of the Law Courts—incidentally leaving me to pay the piper after he has called the tune. He is obviously an unprincipled rascal, and the position which he occupies in the Army List makes it important that his true character should be known far and wide. Some little time ago the attention of the War Office was called by the Anti-Gambling League to the fact that this gallant officer and bearer of the Distinguished Service decoration was carrying on a starting-price bookmaker's business. The War Office replied to the effect that as the charges against the officer in question were the subject of litigation they were unable to take action. That consideration no longer applies, and I confidently invite the attention of the War Office authorities to the full facts of the case as above stated. Whether it is legitimate for an officer of the Army to carry on a betting business is a question with which I am not concerned. This is a case in which an officer and a member of the Distinguished Service Order is charged with welshing. He is further charged with making use of a position of trust which he occupied in the sporting world to give references to himself in a betting business which he carried on under an alias. He at first repudiates the charges, but when faced with the necessity of meeting them he ignominiously bolts from the country. If the War Office authorities desire the evidence of this I shall be pleased to place it at their service, and I do not suppose that they will have any difficulty in coming to a satisfactory decision upon it.

A MACAURA MIRACLE.

The following interesting item of fashionable intelligence caught my eye in the Star one evening last week:—

WELL KNOWN DOCTOR'S CHAUFFEUR FINED.

At Beaconsfield Police Court yesterday the chauffeur employed by Dr. Gerald Macaura, inventor of the Macaura machine, was fined £5 and £3 8s. 6d. costs for exceeding the speed limit.

Dr. Macaura explained that he was behind with his appointments with several important patients, and was at the time on his way to the residence of the Earl and Countess Roberts at Ascot.

This is indeed a gem, and if Macaura paid no more for it than the £8 8s. 6d. exacted by the Beaconsfield bench, he has got his puff dirt cheap at the price. Who can fail to be impressed by the spectacle of this "well-known doctor"—well-known, presumably, through his blatant advertisements in the daily papers and his proud position in TRUTH Cautionary List—rushing about the country in his motor-car from one fashionable patient to another, and breaking the law rather than miss his appointment to attend upon one of Britain's most honoured sons? But I am now going to give this "well-known doctor"—whom I should prefer to describe as an audacious Yankee quack—another advertisement, entirely free of charge, which may perhaps impress the public in a somewhat different way.

As already mentioned in TRUTH, Macaura is the inventor of an appliance which he terms his Great Blood Circulator. It is a mechanical instrument for the local application of vibration to parts affected by disease. Doubtless mechanical massage, applied with due knowledge and under proper precautions, has its definite place in medical treatment. But Macaura claims more than this for his machine. According to his statements in an advertisement which appeared in the Daily Mail on July 5, this remarkable invention "in from five to fifteen minutes loosens stiff joints, revivifies paralysed nerves and muscles, stimulates the circulation, restores functional activity and metabolic efficiency, and even brings back the blessed gift of Hearing to many deaf and partially deaf people." This is followed by "typical examples of the splendid effects of the Macaura machine." Here is one of them:—

After 20 Years' Deafness—Can Now Hear the Horses Trotting in the Street.

3, Bloxon's Buildings, Camberwell Green.
May 12, 1910.

Sir,—20 years ago, whilst at the Parsonage, Denmark Hill, I lost my hearing through being thrown against a wall by a vicious pig. To-day, for the first time in many years, I have heard the horses trotting in the street. Thank God! I am, indeed, truly grateful! I am only too glad to have the above published in the hopes that it may reach some others. Yours truly, THOMAS TRUNLEY.

This purports to be a statement of the wonder-working effect of the Macaura machine, written by one who has experienced it. Now, I have had Mr. Trunley interviewed, and unfortunately he is as deaf as ever he was. It is true that he went to the Macaura Institute, and that after an application of the Health Machine he heard, or thought that he heard, horses trotting in the street. But the effect, if any, was merely transient. To-day he is no better and no worse than before he made the acquaintance of Macaura. But that is not the only point. Mr. Trunley assures me that he neither wrote himself, nor authorised any one else to write the above letter. He asserts, in fact, that it is an absolute fabrication.

Nor is Mr. Trunley's the only testimonial published in the same advertisement which is repudiated by the alleged writer. Directly following this letter come the following passages:—

Are you deaf? Is your hearing difficult? Read also the two following testimonies to the wonder-working cures brought about by the "Macaura Machine."

Why not visit Clavier Hall and have a similar free trial of the "Macaura Machine?"

Can Now Hear After 44 Years' Deafness.

59, Russell Gardens, Stangate Street,
Westminster Bridge Road, London, S.W.

Dear Sir,
I have been stone deaf with left ear for 44 years and partially deaf with right ear, and can now hear after first treatment at Dr. Macaura's place. Yours truly,
FREDERICK MANN.

What does Mr. Mann say about the wonderful cure worked in his case?

At the first trial by putting his mouth against my left ear and speaking loud I could hear him say "Are you better?" which I could not hear before . . . . With my right ear I could, until two years ago, hear a watch tick and then I went deaf in that ear. To-day I have heard better with my right ear, not from the machine, but because I have been putting drops of olive-oil in my ear and that has done it. . . . I did not put that letter in the paper, nor give them permission to do so. I am greatly annoyed and told them so. I signed a paper saying I could hear them after shouting in my left ear. I would not buy a machine. . . . I should not give any one advice to get a machine until I have had treatment for a month.

Mr. Mann's repudiation differs only in degree from that of Mr. Trunley's. The transient effect of any vibration treatment in dealing with some forms of deafness is well recognised, and is best illustrated by the generally known fact that deaf people often hear better in a railway train while it is in motion than in the normal stillness of a room. If it is not known to Macaura and his assistants they must be strangely ignorant of the affliction they profess to cure. The reader can form his own opinion of the "doctor" who gets hold of a deaf patient, produces a temporary improvement in his condition by means which he must or should know can effect no permanent result, persuades him to sign a document which represents him to be "cured," and straightway publishes a garbled edition of the "testimonial" in order to gull sufferers from a similar affliction into purchasing the machine which has worked the miracle.

Macaura's dealings with members of the peerage do not interest me. If persons of position and education choose to play with quackery that is their concern. They have the means and the opportunity of discovering what modicum of truth is concealed beneath the blatant pretensions of the quack. But with the man in the street for whom Macaura advertises the case is different. He has neither the knowledge that should put him on his guard against such preposterous pretensions nor the time to investigate the bona fides of testimonials. He has a childlike faith in the printed word, fostered by a belief that newspapers do not print even in their advertisement columns anything which is wilfully false. The consequence is that a practitioner of the Macaura type can come to London, rent the Albert Hall for a popular optical demonstration of his miracles, fill the columns of newspapers with delusive claptrap, and reap his return in the shape of a huge revenue from the suffering and afflicted. I am glad to be able to show for once in a way upon what gross and heartless fictions such a business is built.

WOMEN I HAVE MET.

The Agency Woman.

The Agency Woman has neither office, ledgers, nor clients. Instead, she has charitable impulses, a love of action, and protégés of both sexes. Long ago she discovered what a beautiful thing it is to succour the human race indiscriminately—to help the needy, clothe the seedy, feed the greedy; long ago, too, she discovered a way of accomplishing her great work in life with a maximum of service from her friends and a minimum of discomfort to herself—for, when you are working on a large scale, you must know when to let other people do things. Being of a trusting nature, she sets other charitable institutions at loggerheads by taking her protégés always at their own valuation, with a little bit thrown in. For, beside this method being less trouble, she sees the poetic side of life in poor widows who lost all the fortunes they never had in the South African War; in cooks, whose inability to cook is due merely to the fact that they once had a house of their own, and kept a servant; in gentlemen, who, having escaped from Siberia in a barrel, only polish your boots because their ungrateful country misunderstood the noblest of her sons. "St. Francis would always have given the poor things the benefit of the doubt," she says reproachfully, when the cook who cannot cook invites her chief male friend to finish your cold mutton, and ends by securing enough of your house-linen to make herself quite comfortable. The Agency Woman knows numbers of distressed tutors, would-be secretaries, neglected poets, and all of them invariably type beautifully, know several languages perfectly, and are just the very persons you have been looking for all your life. When you are foolish enough to succumb to her importunities and representations "to give the poor things a chance" you find just as invariably that, as a general rule, they would not dream of learning to type, but that, to oblige their kind friend—not you, but the Agency Woman—they are willing to learn on your machine; that they have learnt French at school, much as did you yourself before you went abroad, and that it has irrevocably ruined their capacity for writing even the simplest English; that, being literary, they cannot consent to your suggestion that they should prostitute their art to the extent of doing something you really want. When you finally dismiss them in despair, or, rather, when they feel they cannot put up with your Philistinism any longer, they tell you in a resigned tone, that, of course, everybody can't be expected to be like the Agency Woman.

Feeling herself to be working in a cause both good and right, the Agency Woman troubles herself no more with conventions than with the antecedents of her protégés. Should you chance to mention in the hearing of a friend of hers, that a friend of yours is looking for a secretary for a friend of his, she will demand the address of your friend without the slightest scruples on the ground of knowing neither him nor you. Big with the importance of her mission, and, incidentally preferring the prestige of a personal meeting to the trouble of writing letters, she does not hesitate to descend upon his bachelor flat, and, finding him to be out, to write him a letter upon his own stamped notepaper, wherein she explains that she has found him just the person for the post—"and a particular friend of my own." This last would, of course, be more enlightening had he any idea of the Agency Woman's identity. She further intimates in pencil that it is clearly his bounden duty to sacrifice himself, if necessary, to such a deserving object. Nor, when your friend writes politely to explain his firm conviction that the protégé is much too good for the post, is she at all daunted. Having herself grown a little tired of the business, she sends the protégé in person, armed with a visiting card of her own. I have often wondered, by the way, why she troubles about the visiting card, since she does not know your friend any more than does the protégé, but it may be just her nice nature. And for some weeks after, and long after the post is filled up by your unappreciative friend, he may be quite sure that unknown individuals, sullen-looking men and down-at-heel women, who consistently force themselves upon him, emanate from the Agency Woman.

Nor has the Agency Woman ever troubled herself about the greatly over-rated difficulties of square pegs in round holes. As she truly says, people are so absurdly particular about getting just the right person, and as the right person is usually a myth, why trouble? Given the situation, the Agency Woman undertakes to fill it, and, since she has the trouble of providing the filling, it is only fair that you should have the trouble of finding out what that filling can do. As its accomplishments are usually nil, the trouble is reduced to a minimum.

It is only fair that the Agency Woman should get a certain satisfaction out of her efforts; that they should make her feel a universal benefactor; that the thanks of the protégés should give her a not unpleasing sense of power. It is with thoughts such as these that she comforts herself when her friends round ungratefully upon her. It is, indeed, owing to this ingratitude that she has come to the conclusion that the less she knows you the more suitable are the opportunities offered by you for disposing of protégés.

WOMEN AND WAR AT WESTMINSTER.

THE two days' debate devoted to Votes for Women was a very go-as-you-please affair, and singularly inconclusive. The Government allowed us to speak and vote just as we pleased on the main question, but when it came to hanging up the Bill for the rest of the Session they turned their official Whips on and mustered as many of us as were willing to resign our new-found and brief measure of freedom. I cannot quite see the necessity for the debate, since it was so engineered in the end as to be inoperative. If the Prime Minister wanted to demonstrate to the country that he has so much time to waste that a couple of full Parliamentary days can be easily spared at this period of the Session (although we all know that the Finance Bill is to be postponed in order to eke out the autumn sitting), he has achieved his purpose, but I doubt the wisdom of the policy. The country at large does not appear to be vastly interested in our doings at Westminster just at present, but we might at least give them a semblance of effective work, and a mere Friday afternoon's talk spread over a brace of Government days hardly conveys that impression. If, on the other hand, he was anxious to placate the suffrage people, he might have screwed up his courage a point higher and given facilities for the passage of the Bill through its remaining stages if it could command a consistent majority—a disputable contingency in view of the alacrity with which members voted in favour of retaining it in Committee of the whole House. As things are, we seem only to have raised the hopes of women in order to dash them, and if it be true that hell has no fury like a woman scorned (in the political sense, of course) there may be consequences for which the Government will not be wholly irresponsible. It was the very hint of these consequences, rather indiscreetly dropped by Mr. McLaren—a passionate advocate of the cause, so far as one of his clan can simulate passion—that led to the sincerest and most striking passages in the debate. Mr. Asquith, defying the suffragette lightning, rose to a fine height of dignity and courage, winning the only spontaneous cheers in the encounter. Mr. Balfour echoed the sentiments in a speech that was even more than usually elusive and indeterminate, although his involved train of reasoning managed to carry him into the lobby in favour of the Bill; while Mr. Runciman, though strongly supporting the measure, valiantly declared his desire to share any of the dog-whips, dinner-bells, and other of the gentle arts of persuasion to which his anti-suffrage colleagues may be subjected presently. For the rest of the debate, it had interesting moments with long stretches of dulness, and at one point suffered the ignominy of a "count" owing to the languid attendance.

From the ladies' battle we moved to the fierce themes of masculine warfare. The Navy demanded our attention, but on our way we incidentally touched on the Army. Wednesday had been spent on the Education Vote, and up till ten o'clock a few learned professors had babbled blamelessly about technical schools and the like, with Mr. Runciman, not as yet immolated in voluntary self-sacrifice on the suffragette altar, gravely conducting affairs from the Treasury bench. The eleven o'clock rule had been suspended, apparently by common consent, and no danger seemed to threaten, but by ten o'clock the Tories began to saunter negligently into the House and our Whips were quickly on the alert, sending right and left for the reserve men. The enemy began to challenge divisions, once knocking our majority down to twenty-seven, and we only managed to carry the closure with a spare ten votes above the required minimum of 100. We were in rather a corner, and matters did not improve at midnight, when Mr. Haldane chose the occasion to deliver his belated reply to the charges brought ten days earlier by Major Adam, of Woolwich, against the Army Council, with a special reference to General Scobell. I commented at the time on the surprise with which we noted the failure of the War Secretary to respond immediately to Major Adam's challenge, and we were scarcely less astonished by his action on Wednesday night. It was after midnight—an hour when the newspapers begin to report Parliament in summary; Mr. Haldane waved Mr. Wyndham aside and insisted on speaking first, thereby losing his right of reply on the debate in general; and—he had failed to inform Major Adam of his intention to deal with the question. The House felt its inability to interfere in these delicate matters in a judicial capacity, and would gladly have been relieved of the ordeal of listening to them. But in view of the importance of the matter Mr. Haldane had provided himself with a typewritten document which he read at great speed, and it was amid a general feeling of sympathy that Major Adam, a young member, rose on the spur of the moment to confront the refutations of his case As I have said, the House generally was unwilling to be dragged into the affair; there was very little cheering and no sign of party feeling; but somehow one had a dim idea that the War Secretary had not quite played the game, and that he might have made his case (on the merits of which I do not pretend to be competent to express an opinion) at a more reasonable hour and under more open conditions. The immediate result was personally inconvenient to many of us, for the Tories, led by "Alec" in a most bellicose mood, had their dander up, and kept us sitting till half-past three in the morning.

The assault by the economists on the Navy Estimates proved to be a relatively mild affair. Mr. John Dillon was selected to lead it, and I cannot help thinking that our earnest friends below the gangway might have made a happier choice. Mr. Dillon is an experienced campaigner, but the Old Hand assures me that his power as a Parliamentarian does not increase. As long as he can employ a sounding string of tremendous adjectives he appears to be content, leaving the argumentative facts to wriggle about as best they may. Nobody likes the expenditure of millions on the Services that we are called upon to make, but it does not help matters dialectically merely to call them "bloated armaments."

All this martial talk fired me to journey to Bisley on the Saturday to witness the competition of Lords v. Commons. For the honour of our side I am glad to think that our fellows just pulled it off by eight points, but if the Lords had not included one lame duck in their team (introduced, I understand, against his will and as a makeshift) they might have beaten us, and then—what on earth would have happened to the Conference? The public little realised the issues dependent on that desperate contest at 500 and 600 yards before the Century Butts last Saturday. It was at least comforting to discover what ordinary beings the Peers appeared in their cloth caps and thick boots and smoking their briar pipes. In their own House they are so stiff and starchy as to be a bit overwhelming, but on the Bisley ranges one could almost claim them as men and brothers.

I was so encouraged by our meeting on Saturday that on Monday afternoon I dropped into the House of Lords to have another look at them. Primarily my object was to escape the Scotch Estimates, which from a brief but sufficient taste of them appear to rank among those things that no fellow can understand. Appropriately enough I found the Lords talking about war again. The Earl of Portsmouth had originated it, and the Old Hand reminds me that he is one of "C. B.'s" failures, having been superseded as Under-Secretary for War by young Lord Lucas, whom everybody seems to like. Lord Portsmouth drifted from the front Ministerial bench to a place below the gangway, then to that "home for lost causes," the cross-benches, until finally he has frankly reached the Opposition side. He had nothing to say about the Territorials and their ability to resist invasion which has not been said with more authority by the Duke of Bedford and other experts. Lord Crewe chaffed him out of his skin, complimenting him on "the ability with which he has raised the question," and congratulating him on "the increased interest he has taken in military matters ever since he has ceased to be responsible for them in your lordships' House." For all his suavity I should not care to get at cross purposes with Lord Crewe.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE KING OF THE BELGIANS.

PARIS, far more than during the Second Empire, may under the Third Republic be called le rendezvous des rois. Their State visits have become so frequent as to be commonplace—a reason why the advent of ex-President Roosevelt was perhaps such a grand success. Different circumstances connected with the visit of Albert and Elizabeth gave it a particular interest. It was also so timed as to give the Royal pair an opportunity to witness the 14th of July fête and its military accompaniments. There was something novel in a King and Queen wanting to witness the commemoration of two such events as the taking of the Bastille, and the first rush to the frontiers in 1792 of the young volunteers who answered to the cry of "La patrie est en danger." Their Belgian Majesties did not need to be reminded that Albert I.'s great grandfather served with these revolutionists as the Citizen Chartres, and in the quality of lieutenant at Jemappes, a French victory which Goethe witnessed, divining as he looked on that it opened a new cycle in the history of mankind.

The Belgian sovereigns were the observed of all observers in their morning drive to the great Longchamp review and on their way back, the King with M. Fallières, and the Queen with Madame Fallières, who took them from the Foreign Ministry and set them down again there. They left their temporary place of abode again on the revolutionary date to lunch at the Elysée with a party culled from the army and navy. An after-luncheon sight provided for them was a dirigible sailing in the air above the Elysée garden while coffee was being served on the terrace. After that they went about the city, muffled up, in a slow-going motor to see the people dancing in all the open spaces, and refreshing themselves at tables set out in the streets. At five o'clock they were at the Belgian Legation in the Far West End, took off their muffling, and appeared in their fine clothes at a reception of diplomats and of Belgians resident in Paris.

The final corvée of the day must have struck them as unheard of and astonishing had they been as conversant as their Bulgarian cousin with the state of political parties in the Chamber and aware of the ins and outs of the Rochette affair, so disagreeable for the Prefect of Police and the past and present Ministers of Justice. Not a few of the names announced by the Foreign Office usher were enough to make divers guests of M. Pichon think themselves in a dream. The well-informed ones who so well know that this Minister had no part or lot in this affair concluded that in issuing certain invitations to political men he paid a debt incurred by Briand. They had been among the 136 who voted against inquiry into the Rochette scandal. The presence of monarchists wearing false noses and impenitent ones gave food for reflection. This mot, uttered by one of them at the buffet, still circulates: "I see Cochins, D'Arenbergs, Greffuhles, Caraman-Chimays, and some pronounced clerico Royalist droitiers. Our King's staff would be complete were Luynes, Buffet, and Camille Dupuy only here." The Duc de Luynes is the designated Grand Chamberlain of Philippe VII. and Camille Dupuy the Comtesse de Paris' secretary.

It may be that foreknowledge of the Jaurès demand for inquiry into the scandal I have touched upon explains the veerings round and tacklings of M. Briand on the day on which the King of the Belgians went to hear him. All this was discussed in high places through "the Belgian week."

The late King Leopold had no taste for literature, and only cared for art as a dealer. The present one wishes to surround himself with authors and artists, and his desire was made known to M. Pichon. Lavisse, therefore, had an invitation as a representative of letters, Besnard of painting, Rodin of sculpture, Saint-Saëns of music, and Hervieux of anti-society novels. M. Doumergue was disabled from coming as Minister of Public Instruction by his badly wounded hand. In his haste to exclude a draught from the Royal compartment of the train to Versailles his fingers came between the sliding door and the lintel and were badly crushed. Albert I. applied a salve in the form of the Grand Cordon of the Order of Leopold.

What is the use of voting Civil Lists I sometimes ask myself, as I think how handsomely Presidents of our Republic do things when called on to entertain Emperors and Kings? Here is a rather striking fact to show that they stand higher in Europe than Napoleon III., who, one way or another, had as great a Civil List as the Emperor of Russia gives himself. Eugénie was treated as not visitable by the wives of the different potentates who came to the World Show of 1867. The Queen of Prussia, Augusta, did come, but by herself, with the smallest possible suite, and declined an invitation to make herself at home at the Tuileries or the Elysée. She declined on the ground that she had only brought street dress with her, and had nothing fit to be seen in a Court circle. She did pay a visit at the Tuileries in her tourist's clothes, but refused all entertainment there. The Empress of Austria followed the example of the Empress of Russia in not coming with the Emperor. The Queen of the Belgians was constrained by Leopold II. to come to the Exhibition and receive hospitality at the Tuileries, but she felt mortified at what seemed to her an encanaillement, and behaved with revolting rudeness.

What have we been seeing since 1896? In that year Mme. Félix Faure acted as hostess to the Emperor and Empress of Russia, whose visit was followed by that of the Queen Regent and Queen of the Netherlands. Some time later Mme. Loubet acted as hostess at Compiègne to the same Imperial Russians and successively of Queens Alexandra, Helen, and Amélie. Mme. Fallières has had to lunch and dinner a great variety of Queens—to wit, of Portugal, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Bulgaria, and lastly Belgium—and all marvelled at the elegant style of the entertainments provided for them. Remember that the President receives, save on very exceptional occasions, no allowance for hospitality, and M. Loubet received under that head but 600,000 frs. in 1900. Think what he had to do with it in giving hospitality, not merely to sovereigns, but eminent men and their wives from everywhere, to notable exhibitors, exhibition juries, to the mayors of about 30,000 communes, for whom, in batches of 7,000, there were garden parties with sumptuous buffets.

The President's wife enjoys with the sovereign ladies she receives and takes about a friendly intimacy that makes relations with them easy and agreeable. She begins her acquaintance when the visit is official in the railway station of the Bois. While the President accompanies the King into Paris, in a handsome victoria, drawn by four fine dark bays, Mme. Fallières follows at a short distance in the landau ordered by M. Casimir-Périer on the morrow of his election. It is singularly high hung. The steps fold up within the door, so that if an anarchist crank, knife in hand, wanted to get at the occupants he must be baulked. The august guest is to La Présidente's right, as is that of the President. Cavalry with drawn swords, and for the nonce spick and span surround the equipages. The suites, in nice enough carriages, bring up the rear. The President expects no pension. He has some petits bénéfices outside his salary, such as vegetables from the King's kitchen gardens at Versailles, fruits from the Fontainebleau espaliers, game from those State forests where he has shooting, and grass for his horses in the low ground at Rambouillet. The State pays his men servants in the stables only, but allows for the coachman, though not for a chauffeur or secretaries. He has his military and naval staff at the cost of the War and Marine Ministries. The wife of Colonel Chamoin, the military secretary of Carnot and Félix Faure, was glad to go about as dame pour accompagner with Mmes. Carnot and Faure. She had rooms with the colonel on the second floor of the Elysée. La Générale Pittie used to accompany Mme. and Mlle. Grévy on a similar footing, which she found in many ways agreeable and advantageous. A couple of grave, gentlemanly ushers in black Court dress discharge the function of grooms-in-waiting. Oscar II., noticing to me their style, said: "A Français actor could not play his part better."

M. Faure obtained of the Budget Committee when he expected the Imperial Russians the means for building and keeping up a palace train. Railway companies, when the President goes into the provinces officially, are glad to give it—and any extra carriages he may want—the freedom of their lines for the sake of the business this brings. This enables him to reserve the 200,000 frs. allowed for travelling expenses for tips to railway servants, domestics at Prefectures, and for charities. He never gives less than 500 frs. to the railway servants. His contributions to charity funds at the hospitals he visits and donations to mayors for the poor are heavy. He is also expected to subscribe to relief funds for victims of fires, floods, and other disasters. Yet he contrives to save money.

It is worth noticing that no President has been brought into any financial scandal. Nobody now thinks of blaming President Grévy for the use Wilson made of his official stamp to frank his letters or of his traffic in the Red Ribbon. I knew James Blaine to laugh till his eyes ran over with tears at the hubbub made about the franking of the letters.

M. Fallières is master in the art of neat, amiable, and finely-pointed speaking with a toast for the climax. The King of the Belgians has French grace and clearness. What is very rare, all that he said at the Elysée had a tone of sincerity. This enhanced the cordial spirit running through all that he said. He is free from the flippancy of his uncle, and impresses one as being a little awkward, but not a godiche. While his language is not at all Belgian, his appearance in his military uniform and trappings is very much so. I suppose this might be accounted for by unconscious imitation from infancy upwards of those around him, for there is nothing Flemish or Walloon in his blood. He looked bulkier in the padded out uniform of a General of Division than in the long Macfarlane that he wore at the great aviation tournament held last year at Bethény. With a chauffeur's cap over his eyes we did not then see the pale gold fairness of his hair and beard, and he seemed more the German professor than aught else. The nearness of sight and the large glasses were more noticeable this time than then. Persons who know Belgium observed that in another uniform he might be taken for a nice, kindly, and honest sergeant of the Belgian Garde Civique. He looks the character that he has for patience in hard work, in exploring savage lands, as a hunter in tropical countries—a field in which he might give heavy odds to "Notre Ami Teddy" and beat him. In the life the late King led him and in spite of the fear of a young Vaughan stepping up to the throne before him, he kept an even temper, quite unruffled, and sought compensations in study, music, and family, acting as professor to his children. One of his convictions is that the wealth of a country depends on the brains of the people. He very much addicted himself to the study of co-operation, of how to harmonise the relations of capital and labour and free the latter from the tyranny of the former, which is nowhere so great as in Belgium, if it be not in the Congo Free State, where white capitalists see in negroes beasts of burden only. If I say that Albert I. sympathises with Belgian joviality, do not think he loves the burgundy bottle or gourmandising. He likes too well a chop or rib steak with potatoes and a glass of light beer to be a wine toper or gourmet. There is no coronation nonsense in his head. In speaking of the Belgians at M. Fallières' table they were "my compatriots," not "my subjects."

The King of the Belgians and the King of Italy in no respect resemble each other in manner or appearance. None the less, they are on the same plane, and their moral similitude is close. Each looks on his function as being one for the promotion—the Spaniards would say the fomenting—of desirable measures and for moderating party-strife in times of crisis. There is the same analogy in diversity between Queens Helen and Elizabeth. Both, however, are unconventional, helpful, and very much the companions of their husbands. I do not know exactly how Victor Emmanuel came to choose a Montenegrin princess. Albert I. met his wife here in Paris in the Boulevard de Madrid, where she stayed with her aunt, the ex-Queen of Naples. The meeting was fortuitous. He felt at once that his future happiness depended on her, saw in her uncommon qualities, fell in love with her frankness, quick sensibility, open-hearted smile—a little broad but sunny, and showing, not on purpose, large white and even teeth. She had the phenomenal head of hair of her aunts. You may know that the Empress of Austria's fell to her heels like a mantle when she unloosed it.

The Queen's mind is now as open as her husband's. He is above all things practical. She tries to be so, and has learned to rein in enthusiasm for the arts, letters, and liberal ideas. He is not a bit afraid of democracy or Socialism. Both come out of the past life of nations, and, however governments may thwart them, will rise or fall accordingly to ancestral impulsion, and the circumstances of the world. This is fatalism. But fatality directs all things, and all that human effort can do is to pad the harness in which we are driven, we know not whither. Most of the worst crimes of governments were at all times perpetrated in the spirit of the fortune teller's client—to prevent something happening in the future. Albert wonders how any one who has seen the ancient towns of Belgium can accuse popular governments of being unfit to patronise the arts. All that they asked in the past was for the artists to answer to the needs and emotions of the time.

The Queen is very fond of the village festivities in the Ardennes. She and the King found infinite pleasure and food for reflection some years ago in rambling incog. round the country, studying provincial and local peculiarities, ethnic and lingual, and taking notes of manners, costumes, capabilities, and tendencies. She kodaked, he classified his and her observations, traits they had unexpectedly come upon. The Princess, as she then was, got in with the women and children wherever they went. They lived in inns the life of the common people, and did not disdain the rough resorts of fishers and sailors. In short, they were a pair of tramps who could pay their way. She learned the old Walloon and Flemish songs and legends. He discovered along the Flemish coast the former propensity for seamanship. Hence his efforts to lead Belgium towards maritime enterprise, and to give her a navy. The knowledge Albert and Elizabeth in their many long tramps gained of their "compatriots" is without a parallel in the lives of European monarchs.

THE NEW PEPYS.

July 12.—Saw the sun this day for the first time during a fortnight. So a pint of Bollinger to my lunch wherein to drink it health, my wife doing likewise in a dry ginger-ale.

To the club and talkt with Squillinger concerning the slanderous imputations cast upon a certain personage, which are, indeed, not only unfounded, but are even the reverse of the truth. Arising out of which, Squillinger relate a certain incident which befell not many weeks since. One of these backbiters, entertaining friends at a famous hostelry, served up to them, not alone choice provision of dainty dishes and wine, but also many a succulent slander of this great man, tastily garnished by his own invention. But at the next table, as it chanced, sat the secretary of the slandered gentleman, who overheard all that was said. Anon he rose from his chair and confronted the disseminator of falsehood in the hearing of all his guests, saying: "I happen, sir, to live on terms of intimacy with this gentleman, and I beg to inform you, to my own certain knowledge, that every one of these stories you have told against him is ridiculously false. You will, therefore, either retract them unreservedly, or the gentleman himself shall wait on you to-morrow to hear you repeat them in his presence." Whereupon the slanderer did look exceeding foolish, and, in the idiom of the vulgar, did incontinently curl up. And for this incident Squillinger voucht, having it from the secretary's own lips.

With my wife to M. Bemberg's musick party, and a vastly pleasant evening we spent hearing Melba, Backhaus, Mischa Elman, Sammarco, and other stars. All mighty good, but best, methought, were Melba and Sammarco in a duet from "Traviata," which fairly ravisht me; so that it made me sick, just as I have been when I was in love with my wife, and remained transported thereafter by the space of half-an-hour.

July 13: With General Wigg to Hurlingham and saw the final of the Army Polo; which was between the Blues and the 4th Dragoon Guards (Royal Irish); but the Paddies make an ill show and are beat to nowhere. Converst awhile with my Lady Beatrice Pole-Carew, whose husband, "Polly"-Carew (as we did always call him), I have known ever since we were lads together. And can remember my Lady Beatrice still a little girl in short frocks, whom first I saw at Eaton by Chester, where in those days she oftentimes came, her mother, my Lady Ormonde, being eldest daughter to his late Grace of Westminster. At whose wedding I was present; and a vastly pretty woman she was, so that I was consumed with an envious jealousy of my Lord Marquis the bridegroom.

Also met my Lady Chesterfield, and she had the civility to inquire of my lumbago; which pleased me.

Home by taxi, the General beguiling me the while with several pretty stories. And one was of the adventures of a certain well-known Society lady at a Turkish bath in Constantinople; mighty funny, and did tickle me amazingly; yet is the humour thereof something too purple to be set down herein.

July 14: To St. Margaret's Church for the marriage of my Lady Mary Bowes-Lyon with my Lord Elphinstone, and of a truth a union of two mighty good old Scottish families. The bride, a pretty damsel, lookt, methought, passing happy; so that this mysterious skeleton in the family cupboard of her home at Glamis, whereof such horrifick tales have been rumoured, would seem to sit lightly upon her. For it did use to be said that, as each successive heir of the Strathmores came of age, the fearsome secret was confided to him by his father. Whereafter he never smiled again. But Lord! This manner of weird fable is whispered of many an old family besides the Strathmores—as (for one example) of the Horners of Mells in Somerset. Yet would I wager my head that all are pure inventions, and only gulls and gannets so insensate as to swallow them.

A mighty smart company was assembled to witness the ceremony, and they so many that I have not space to set the tenth of them down. But of those who particularly catcht my notice were the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, my Lord Lansdowne, my Lady Carew, and my Lady Alice Shaw Stewart, with whom I have played at rounders in the days of my youth at Longleat, she being then my Lady Alice Thynne and, for a girl, a mighty featly runner.

The mention of Longleat remind me of an episode which befell, now thirty years since, on an occasion when my Lord Bath of that day was shooting his home coverts. A party of eight guns, among them the Duke of Somerset from his neighbouring seat of Maiden Bradley, and a certain banker of the neighbourhood, who had been in his time a mighty good shot, and was so still, but his eyesight had begun to fail him something, and eke was he exceeding deaf. Anon come what the sportsman do call a hot corner; and in the general fusillade this banker did pepper my Lord Duke of Somerset in the lumbar regions, who, though not much hurt, was mighty vext thereby. So he warned my Lord Bath that, unless the banker left shooting, he himself should retire from the party forthwith. Then my Lord, misliking his task, but having no option, up to the delinquent, and shout: "You have shot the Duke of Somerset." "What do you say?" quoth the deaf man, holding his hand behind his ear. To whom my Lord, using his two hands for a megaphone, and making staccato pauses between the words: "You—have—shot—the—Duke—of—Somerset." Whereat the banker, when he catcht his meaning, instead of being overwhelmed with confusion, was only consumedly tickled; so that he fell to slapping his leg and chuckling. "Shot a duke! Shot a duke!" cried he, and with such gust of enjoyment that soon all the party catcht the infection of it and joined in; and among them even the ducal victim himself. Which story I do know to be true, having had it from my Lord Harry Thynne, who was himself of the party.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

FREEDOM is all the engine, but the driving-rod, dear Lady Betty—the driving-rod is independence. In England we are free, but not independent—which accounts for our being all but immovable.

. . . . .

Labour is the soil; capital the top-dressing. The soil will produce apart from top-dressing, but top-dressing is barren apart from the soil.

. . . . .

The Sleeping Beauty of the community is the multitude which has been enchanted through the ages; America is the Prince destined to deliver her from the spell.

. . . . .

America is the world of the living; Europe, the world of the dead.

* * * * * *

A letter which has been addressed to the present writer will be read with the deepest interest:—

"Colney Hatch.

"Sir,—The House of Lords is not a Legislative Assembly; it is a museum. A director, together with an adequate staff of keepers and assistant keepers, should be appointed without delay to attend to the human treasures the House contains. The collection is unequalled, and includes specimens of oddities which can never be replaced—it is one of the chief attractions of the country.

"It will be heard with general regret that several American heiresses are reported to have recently purchased valuable or curious specimens, and it is to be feared that undoubtedly certain additions in the near past are unworthy of the splendid collection.

"I earnestly trust it is not too late to preserve most of the incomparable contents. Continued neglect must inevitably cause the loss through decay of some of the older specimens, which are in a very precarious condition, and it is trusted this appeal will rouse the Government to action."

. . . . .

"A Peer" writes:—

"Sir,—There is the picture by Landseer, 'Dignity and Impudence'; a companion subject is afforded by the Upper House, 'Dignity and Incompetence.' There are only some thirty Peers who even assume to be competent to concern themselves with its proceedings, and the remaining hundreds absent themselves from the House unless they receive instructions to attend to vote."

* * * * * *

The "nothing but disaster from without will save us from disaster from within" phrase, which is continually repeated now by Tory and territorial magnates, convicts them. The Djinn is escaping from the bottle; the many who were provided for the service and support of the few are regaining freedom. An official of the United States Admiralty visited a ship in harbour. On looking down the hatchway he exclaimed, "Why, the darned thing is hollow!" The many have now discovered that Tory patriotism is "hollow."

* * * * * *

There is the idler who wants the money of the community, and the idler who wastes the money of the community; the latter is the worse of the two. The idler who wastes the money of the community insists that sentiment should be ignored in the treatment of the unemployed—he then proceeds to the German baths for the autumn, later, to the South of France for the winter, and, eventually, to some other foreign country for big-game shooting in the spring. Frequent week-end visits relieve the monotony of the London Season. "Capital is leaving the country"!

A heavy super-tax should be imposed on those who derive income from home labour and spend it on foreign luxury.

* * * * * *

The figure-head system is composed of gross abuses, the continuance of which cannot be tolerated for long. Half the most prominent and best-paid appointments at Court, in the public service, and in other directions in England, are occupied by figure-heads who get the credit for the successful performances of comparatively obscure and ill-paid officials and workers nominally under their orders. It is all part of the "Hereditary superiority" system. Unearned superiority is an iniquitous principle, and it is the cause of grave injury to the community and the country. The ship battles the waves and carries the figure-head in the forefront safely through the storm. It is the ship, not the figure-head, which battles.—Believe me to be, very truly yours, MARMADUKE.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER AND THE LAW SOCIETY.

Sir,—There is much in the letters of your correspondent "F. O. C." that I regret to find myself in agreement with. I say regret, because I am a solicitor who has been in practice for over thirty years, during a considerable portion of which period I have been a member of the Society, and I am reluctantly forced to the opinion that the Council of it does not in its composition and methods commend itself to the majority of the profession which it is supposed to represent. That is evidenced by the fact to which your correspondent calls attention, namely, that out of some 25,000 solicitors only about 9,000 are members. There may be good reason why solicitors practising in the country do not deem it worth their while to belong to the Society, but that only about 25 per cent. of those holding London certificates should be members of it suggests that the absentees do not think it "good enough" to join, and probably for the reason stated by "F. O. C." that "the Council is only a small, irresponsible clique, which leaves the crying needs of the profession utterly neglected."

The Dolder Hotels, Zurich, are the best recommended to English visitors of Zurich. Fine view; absolutely quiet and dustless. Golf Links in front of Hotels.

I ask why did not the Council long ago take steps to urge solicitors to keep such accounts as should show the true position of the practitioner to, at least, himself? Surely if they had done so the scandals of Bedford Row and Lincoln's Inn could hardly have occurred. And, sir, it is the big men of our profession who have brought it into discredit more than the "small fry." Why did not the Council—recognising that the public desired it in consequence of the exposures which were so constant—further the appointment of a Public Trustee? Why did they not themselves inaugurate some practical system of land or deed registration and promote simplicity in conveyancing, such, for instance, as making a receipt on every mortgage as effectual as it is on a mortgage to a building society? Why does not the Council now use its influence to compel an inquiry into the proceedings of the Law Guarantee Society, the collapse of which will well-nigh beggar some of the profession, who believed in the names on its prospectus and the repeated assurances of its chairmen that all was well? More than one of its directors sit on the Council, and surely they should be the first to seek such an inquiry. And why does the Council permit undischarged bankrupt solicitors to renew their certificates?

Surely these are weightier matters than "pitching into" Mr. Lloyd George because he has said what others think but most are afraid to say. And was the high falutin' talk at the "Vote of Censure" meeting of the Council quite common sense? A good many people think that as there is "no smoke without fire," so there is no body without imperfections, and that the Chancellor may be just as right as those who shout "unfounded aspersions!"

Let the Council of the Law Society look at home before they make such a hue and cry about that which is a matter of opinion, and let them learn that their virtuous indignation and the vote of a meeting which did not comprise a tithe of the profession are of but little importance in the minds of the general public.—Your obedient servant,

X-Rays.

Sir,—I think your observations on this question are irrelevant, and the defalcations of solicitors do not arise in the controversy. The opposition of solicitors to present-day legislation is based on the growth of officialism and the tendency to legislate by departmental rules, under which the community is governed by officials, and common law rights are either absolutely annulled or minimised. The views of the judges on this question have been stated by Mr. Justice Bray in relation to the Inland Revenue Commissioners, and Lord Justice Buckley last month In re The Weir Hospital censured the Charity Commissioners for "disobeying rules of law which governed the Courts and for misapprehending their duties and powers."

It can be shown that the society's opposition to bureaucracy is in the public interest, though unquestionably the preservation of the rights of the public to seek redress in the courts is to the pecuniary advantage of solicitors.

Some of the policies to which solicitors are opposed alluded to by your correspondent are not well chosen—e.g., registration of title. The County of London is burdened with compulsory registration, and it is very well known that the public interest would be served not only by reverting to the old system, but by a withdrawal of the governmental desire to extend the system to the provinces, and thereby check the increase of officials.

The Law Society, as lawyers, opposed the land clauses of the Finance Act in the interests of clients, when it was most abundantly clear that it was to their professional advantage to help the Bill, owing to the increased work falling to their share as the result of its operation.

Having regard to your and your correspondent's views, the Chancellor's apology to the Law Society is interesting.—I am, yours faithfully, Newcastle.

"KENNEL CLUB CRUELTY."

Dear Sir,—I am very glad to see that Truth has taken up this question, as I feel sure if you could look a little into the way the Kennel Club affairs are managed you might be the means of bringing about some much-needed reforms.

Mrs. Ashton Cross's is by no means the only case of a cruel and wrongful verdict passed without any evidence. Some years ago there was a very similar case, a lady being accused of dyeing her dogs. This lady, certain of her innocence, gave her dog to the official veterinary surgeon to be examined, leaving the dog several days in his charge. When the case came on for trial, and the veterinary surgeon was questioned as to the result of his investigations, he calmly announced that he had forgotten to make any examination whatever. Furthermore, the husband of the lady making the charge, himself a member of the Kennel Club Committee, was allowed to be present at the deliberation of the committee when discussing the case, and when the impropriety of the proceeding was commented on the excuse was that he had abstained from voting.

I could quote other cases from my personal knowledge where the verdicts have been brought in more in accordance with the feelings of some of the members of the committee than in accordance with the evidence produced, only I fear to take up too much of your valuable space.

It is all the more regrettable that the Kennel Club should make these grave blunders, because they are in a position to do a great deal of good work. That they have achieved a certain amount I do not wish to deny, but that work has been greatly marred by the want of confidence they have inspired in "doggy" circles.—Yours faithfully, Justice.

FRUIT AND BIRDS.

Sir,—I am pleased to find that part of what I said has been confirmed by two of your correspondents, thuswise:—They see a number of thrushes and blackbirds descend upon a bed of ripe strawberries (possibly to sample the vast army of slugs usually to be found there); the fruit is afterwards discovered to be badly damaged (possibly by the aforesaid slugs); therefore your correspondents feel sure that with their own eyes they have seen the fruit attacked by the (possibly) guiltless birds. Then, arising in their righteous wrath, they proceed to massacre those birds by the hundred. For my own part, if thrushes and blackbirds really stole my fruit—even nine-tenths of it—they would be welcome; for I should consider the payment small in return for their singing. Nevertheless, I believe naturalists would bear me out in saying that these particular birds subsist chiefly on animal—i.e., insect—food.

I am reminded of a lady who ordered her gardener to destroy all spiders because, she explained, they ate up her rose-bushes! She silenced sceptics by adding that she had actually seen the bushes denuded of leaves, and had found spiders' webs upon the same bushes; proof positive!—I am, sir, yours truly,

E. G. E.

ROUND THE MARKETS.

SETTLEMENT SUCCESSFULLY SURMOUNTED—BUT RESUMED BUOYANCY UNLIKELY YET AWHILE—NEWFOUNDLAND ISSUE FIASCO—TRUNKS AND CROP UNCERTAINTIES.

THE stock markets last week shaped quite as well as could be expected. The heavy liquidation that took place in the preceding account proved to have been absorbed by people well able to nurse their newly acquired holdings, and it brought no aftermath in the shape of important failures. The two defaults that were announced were of little concern except to the unfortunate jobbers involved. Yet, while enormous sales have been put through without occasioning failures (because of the influential character of the speculators who had backed the wrong horses) it must not be hastily assumed that all is well again with markets. Prices of Americans and other leading speculative stocks have had so sharp a fall that they are pretty well assured against any further sensational decline. But the fact that large lines of bankrupt stock are waiting to find a permanent home means that any early resumption of a boom must not be looked for. As I have said, the people who hold these lines can afford to nurse them, but their object is, of course, to distribute them as opportunity offers. The process of distributing is unlikely to be rapid, because in the first place we have now fairly entered the season when the professionals and the public are thinking more about holidays than business, and in the second place the volume of funds available at present for speculation or investment has been greatly curtailed through the abnormal output of new securities since the beginning of the year.

High-class investment stocks have been fairly well maintained owing to the continued abundance of money. But new borrowers, if they wish to attain success will have to be in generous mood. The Fort William issue, I understand, was well taken, but all except 5 per cent. of the Newfoundland 3½ per cent. scrip never got past the underwriters. Home rails have kept as firm as they could on the limited volume of support with which the market again had to be content. During the coming week the home railway department will be in the thick of the dividend season, and if reasonable expectations are borne out the market should obtain an advertisement that it badly needs. Foreign bonds have kept one of the hardest markets in the House, and as a result of the unbroken demand for foreign securities that has been going on for months, indeed years, it becomes increasingly difficult to find anything that is cheap. Argentine Fours have been rather a feature, and by comparison with some other South American bonds they certainly possess room for a levelling up of a few points. Before long probably Argentina will follow the fashion set by Brazil and Mexico and convert her Fives into Fours, and to do this it will be necessary first to get the latter up a little closer to par. Canadian rails have remained in the dumps, the uncertainties surrounding the labour position and the crops—particularly the crops—causing free sales of Trunks. For the moment it is difficult to see one's way in this market—we must wait on the news—though I have no doubt that Trunks before long will have their turn again. Yankees have fluctuated within comparatively narrow limits. The prevailing tendency has remained firm. The maintenance of the dividends on Baltimores and Norfolks, following upon the declarations of the Atchison and Milwaukee, spread a contented feeling, and the growing belief in large gold exports from London to New York fostered the same sentiment.

RAILWAYS.

NATIONAL OF MEXICO—THE COMPANY'S SUBSTANTIAL PROGRESS—EGYPTIAN DELTA LIGHT RAILWAYS—PAST YEAR DISAPPOINTING—BETTER TIMES IN STORE—UNITED RAILROADS OF YUCATAN.

Many of my readers are interested in the securities of the National Railways of Mexico. I have repeatedly included in lists of desirable investments the company's 4½ per cent. prior lien bonds, and on two occasions in the past year I have dealt at length with the position in order to draw attention to the cheapness of the 4 per cent. first preferred stock. I recommended this stock in an article on June 9, 1909, when the price was 55, and again on January 5 last, when the quotation had risen to 64, I dealt with its prospects in an article headed "A Cheap Mexican Railway Stock." The present quotation is about 70, so that my faith has not been misplaced. The past financial year which ended on June 30 has been a good one for the National of Mexico. It may be remembered that 1908-9 was not a prosperous twelvemonth; the company's gross receipts showed a decrease of $2,306,400 (Mexican currency), as compared with 1907-8, and expenditure had to be rigorously curtailed, the decline in outgoings being as much as $5,399,000. As regards gross receipts, the year just concluded has more than wiped out the decline of the previous twelvemonth. For the first eleven months, to May 31, there is an advance of $2,898,387. Of this $1,906,721 has been absorbed in increased expenditure, leaving net receipts $991,666 (Mexican currency) higher, or, say, $495,800 United States currency. It will not be possible to know for some months what the company's available net profit has been. Fixed charges have probably undergone a material increase in connection with recent issues of prior lien bonds, while, on the other hand, there has probably been a fair growth in miscellaneous income. But in any case the company has been able to declare a half-yearly dividend on the first preferred of 2 per cent., making 3 per cent. for the fiscal year against 2 per cent. for 1908-9, the extra 1 per cent. accounting for $288,302. Thus the Government guarantee of 2 per cent. on that stock (which expires in December next) has not been called in question, and there is a reasonable prospect that the stock will receive the full 4 per cent. to which it is entitled in respect of the current financial year. I still, therefore, regard National of Mexico first preferred as worth holding for a higher price. Speculators have been urged lately to turn their attention to the company's second preferred, which now stands at about 28. Doubtless, as the line develops this stock will not lack supporters, though the public ought not to forget that there is still a big bridge to be crossed before a dividend can be paid on this stock. The outstanding amount is no less than $123,835,600, which means that a payment of only 1 per cent. calls for the big sum of $1,238,356.

Sir William Garstin was able to speak reassuringly to the shareholders of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways, Limited, at last week's meeting, and his words are worthy of notice by investors in Egyptian undertakings generally. He is of opinion that bedrock, as regards depression in Egypt, has been reached, and signs of improvement are not wanting. Personally, I was prepared for these hopeful words, because private advices from Alexandria for some weeks past have been couched in similar vein. Everything, according to Sir William, points to a large crop of cotton, and among other reasons for a hopeful outlook are the facts that the Government has introduced very special measures to prevent the spread of the cotton worm, and that the prices at which next season's crop is now being sold are abnormally high. It goes without saying that when prosperity returns to industrial enterprise in Egypt the Delta Light Railways, which owns a perfect network of lines in the Nile Valley, will be quick to benefit. For two years the company has suffered from bad times, and the dividend on the 5½ per cent. cumulative preference shares, which was 5½ per cent. for both 1906-7 and 1907-8, came down to 4 per cent. for 1908-9, and has been further reduced to 2 per cent. for the last financial year, which ended on March 31. The further reduction of 2 per cent. involved £20,814, and the board need not, had it wished, have cut the dividend by more than ½ per cent., for while gross receipts showed a drop of £17,000 working expenses were curtailed so successfully that the decline in net earnings was only £7,700. The directors, however, have thought fit to raise the carry forward from £1,500 to £15,700. To date from April 1 the company has just about maintained its position, gross receipts at £40,078 being within £600 of those for the corresponding period of 1909, but if reasonable hopes regarding cotton are borne out a better complexion should be put upon the company's results before the financial year closes. At the present price of about 8⅛ the Egyptian Delta Railways £10 preference should be worth buying to put away. The following record of the shares for the last six and a-half years will be of interest:—

| | Highest. | Lowest. |
|---|---|---|
| 1904 | 15⅛ | 9⅞ |
| 1905 | 14⅝ | 11½ |
| 1906 | 13½ | 11 |
| 1907 | 12¼ | 8½ |
| 1908 | 10⅞ | 9⅛ |
| 1909 | 10 15/32 | 9¼ |
| 1910 | 8⅝ | 7⅞ |

I have received a letter calling attention to the £825,000 first mortgage 5 per cent. redeemable gold bonds of the United Railroads of Yucatan, Mexico, issued by J. H. Schröder and Company at 96 and now quoted quarter discount. The writer says he knows of no South American railway debenture equally well-secured which can be bought at anything like the price of these bonds. The prospectus in which the bonds were offered was published on June 8, and I was, like my correspondent, rather impressed with its favourable character. But before endorsing my correspondent's remarks it would be necessary for me to know more about the line. It is a locally owned and managed concern, and up to a few weeks ago most people in the City were unaware of its existence. The State of Yucatan borders on Guatemala, and a large portion of it is practically unexplored. The district, I believe, is very liable to earthquakes. Was not an earthquake the excuse assigned by the Guatemala Government when she last grew tired of paying up the interest on her debt? Again, on the very day the prospectus was published reports were current of an Indian rising in Yucatan. Doubtless, like many of these Central American disturbances, the cables exaggerated the affair, but the incident suggests that the country is at present in none too settled a state. The net earnings given in the prospectus showed up well, but net earnings by themselves are not a complete index to the security for the bondholders. It is necessary to know what is the present physical condition of the road and equipment, what is the expense ratio at which the company has been working, and what proportion of the gross receipts has been applied to betterments. It is, of course, quite possible that satisfactory answers to these points can be given, but in the absence of such information I should not care to go so far as to call the bonds a safe investment.

RUBBER.

Promising Outlook—Batu Caves—Some Good Investments.

There is among some reasoners a prevailing maxim that an increase in the price of a commodity necessarily leads to an increase in production, and, beyond doubt, the rule is one which has a wide application to the ordinary conditions of commerce. Special conditions, however, tend to vary this law, and an important exception to it may be seen in the figures now to hand relating to the Amazonian output for the twelve months ending June 30 last. Notwithstanding the highly stimulating influence afforded by steadily rising prices, the Para crop year has closed without adding more than 1,000 tons to the previous year's supply of wild rubber, and my pessimistic friends who were forecasting a hugely increased output have relapsed into a silence as dense and as gloomy as that which prevails in the innermost depths of those dark Brazilian forests. In view of the great increase in demand and of South America's inability materially to increase her supply, it may be confidently stated that without the assistance of the Mid-East and of the other rubber-producing areas which are now being exploited it would be impossible a few years hence for the consumer to obtain those largely increased supplies which an expanding commerce so imperatively demands. The average price of fine hard Para for the past six months, my Mincing Lane friends tell me, works out at the record figure of 9s. 8¼d., against an average of 4s. 8¼d. for the year 1908 and 6s. 8¾d. for 1909. The market, supported as it is by meagreness of visible supplies and by the forward purchases of manufacturers, remains remarkably firm with a distinctly rising tendency; and the belief expressed by Mr. Arbuthnot at the Perak meeting last week that we are to experience a further period of high prices is confidently shared both in the Stock Exchange and in trade circles. The firm undertone current in both markets may be regarded as encouraging to the holder of rubber shares, although those consumers of the raw article who lacked the sagacity to cover their contracts by making forward purchases during the dull time can hardly be expected to regard the outlook with much complacency. Federated Selangor, Lanadron, Pataling, and Anglo-Sumatra, to which I called attention recently, all show steady advances, while Batu Caves, which came out so prominently in my table of the 15th ult., has advanced on strong investment buying from 16½ to 18. This company is one of considerable promise, and the strong potentiality of its position merits detailed analysis. This will be found in the figures below. The crop for the current year was cautiously underestimated by the manager at 80,000 lbs., but as 70,000 lbs. has been harvested during the first six months my own estimate of 120,000 lbs. is likely to be considerably exceeded, and I have based my estimates for future years on an equally conservative basis so as to counterbalance the company's present relatively high cost of production.

Batu Caves.

| Year. | lbs. | Net profit per lb. | Total. £ |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1910 | 120,000 | 7/- | 42,000 |
| 1911 | 230,000 | 6/- | 69,000 |
| 1912 | 340,000 | 5/- | 85,000 |
| 1913 | 450,000 | 4/- | 90,000 |
| 1914 | 520,000 | 3/- | 78,000 |
| 1915 | 615,000 | 2/- | 61,500 |
| 1916 | 615,000 | 2/- | 61,500 |
| | | | £487,000 |

This little company, whose paid-up capital amounts to the comparatively trifling sum of £26,750, seems likely to earn within the next seven years a net profit for its fortunate shareholders of no less than £487,000—not far short of half a million sterling. The £1 shares are now quoted at 18, at which price the total market valuation of the capital amounts to £481,500, representing rather less than seven years' purchase, and I do not think that at the time of writing the market can offer a cheaper share.

Last week I endeavoured to show my readers how effectively the inherent strength of a moderately capitalised and well-managed plantation company guards it against even a heavy fall in the price of the raw product; and in order to emphasise my point as to the probability of rubber investments yielding substantial dividends even should profits fall to a few pence per pound I subjoin a table showing the annual return which may be expected from an acre of rubber which has been

Some of the older companies, notably Bukit Rajah, Batu Caves, Inch Kenneth, and Pataling, have given proof of their ability to bring rubber into bearing for a cost barely exceeding £20 per acre, and in a few exceptionally favoured districts this may, perhaps, still be possible, but, upon the whole, £35 looks like a fairer average under present conditions, and, as my table shows, even this higher cost will not prevent dividends being earned of 10 per cent. with a net profit of 1d. per lb. and of 30 per cent. with a profit of 3d. per lb., say, when the trees are ten years old. The list given below directs attention to some splendid investment opportunities which are now open to the investor who wishes to get into rubber, and as some of the estates are already small producers their increasing yield will provide ground for the possibility of that early advance in price which the contents of my letter-box lead me to believe a large body of my readers so much desire.

| Name. | Estimated cost per acre when in bearing. | Nominal value of share. | Amount paid. | Quotation, July 16. |

| Merlimau | £35 | 2/- | 2/- | 7/6 |
| Tebrau | £25 | £1 | 12 6 | 3 prem. |

Here, then, is a list of companies whose capital contains no water, no promoters' plunder, and whose ultimate dividend-paying capabilities may be judged in the light of the calculations given above. Space limits preclude my examining the position of these companies in detail, but I may remind my readers that Glen Bervie, Bradwall, Bandar Sumatra, and Tebrau are now tapping small portions of their areas, and that Merlimau promises in a few years to rank as one of our biggest producers.

Madagascar Prospects—Diamantino—F. M. S.

The wise investor in the rubber market must be careful to spread his interests over the various sections in the formation of a trust which shall embrace the most assured and the most promising properties in the world. Let him begin with shares of a few big producers such as Linggi, F.M.S., Batu Caves, and Malaccas, and then extend to the younger plantation section, such as the half-a-dozen given above. But most important of all, he must include some of the wild vine rubbers which are now coming into the market with large outputs under remarkably economic conditions. Some of the shipments from Madagascar are expected to be landed in London at a cost of 10d. to 1s. 2d. a lb., and in so young an industry as rubber this development should be closely watched. The smart recovery last week in Crude Rubbers, which is expected to go much further, will spread to the other Guiguet machine using concerns, particularly Madagascar Rubber, whose shipments have now started on a substantial scale. The Madagascar company's first decorticating machine only started working in the forest on June 26, the washing machine which had been erected at the port of arrival having started a fortnight earlier. Over 18,700 lbs. of rubber have been despatched to London from these machines, while the manager reports stocks in hand of 40,250 lbs. of rubber, 125 tons of vine, and 30 tons of vine bark. Nine other machines are to be erected by the middle of September, and the ten machines then in operation are expected to produce 400,000 lbs. of rubber within twelve months, giving a net profit of at least £100,000.

These profits will be increased by those earned by the cleaning machine, and the board have stated their intention of sending out more machines to deal with the huge area under their control. The cost of each machine is only £650. With regard to the relative rights of the preference and ordinary shares, it was explained to correspondents last week that the preference shareholders are entitled to 50 per cent. of the net profits of the company until they have been paid 20s. per share. After the preference capital has been paid back then out of the profits each year, first, the preference shareholders are entitled to £10,000, next the ordinary shareholders are entitled to receive 5 per cent., say, £15,000, and any further amount distributed is divisible equally among the shares of the company irrespective of class. On the basis of a net profit of £100,000, therefore, in the first year the preference would receive 100 per cent., £50,000; the ordinary would receive £16 13s. 4d. per cent., £50,000. In the second year, on the basis again of £100,000 divisible net profit—first, the preference would receive 20 per cent., £10,000; secondly, the ordinary would receive 5 per cent., £15,000; thirdly, each class would receive £21 8s. 6d. per cent., £75,000: making in all £41 8s. 6d. per cent. on the preference and £26 8s. 6d. per cent. on the ordinary. With regular weekly shipments on an increasing scale these profits should soon be actually realised.

In spite of my criticisms at the time the Diamantino was floated and since, I find that a number of readers still hold shares in this Brazilian rubber company. A market tip has gone round that the shares are to rise on big shipments of rubber now coming forward. We have yet to learn what is the cost of production, and there is a bitter awakening ahead for both directors and shareholders if my Brazilian advices are even approximately correct. In my judgment the shares are not worth their present premium of 150 per cent.

The directors of the Federated Malay States Company have decided to split their 500 franc shares into ten shares of 50 francs each. The present quotation for the old shares stands at the forbidding figure of £400, and it is a pity that the board does not go further and subdivide them into single franc shares, for even the new share at £40 will still be a rich man's share. The F. M. S. is intrinsically one of the cheapest stocks among plantation companies in the East, and a dividend of 100 per cent. to 150 per cent. is expected in October.

Christineville—Their House in Order.

After all that I have published about the Christineville Rubber Estates, Limited, it is only fair that I should refer to the improved position the directors and a committee of shareholders have brought about. The estates, which had been allowed to run wild, have been thoroughly examined and placed in charge of competent managers, and the vendors are guaranteeing a minimum dividend of 5 per cent. for the next three years. As regards situation, few estates in West Africa are better placed, with a navigable river for ocean-going steamers and the main road and railway from Freetown to the interior passing through the property. My criticism of the promotion was based upon the misrepresentation in a report in the prospectus that there were 40,000 rubber trees, principally Para, fully matured and ready for tapping. I do not withdraw a word that I said on that subject. As soon as the company took over the property the 40,000 trees ready for tapping were found to be non-existent, and in my opinion it was a monstrous scandal that money should have been obtained from investors by means of such a misstatement. However, it was decided that the company must make the best it could of its bargain, and the report now issued is satisfactory with regard to the kola, palm-oil, cocoa, coffee, and pineapple prospects, from which immediate profits are expected. As to rubber, it is stated that there are 25,000 to 30,000 young trees, which the management has taken in hand and should do well. The company also intends planting 50,000 to 60,000 trees as soon as possible, and, therefore, one may hope that Christineville will, after all, be made eventually a satisfactory investment for its shareholders. Obviously it is incumbent upon the board to do their utmost, by energetic development, to restore the fortunes of the concern.

British Guiana Balata Co.

Some statements of a serious character in reference to the British Guiana Balata Co., Limited, appear in the Daily Argosy, Demerara, of June 21, for a copy of which I am indebted to a correspondent in that colony. The company was floated in London in May last, with a nominal capital of £80,000, in two shilling shares, to acquire fourteen licences from the British Guiana Government for the collection of rubber and balata over an area of 448,000 acres on the Essequibo River. The promoter and vendor was Mr. J. J. Brickhill, who was to be engaged as manager for three years. The purchase price was fixed at £25,000 payable as to £10,000 in cash, as to £5,000 in shares, and as to the balance in cash or in shares. According to a correspondence published in my Demerara contemporary, Mr. Brickhill held an option to purchase the licences from the holder, Mr. Veerasawmy, at a price originally fixed at £7,000, but subsequently reduced to £5,000—one-fifth of the amount the company was to pay! Just before the prospectus was issued here Mr. Veerasawmy was advised that £500, the amount of the option money, had been paid to his credit at his bank in Georgetown. He subsequently received a cable to the effect that the capital subscribed was not sufficient to pay his cash price and offering bills. He declined to accept anything but cash. Meanwhile, Mr. Brickhill had left England for British Guiana, and on his arrival there he was informed that unless the purchase money was at once paid into the bank as stipulated, the agreement for sale would be terminated. Mr. Veerasawmy was told that the money would be forthcoming on June 17. He waited till June 20, and no payment having then been made he announced that the matter was at an end.

The directors of the company are Messrs. Robert Wallace (Professor of Agriculture in the University of Edinburgh), Holm Hill, Thornhill, N.B.; James Halcrow, 18, Coleman Street, E.C.; W. L. Malcolmson, 20, Copthall Avenue, E.C.; C. D. Marson, Broad Street House, E.C.; and Alexander Rawlinson, 89, Piccadilly. It is possible, of course, that they may be able to show that Mr. Veerasawmy is mistaken in supposing that the agreement for the sale of the licences to Mr. Brickhill has been rendered null and void. But in view of the categorical statements which have been furnished to the Demerara paper the matter is obviously one demanding the immediate attention of the board and the shareholders.

The labour question is one of the great difficulties of the balata industry in British Guiana. The balata is there, but to collect it expeditions have to be dispatched on long journeys up country. On this subject I see that Sir Henry Seton Karr, chairman of the Essequibo Rubber and Tobacco Estates, Limited—a company against which I considered it advisable to caution my readers—made some optimistic observations at the meeting last week. He quoted a remark of the Governor, Sir Frederic Hodgson, that the companies would not experience any initial difficulty. Well, as to that, I have just received a report from British Guiana of the doings of two gangs of "balata bleeders" employed by the Consolidated Rubber and Balata Estates, Limited—another company which on its intrinsic demerits was adversely criticised in Truth. Before the end of their long journey up the Corentyne River one gang refused to proceed any further, and indulged in a riot, as the result of which warrants were issued for the arrest of the lot of them. The other gang did not create any disturbance. They simply sold the provisions, the boat, and all the paraphernalia, and "crossed over to Nickerie," wherever that may be.

MINES.

Rhodesians Fluctuate—Nigerian Tin—Transvaal G. M. Estates—Broken Hill South Blocks—Dolcoath Returns.

In my last notes respecting the mining markets mention was made of the fact that people with Continental connections believed the worst of the foreign liquidation had been experienced. This opinion has been borne out by the course of events during the past week. Although there has been a certain amount of realising, partly on Continental account, the general tone of these markets has been firmer than for some weeks previously, and share values have rallied a little in most departments. Pending the conclusion of the settlement there was little inclination to increase commitments on the bull tack, the possibility of serious trouble coming to light checking speculation. There was, however, bear covering to assist prices.

Rhodesians were helped temporarily by one or two mining cables of a promising character—high assay values being reported by the Buck's Reef, and an improvement in width and grade of reef by the Selukwe—but Monday saw a resumption of selling, part of which was on Colonial account. The news issued by the Selukwe revived hopes that the mine may enjoy a new lease of life, and market put up the price of shares to over 10s. again. This recovery was promptly taken advantage of by some tired holders to realise their shares. The information issued by the Surprise, which has caused a sharp drop in that company's shares, is dealt with below. In the Kaffir market there was a little Continental buying during the past week, together with some local "investment" demand, but dealings have yet to become active. West Africans have been quiet, with, however, a firmer tone. Probably it would not take much buying in this market to put prices materially better, but apparently the insiders do not see their way at present to initiate a movement. There is a confident belief in some quarters that when business in Mines does expand the Nigerian tin shares will be among the first to revive; indeed there are not wanting some who hold that Nigerians will enjoy a boom before the next six months are out. The public, it is contended, do not yet realise the possibilities in connection with the alluvial tin deposits of Northern Nigeria. Want of adequate transport facilities has been against the development of industry, but this matter is being remedied, and with the influential backing it now has prospects appear promising.

Satisfactory progress is recorded by the report of the Transvaal Gold Mining Estates for the year ended March 31 last, which has recently been issued to the shareholders. Although the tonnage treated was larger than in the preceding year, when work was interfered with by floods, it was smaller than in preceding years. Costs, however, were further reduced, and the ore treated was of better grade, with the net result that 1909-10 profits totalled £151,636 (after writing off a sum of £3,481) as compared with £120,567 for 1908-9, and £71,997 for 1907-8. Dividends for the last financial year totalled 22½ per cent., which absorbed some £16,000 less than the net earnings. The ore reserves are estimated at 398,466 tons of an average value of 16.81 dwts., as compared with 354,792 tons averaging 16.15 dwts. a year previously. During the current financial period there has been a substantial increase in the monthly profits, the June return being £21,328 as compared with £15,199 for April. This is due to various causes. By the use of tube mills the extraction has been improved, and an increase in tonnage has been accompanied by a further reduction in the ratio of working expenses. It would appear probable, therefore, that future dividends will show some expansion, but to what extent it is rather too early to form a definite opinion. As the company's properties are not on the Rand main reef formation, it is not reasonable to value the shares on the same basis as those of Witwatersrand undertakings, and as Transvaal Gold Mining Estates yield barely 7 per cent. on their 1909-10 dividend basis it will be obvious that the present market price ($3\frac{3}{8}$) allows a good margin for future dividend expansion.

At the present price of about 16s., Broken Hill South Blocks strike me as being one of the most promising speculations in the mining list, providing a purchaser is prepared to take off the market for a time the shares he buys. But for the recent general depression and some selling by nervous colonials, who have been throwing out Broken Hill shares because one mine which they have been fond of has lost its lode, South Blocks would probably not have dropped to a discount at all. True, results have not come up to expectations, owing partly to the coal strike, and partly to the comparatively low price of lead, but at the end of March the company had some £15,000 cash in hand, the mine is opening up extremely well, and the dividend period may now be said to be in sight. At the meeting last week the chairman (Mr. F. A. Govett, who has the reputation for giving the shareholders in his companies both sides of the picture in his annual addresses) said that allowing £1,250 per month for development expenditure, the mine should earn about £1,300 per month, even with lead at £12 10s. per ton. This would be equal to over 7½ per cent. on the capital of the company. Each rise of 10s. in the price of lead would make a difference to the company of £700 per month, or £8,400 per annum. This leaves out of consideration any expansion of the mine and any profits from zinc. Mr. Govett foreshadowed the commencement of dividends in the coming autumn.

The Dolcoath mine has issued its output figures for the first half of the current year, but the directors' report showing the profits earned is not due to be published until next month. Below the latest statistics are contrasted with those for the preceding half-year:—

| | First half, 1910. | Second half, 1909. |
|---|---|---|
| Ore crushed | 47,279 tons | 46,349 tons |
| Black tin sold | 853 tons | 904 tons |
| Amount realised | £75,639 | £74,411 |

The average yield was less last half-year, but more ore was crushed, and as the average price obtained for the metal was nearly £10 higher, the total sum realised was £1,200 larger. For the last half of 1909 the company's net profit was £12,722, out of which £3,203 was written off and £8,500 distributed as dividend (2½ per cent.). Unless the average working costs have been further reduced to a fair extent, it seems doubtful whether the next dividend will be any larger than the last. The present market price of 13s. 6d. for Dolcoath shares is the lowest of the year, but even this level, in my opinion, largely discounts future possibilities.

Surprise Position—The Directors and Criticism—A Lengthy Cable Provides a Surprise.

The criticism the Surprise management has been subjected to recently on account of the issue of only occasional scraps of information to the shareholders has had some effect, judging by the long letter from the secretary which appeared in the Financial Times at the beginning of last week. In that communication the directors complained that the criticism was unjustified, but their statement of the position of affairs at the mine did not support that contention, inasmuch as the letter contained facts of which the shareholders had not been previously informed. The directors' calm suggestion that the critic should have called at the company's office for information was countered by the reply that the criticism was based on the information supplied by the management to the shareholders, who, of course, are entitled to be kept regularly and fully informed as to the progress of work.

As to the mine, the letter gave one the impression that not much development on the new ore body had been done, and that until the shafts being sunk reached the necessary depth to permit of opening out on the reef there would be nothing particular to report. But at the end of last week a lengthy cable was received from the mine showing that 170 ft. of driving and 39 ft. of cross-cutting have been done, in addition to sinking a winze 52 ft. Moreover, the latest official message shows that in the south drive (which has reached a distance of 140 ft. from the winze) the reef pinched out at 47 ft.; nothing of importance has been encountered in the cross-cuts; and whereas the value of the reef at the bottom of the winze was reported as 2 ozs. in June, the value is now given as only 9 dwts. The management comments: "We do not think there is cause for anxiety as long as values continue in winze, but owing to variation in dip of reef in winze development must of necessity be very slow until exploration can be carried out from new shaft No. 2." This cable came as an unpleasant surprise to the market, and the shares suffered a substantial further decline in price.

While it does not necessarily follow from the above that the new reef is not going to prove a valuable asset, it is evident that the chairman was prematurely optimistic in his speech at the meeting last April, and that the market was much too sanguine when it ran the price of Surprises up to nearly £4. I expressed that view at the time, as some of my readers will doubtless remember. Even now the price of the shares ($1\frac{1}{4}$) allows a certain amount for prospects, as will be gathered when it is realised what a small amount of ore has actually been developed on the new reef up to the present time. The official cable says the payable ore developed averages 10.2 dwts. over 34 ins. for a distance of 62 ft., and continues in depth for 52 ft. These measurements represent a quantity of not more than 750 tons of ore, worth, say, £1,500. Contrast this with the fact that by making the new issue of shares at £2 apiece the company drew a sum of £80,000 from the shareholders, while on the strength of the reef being located at depth the market increased the valuation of the concern by hundreds of thousands of pounds!

INDUSTRIALS.

Demand for Textiles—Bright Outlook—Anglo-Maikop and Russian Oils Firm—Apollinaris Results—River Plate Telephones—Flourishing American Mortgage Companies.

Textiles have continued one of the firmest spots in the industrial market during the week, and those associated with this group look for a period of activity in the next twelve months, particularly if the American cotton crop turns out well. Manufacturers' stocks are understood to be practically depleted, while the organisation of the big combines is much better than was the case a few years ago. Fine Spinners have been singled out for support. This company is expected to benefit considerably from the reported activity in the lace trade, which buys a large amount of fine yarn from the combine. Among oil shares Anglo-Maikops improved on the strong financial position of the company, to which I alluded a week ago. There has also been a good demand for the shares of the newly reconstructed Russian Petroleum Company. But generally speaking oil shares, after starting the account with a show of strength, were inclined to slacken for want of public demand.

A welcome improvement in trading is shown by Apollinaris and Johannis, Limited. Net profits, after writing off all advertisement expenses and allowing for depreciation, debenture interest, etc., increased from £90,800 to £100,500, and after declaring a dividend of 3 per cent. on the ordinary shares, as against 2½ per cent. last year, the company is left with a balance of £20,600 in hand, compared with £15,300 brought into the accounts. A further return of capital to the amount of £12,700 has been made by the Owens European Bottle Machine Company (in which Apollinaris and Johannis purchased an interest in 1907), and this has been carried to a fund for providing the capital for the bottle factory in Germany.

The United River Plate Telephone Company continues to show unbroken progress, the gross income being up £49,400 to a total of £336,400. The ordinary shareholders again receive a dividend of 8 per cent., but they will get in addition a handsome bonus from the issue to them at par of 40,000 new £5 ordinary shares, seeing that the existing shares command a market value of about 7½. The Direct United States Cable Company gives evidence of satisfactory results. It is paying a dividend and bonus equal to 4½ per cent., as compared with 4¼ per cent. for the previous twelvemonth. As a result of the extensions made a year ago, and also perhaps of the increasing use of metallic filament lamps, the General Electric Company has raised its trading profit by £19,000 to £91,100, while the net profit is £17,200 more at £68,400, as compared with 1908-9. The dividend is unchanged at 5 per cent., the company having utilised the bulk of the increased earnings in strengthening the reserve and carry forward.

Three American real estate companies, which have published their accounts in the last few days, show a flourishing state of affairs. The Scottish American Mortgage Company is paying 10 per cent., or the same as a year ago, and increasing its reserves. The United States Mortgage Company of Scotland is able to raise its dividend from 7 per cent. to 8 per cent., and the Oregon Mortgage Company, in addition to paying the usual 8 per cent. dividend and 2 per cent. bonus, is distributing a special bonus of 10 per cent. out of the proceeds of sales of real estate. A reminder of the scandal surrounding the business of the Pillsbury-Washburn Flour Mills is given by the publication of the accounts, made up, it will be observed, to August 31 last. The net loss to that date is put at £806,100, in other words, the great bulk of the share capital of £1,000,000 has gone by the board, and what interest remains is practically confined to the debenture holders. The report issued by the directors has been supplemented by a circular from one of their number, Mr. George Cloutte, who, it seems, unsuccessfully protested against the withholding of certain information in regard to the frauds on the company in America, and also as to the expenses of the receivership, which amounted to no less than £86,833. Mr. Cloutte has very properly supplied this important information for the consideration of the shareholders at the meeting to-morrow (Thursday).

The Mackay Companies.

Mr. T. W. Goulding, European General Manager of the Western Union Telegraph Co., has written to me to correct two statements in my recent paragraph with reference to the Mackay Companies. In the first place he says that the Mackay Companies have not at any time held a dominating interest in the Western Union, and do not, as a matter of fact, hold a single Western Union share. Secondly, the Mackay Companies never held a controlling interest in the American Telephone and Telegraph Co.—in fact, they only held about eigh million of the 300 million dollar capital stock of that company, and, as was mentioned in Truth, they recently sold out this interest. Mr. Goulding adds that the ownership of the Mackay Companies in other telegraph and telephone undertakings is, he understands, insignificant.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

Calcutta Tramways Co.

In two or three letters which have lately reached me from Anglo-Indian shareholders in the Calcutta Tramways Co. it is asserted that the revenue of that undertaking is being seriously affected by the systematic thefts of conductors and inspectors. There have been a great many prosecutions of people for using old tickets, but the opinion is freely expressed that in a very large proportion of these cases the tickets have actually been supplied in return for fares by conductors, who when a "flying checker" happens to detect the fraud attribute it to the passenger and, if necessary, give false evidence at the police-court. In dismissing a charge recently the magistrate said he had "an uneasy suspicion" in regard to many of these prosecutions, and the Indian Daily News, in commenting upon the case, remarked that "if the Tramway Co. is being robbed, it is being robbed by its own employees, as we all see every day of the week." For some years the company's dividends have been declining, and in the interests of the shareholders this matter seems to require the attention of the directors. The company, which has a capital of £1,500,000, is directed from London, and most of the shares are held here.

London and New York Exchange.

I had occasion the other day to make an inquiry respecting a bucket-shop which has been carried on under the title of the London and New York Exchange, Limited, at 52, Queen Victoria Street, E.C. Particulars obtained from Somerset House show that this concern was registered as a private company rather over a year ago, the authorised capital being £5,000. How much of this amount (if any) was actually subscribed in cash is not revealed. The vendor was Edward Moor, of the same address as the company, and he was to act as a director for five years. He resigned, however, in less than two months. The other director was John Walter Boardman Milligan, of 85, Lancaster Road, North Kensington, and on Moor's resignation Francis Marshall Milligan was appointed. The latest circular that I have seen is signed "John Sandes, director," but no notice of his appointment has been given to the registrar, nor is there any record at Somerset House of the resignation of J. W. Boardman Milligan, which the latter, I understand, has put forward as a reason for his repudiation of any responsibility in regard to a claim against the Exchange. My readers are aware that I advised them to avoid dealings with any concern of this description, and the fact that the London and New York Exchange has just disappeared from its office owing to a little difficulty about the rent is one more proof of the soundness of that advice.

Mr. Hawthorne's Stories.

For some weeks past I have been waiting for Mr. Julian Hawthorne to let his cat out of the bag. Now that it is out it proves to be very much the sort of animal that I expected to see. The series of booklets, starting with the little story of "The Secret of Solomon," with which Mr. Hawthorne has so cleverly excited the curiosity of the public, has been followed by an offer of shares in the Hawthorne Silver and Iron Mines, Limited. The company is incorporated under the laws of the State of Delaware, U.S.A., to exploit mines in Canada, but the British investor is given the privilege of buying one million dollar shares at 2s. each—half-price. The total number of dollar shares is 15,000,000, making a modest capitalisation of £3,000,000. I gather from one of the preliminary booklets that Mr. Julian Hawthorne is a son of the famous American novelist, and that he has himself been a writer of fiction for forty years. He has now shown that he can be equally entertaining as the author of a prospectus. Personally, at any rate, I have enjoyed reading the literature he has distributed so lavishly, though, for the guidance of my readers, I must add that I do not propose to invest any money in Mr. Hawthorne's El Dorado.

A Mysterious Solicitors' Letter.

The following remarkable letter reached me on Saturday:—

East Avenue, East India Avenue,
London, July 15, 1910.

Sir,—Your issue of 13th inst. contains very serious matter in regard to our client, Mr. Adnam Sprange, secretary of the Oil and Rubber Acquisitions and Exploring Company, Limited, and some of your issues recently conveyed most serious matter in regard to his friend, Mr. Carlton Roberts, M.P., chairman of Skating Rinks, Limited, who, you must surely know, has been and is connected with the most successful dividend companies for many years. We therefore request you forthwith in your next issue of Truth of Wednesday, 20th inst., to retract your damaging and untruthful statements to save you further trouble, with ample apology thereon.—We are, yours faithfully, (Signed) Swann, Bradley and Co.

Solicitors for the Rubber and Oil Acquisitions, Limited.

A fairly extensive experience of solicitors' letters made me doubt the genuineness of this one, more especially as it came in the form of a flimsy "press copy." However, finding that Swann, Bradley and Co. appeared in the 1908 edition of the Law List at the address mentioned, I took the trouble to telegraph to them an inquiry whether the letter was authentic. In due course the Post Office notified me that the telegram could not be delivered, the reason being: "Addressee removed; present address unknown." I have not the least idea where the firm are to be found now, but if still in existence they will doubtless be interested in the use that has been made of their name. Presumably it is an unauthorised use—indeed, it is hardly conceivable that any solicitor would have penned such a communication. The allusion to Mr. Carlton Roberts—who, by the way, is not an M.P., though I believe that he is, or was, a Conservative election agent—is a ridiculous irrelevance. What is meant by the reference to "serious matter" in his case I do not understand, though I have sometimes adversely criticised companies—anything but "most successful dividend companies"—with which he has been associated. He was not mentioned in connection with the company whose title the above letter gives incorrectly. The company is really called Rubber and Oil Acquisitions, Limited. As to Mr. Adnam Sprange, I simply said that he had not favoured me with a copy of the prospectus, upon which I proceeded to make certain comments. This was not an untruthful statement, and I fail to perceive how it can be damaging. At the risk, therefore, of further trouble, I do not offer the ample apology the letter demands.

R. A. Smith's Latest.

Turning aside for a moment from the more familiar option or cover flat-traps, the notorious firm of R. A. Smith and Co. are now exhorting all and sundry to buy the two-shilling shares of the Aowin Rubber and Produce Company at 4s. each. This is a West African concern, and my unfavourable opinion of it is strengthened by the present outburst of bucket-shop puffery. So far as I can ascertain, there is no market quotation for the shares which R. A. Smith and Co. desire to sell at a 100 per cent. premium. The circular quotes an extraordinary letter, said to have been addressed to the firm by the company, in which it is suggested that the shares "are worth £2 15s. to £3 per share." It would be interesting to learn whether the directors—Sir Paynton Pigott, and Messrs. H. B. Molesworth, D. Noel, and G. H. Dawson—authorised the writing of this letter to assist R. A. Smith and Co. in their efforts to get rid of the shares.

NEW ISSUES.

The Union Life Assurance Co. of Canada offers for subscription 10,000 shares of $100 each at the fixed rate of £24 12s. per share. The company, whose capital is $2,000,000, was incorporated in 1902 by special Act of the Dominion Parliament of Canada with the object of extending the benefits of industrial life assurance to the working classes, and it now has a larger number of policies in force in Canada than any other Canadian life assurance company, either ordinary or industrial. The object of the present issue is to provide additional working capital for the purpose of extending the organisation throughout Canada and taking advantage of the favourable opportunities presented for the development of the business. Minimum dividends of 6 per cent. per annum are guaranteed for a period of three years by the National Agency Company, Limited, of Toronto.

Preliminary particulars are published of Metalite, Limited, whose prospectus is about to be issued. The capital is £500,000 in £1 shares, of which 380,000 will be offered for subscription. The company has been formed to acquire as going concerns the "British Metalite" lamp and metal filament manufacturing business in the United Kingdom of the Bryant Trading Syndicate, Limited, and the business, patents, processes, and goodwill of International Filaments, Limited. It is claimed that the "British Metalite" filament lamps and metal filaments are superior as regards price and efficiency to any of the foreign productions sold in this country, and orders are received for such quantities that the present factory accommodation is totally inadequate to meet the demand. It is intended to build or acquire additional works, and arrangements have been made to develop the business on an extensive scale.

The Consolidated Finance Corporation, Limited, has been formed to act as an issuing house of joint stock company enterprises, and the prospectus states that the business already on offer includes various rubber, timber and mining, oil, freehold estate, and other propositions. The capital is £200,000, and 149,993 shares of £1 each are now offered for subscription.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of Truth.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

Anima.—Fair, but, of course, rather speculative.

Renoops.—They are not quoted at present. In view of the steps that have been taken to safeguard the interests of the bondholders you might as well stick to your holdings.

Thor.—Both fair, but somewhat speculative.

Mines.

Aber.—1 and 2. Sell on any advance. 3. Hold for a more active market. Ajax.—Nos. 1-4 might be retained. Sell 5 on any recovery, and exchange out of No. 6.

Bruff.—Hold Nos. 1-5 for a better market. Sell 7 and 8 on a moderate recovery. No. 6 is a very speculative holding, and I see no reason at present to anticipate improvement. Please note Rule 2.

Cantuarian.—1. Very much of a gamble at this price. 2. Shares are talked higher, but are apparently without strong market backing, and a purchase would be speculative. 3. A purchase should yield a fair profit in time. Clonmel.—Sell 1 and 3 on any advance. No. 2 is a hopeful speculative lock-up.

Dungoyne.—See reference in last week's notes. Hold as a speculation awaiting further information.

Falcon.—1. Unless prepared to face a possible reconstruction you had better realise. 2. Secure a small profit.

Internos.—A dividend is expected towards the end of this year. Hold the shares.

J. W. H.—1 and 2. The mine is not on the Rand main reef series proper, and it is not an easy matter to estimate the life. Returns latterly have been poor, and a purchase of the shares would be very speculative. 3. Hopeful as a speculative lock-up. Juggle.—1 and 2. The sum would, of course, command a larger interest in options, but the latter are hardly so free a market as the shares. 3. Abbontiakoon, Sekondi, Wassau.

Misere.—If you are content with the dividend yield you might retain the shares. The companies are quite distinct undertakings. 2. Better exchange into something less speculative. 3. Secure a moderate profit. Modest.—Certainly not a "safe investment." Minting.—The option entitles the holder to take up one ordinary share at par (£1) at any time before June, 1912. A fair speculation for a moderate profit. Mac.—I think you could make a more promising selection in the same market. Moorings.—I have not a high opinion of them. Midlo.—Very speculative. I should be inclined to sell on any advance. Melrose.—1 and 2. Company is still in existence, but the shares are a nominal market at a few pence. 3. I see no reason to expect much early advance.

Regent.—All the companies named have gone into liquidation.

Spartacus.—I would rather sell than buy more. Stennett.—1. Prospects very speculative. 2. A hopeful holding for dividends.

Ubique.—Hold for some recovery.

Vulcan.—1. There would appear to be a fair chance of such a rise within the period named. 2. Likely to recover when the metal does.

Wain.—I think your money could be employed more hopefully than in either of the shares named. Wykehamist.—Hold all for a better market. I expect some recovery eventually.

Mixed Securities.

Apolda.—I think they should be held for a recovery. The property is regarded as a valuable one. Antonio.—1 and 3. Look fair speculations at present prices. 2. Not advised. Ago.—1. A fair speculation for a moderate rise in an active market. 2. It is inadvisable to put too much into one section of the market.

Braban.—1. Hold. 2. I prefer Oroya Links. 3-6. Zinc Corporation are a hopeful lock-up.

Cosmo.—1. Better sell. 2. See Rule 2. Craftsman.—1. See list of 4 to 5 per cent. investments given under this heading last week. 2. I should need to have the particulars of the individual companies before deciding. Canada.—1. It has had a successful career. 2 and 3. Both appear very fair investments. Cairo.—Nos. 2 and 3 strike me as fair. In addition I would suggest Metropolitan Electric Trams 5 per cent. debenture stock. Cottage.—1. A further purchase would be little more than a gamble at the present stage of the company's affairs. 2 and 3. No. Cedar.—No. 4 is a sound dividend-paying concern. Sorry, but numbers 1-3 are unfamiliar to me

D. J. C.—(a) They might be sold. (b) and (c) Yes. See last week's Notes. D. H.—1. Better not put too much money into any one section of the markets. I would suggest Van Ryns, which yield 9½ per cent. at present price. 2. I have all along had a very poor opinion of this industrial concern, and am afraid the prospects for the shareholders are exceedingly unsatisfactory.

Elsie.—I would suggest your dividing the proceeds between Buenos Ayres and Pacific Railway 4½ per cent. consolidated debenture stock, Merchants' Trust 4 per cent. preference, and Agricultural Bank of Egypt 4 per cent. preferred shares. These will give you an average yield of about 4¼ per cent., with good security. Do your business only through a member of the Stock Exchange, or if you do not know a broker get your banker to undertake the transaction

FOXROCK.—1. A very strong concern. 2 and 3. Hold what you have, but at present price I would not strongly urge you to buy more. FINLORA.—Recent information leads me to prefer the shares of the British Australian Oil Company. FED UP.—Sell 1; hold the others for the present.

GAUNT JOHN.—(a) Hold, but delay averaging. (b) Worth keeping, though I do not see any special reason why you should buy more now. (c) As a speculative investment the shares are promising.

HANRY.—1. Prospects very doubtful. 2 and 3. Fair speculative holdings.

INQUIRER (Accrington).—1. Hold; see Notes last week. 2. Better keep them for the present. 3. See Rule 2. IVY.—The reply last week to Foy was intended for you. Nos. 1 to 3 are sound investments. There is no fixed scale of commissions on the London Stock Exchange. INTERESTED.—1. It sounds almost too rosy. I do not care to advise them. 2 and 3. Both sound investments. IVO.—1. Hopeful speculation if you are prepared to take the shares off the market for a time. 2 and 3. Prefer Argentine Fours of 1900. IDWAL.—1. Averaging might turn out well in time, but would be very much of a speculation. 2. Yes; see Notes last week. 3. Separate inquiry needed, as per Rule 2.

KAJOB.—1. A concern which I have frequently had occasion to criticise. Better deal only with a member of the Stock Exchange. 2. A speculative counter, and hardly suitable for your purpose. KORBAN.—1. I hear that the company has been doing well, and would keep the shares. 2. Fair as a long lock-up.

MAIKOPPER.—1. Address 22, Austin Friars, E.C. The outlook for the concern is understood to be favourable. 2. Better exchange into something less speculative. MONTROSE.—1. See Notes last week. 2. A moderate advance on present price is not unlikely. I have not heard of any difficulty in respect to the point you raise. MADRAS.—1. Better hold for the present. 2. See Rule 2. 3. Hold.

NEBNER.—(a) Better close the deal. The shares are a fair speculation if you are prepared to take them up and wait. (b) Sell on any recovery. NAT.—Great Northern (U.S.A.) preferred would make a good lock-up investment. Both the Kaffirs named are promising lock-ups. NEWLANDS.—1. Better not touch them. 2. These appear a hopeful holding. 3. New Kleinfontein, Van Ryn. NIBLICK.—Hold the oil share for some recovery. Keep the land share as a lock-up.

OILCAN.—They ought to be held. I referred to the position in last week's Notes, which you doubtless have read. OCEAN.—1. A fair speculative holding. 2. A sound company and in time the shares may go better. O. P. Q.—1. A hopeful holding for dividends. 2. See no attraction.

PLANTER.—The outlook for the industry is still clouded, and I would not urge you to buy. I would suggest a selection from the stocks listed under "Mixed Securities" a week ago. PROSPECTOR.—1. I think all three are worth holding.

R. E. S.—1. Sell what you have. I hold an unfavourable view of the concern. 2. Get rid of these also. 3. There is a moderate prospect of your being able to get out without loss by waiting a little. RACKET.—You might make the suggested exchanges. Batu Tigas and Lanadron are dividend-payers; the other company has not yet commenced to distribute.

SPERO MELIORA.—(a) Great Indian Peninsula Railway 3½ per cent. debentures. (b) Anglo-Argentine Trams new 5 per cent. debenture stock. The home railway issue is sound, and might be held. SPONOS.—1. The 4 per cent. debentures are excellent; the preference also good, though at present price I should prefer the company's new 5 per cent. debenture stock. 2. Hopeful lock-up speculation. SLUMP.—1. Very much of a gamble. I see no reason to expect much early advance. 2. A promising lock-up. 3. You paid a lot, but at the present price the shares are worth holding. STAIR.—Hold all three for the present, but you might dispose of 3 on an improvement.

UNEX.—1. Yes. 2. City Deep and Gold Mines Investment. 3. I do not advise a purchase.

WOOLOOMOOLOO.—1. See Rule 2; also Notes last week. 2. The position at the moment is rendered a little doubtful by the labour and crop uncertainties. But the stock you have should be held for a recovery. WASP.—1. Fair purchase at present price. Dividend 10 per cent. Par value 100 dols. 2. Do not recommend.

Oil.

BILL BAILEY.—It depends upon the course of the market. Hold.

OUSEL.—I believe about £65,000 represents profit.

SOLATIUM.—Keep them for the present.

TRURO.—They should be worth holding.

VERMONT.—Do not recommend them.

Rubber.

ARDGOWAN.—1. Price recovering; expect to see your figure shortly. 2. Towards the end of the year you should see very satisfactory results from this company, and a recovery is bound to follow. 3. Hold for improvement. ANIMA.—The quotation can be seen each day in the Financier. ANTRIM.—These are not shares that I should hold. You will probably have a better chance than the present of exchanging into a more promising company. AUSTIN.—1. It is rather a big loss to cut, and I cannot advise you to make it on the eve of a probable market recovery, although I have not a very high opinion of the prospects of the company. 2. Madagascar Ordinary. 3. I do not advise these just now. ARLA.—Average now and hold for a good profit in each case. AILSA.—Wait for the meeting, which should take place shortly. 2. No. Hold for recovery, and average if you bought much higher. You should have mentioned the price you gave. A. R. M.—These are shares that I should not hold. You do not say whether you have already bought them; if you have, you should write again stating the cost price. ANCHOR.—Keep all for twelve months at least, with the exception of 3 and 5, which should be sold during the next few months. From your letter I gather that you kept your allotment letter for the Boinsu shares when it reached you, and there is no doubt that you are legally responsible for the calls even if you forfeit your shares. You do not, however, state the case quite clearly. If you care to write again please explain fully the "delay in delivery." ATLAS.—1. You had better hold these in the hope of a recovery. 2. Retain for recovery and a small profit. 3. These I should sell at the first favourable opportunity. ASKE.—1 and 2. Are going better. Hold for 50 per cent. profit. 3. I do not regard these as promising purchases just now. AIREDALE.—(a) Hold for the guaranteed dividend. (b) Retain for a good profit. (c) You had better look upon all these as permanent investments. They will ultimately prove to be very remunerative. ABERDEEN.—All the shares are good speculative investments. If you do not wish to retain them all, take a profit on each one as it offers. This will probably occur during the next twelve months. A. B. C.—1. Hold for recovery. 2. I should sell as soon as I could. 3. I have condemned this company from its inception, but I do not know of any committee to which I can advise you to give active support. ANXIOUS (Plymouth).—Now on the move. Average. ALGTOR.—1. A very good selection for future dividends. 2. The estimate you quote is for the year 1911. 3. Thanks for suggestion. I will see what can be done in the near future. ACADIA.—With regard to the first group of shares your selling limit should depend to a certain extent on the cost prices, and you do not say what these were. Prices should be considerably higher than the present by the end of the year. As regards your second query, I should keep 1 for dividends and sell 2 during the next two months. ANGLO.—1. Should prove a good investment. 2 and 3. These will never be profitable. At present they are unsaleable, but if a market is made in them clear out. ALBANY.—You may safely hold both of these for recovery, which is expected shortly. A. B. C.—1. Read the chairman's speech. The market talks them to 5s. premium on sub-sales during the autumn. 2. Write to the secretary. Shares already on the rise. Hold for 12s. 6d. 3. I cannot trace this company. Kindly repeat inquiry, giving name in full. ANXIOUS (Blackheath).—You are utterly mistaken in supposing that he is a stockbroker. 1. Do not sell, as the monthly outputs from now onwards should improve substantially. 2. Enclosures are interesting and will be dealt with in due course. AGATHA.—My information came from a correspondent in the East. I am making further inquiries. ANXIOUS (Limerick).—Taiping is the only satisfactory share in your trio. Don't touch the others. A. W. M.—Probably your dividend list will produce about £200 within twelve months, apart from the promotion and bonus profits expected from No. 7. ALGI.—1. About £2 5s. at time of writing. 2-3. I know of no broker who would care to execute such very small orders, and I advise you not to attempt to dabble in shares in that way. 4. Have nothing to do with them or any such outside firms.

BASILDON.—For the tea and rubber company investment you might buy Beverley Tea and Rubber or Northumberland Tea and Rubber. BANDOOM.—1, 2, and 3. Hold and average. 4. Keep for a good profit. 5. Yes. 6. Madagascars. BAYSWATER.—1, 2, 3, and 6 will turn out all right, but my opinion of 4 and 5 is not favourable. You should average your Malaccas. BADGER.—Your selection is a fair one, but you could do better at present prices. You do not say whether you have already bought the shares. BOX.—You are liable for the calls, whether you forfeit the shares or not. BELLEVUE.—1. Yes. 2. No. 3. Yes, a very good lock-up. BIARRITZ.—1. Going better in the near future. 2. Yes. They have already begun to move upward. BUSTER.—See reply to "Hopeful." BUCKET SHOP.—Although you have sold the shares for special settlement you must, as the original allottee, pay all calls. The amount so paid will be returned to you at the settlement. BLODWEN.—1. Yes. 2. They may advance a few shillings. 3. Of the two I prefer Linggis. BOWER.—I am sorry I cannot predict the date of payment of dividend on the shares in question. The secretary, in each of the eight cases, would no doubt be pleased to give you some information on your asking him. BUSHA.—1. At the prices you gave you may regard the shares as safe for several years. 2. (a) £20, (b) £7. 3. (a) At the end of the year; (b) a dividend just paid. BIMBASHEE.—Certainly retain. See my Rubber Notes. BROWNE.—You may average all three. BOXER.—1 and 2. Hold for recovery. 3. See Rule 2. 4. See second reply to "Ardgowan" and my Notes. B. W.—Please write with pen and ink in future. There is not much difference between the three shares named from the investment point of view; and there is not a sufficiently active market in them to lead one to expect capital appreciation in the immediate future. They are good to lock up, but there are more promising purchases at present prices. BEAVER.—Certainly take the new London Asiatics. BUCKINGHAM.—The excellent balance-sheet of the Vallambrosa should assure you that the company is well managed, and you may reasonably expect even a better result for the current year. BABAJI.—Do not be worried. Keep your shares and read the circular which will be issued by the company.

CHINA ASTER.—There have been no marketable "Rights." CALOMEL.—1-2. Your inquiry is answered by my note last week and by the advanced price. Do not be anxious. CAVAN.—The prospectus read fairly well, but I do not like the situation of the property. When the next boom arrives you had better exchange your shares if you can. CADENA.—A recovery is expected during the next few months. Retain for the meeting. CYNICUS CALVUS.—Keep your Labus and sell the others on a recovery. Reinvest in some of the shares recommended in my Notes. CHAGFORD.—I am dealing with this in the Notes this week. CEBAS.—See reply to "Cadena." CURIOSITY.—P.P.K. were quoted ex dividend on June 10 and Linggis on June 29. CISSIE.—Keep all three for recovery. You will see an improvement before long. CASA.—Hold for limits previously given. CARINA.—See reply to "Cadena," and hold for recovery. CLERICUS.—1. Hold for a profit. 2. Average your Madagascar Ordinary. 3. You bought these at a high price. Sell when the price rises to that which you gave. CARTERET.—You have three poor shares. Sell when you can. CIDER.—I do not think they are ever "likely to be good." CECILIA.—Unofficial dealings had taken place at £1 premium, but before TRUTH appeared the price had dropped to 7s. 6d. premium, and any order given on or after the date in question should have been executed at or below this figure. I trust this is clear to you. CECIL.—With the exception of 1 all the companies are too young for correct dividend estimates to be made at the present time, but the list is an excellent one, and 2, 3, 4, and 5 should commence payments this autumn. The two last may not pay anything before 1912. CROCODILES.—1. Seems a reasonable concern. Hold your shares. 2. With regard to Madagascars see my Notes. C. H. W.—In view of the healthy condition of the market, do not sell any of your holdings for the present. 1, 2, and 3 may have a sharp rise during August. You may write again at the end of October. CÆSAR.—1. This company was fully capitalised by the vendors, and I have never recommended the shares. Sell directly the price moves up to par. 2. See second reply to "Eke." 3. This is not one of the best of this group, and I fear you will be unable to sell for many a long day. C. C. L. F.—Thanks for letter and interesting enclosure.

DRUMCONDRA.—1. and 2. No dividend paid yet. 2. 3s. shares with 1s. 9d. paid. 3. This is a new company which, of course, has paid no dividend. There are 600,000 shares of 2s. each issued, 50,000 (vendors) are fully paid, and the remainder are also now fully paid. When markets improve you will be able to exchange into something a little more hopeful. DALMON.—1. Keep for permanent investment. 2. Hold for guaranteed dividend and, probably, a good profit eventually. 3, 5, and 6. I should hold for more active markets, and exchange when I could do so without loss. 4. I have no knowledge of this company. DYKEHEAD.—1. I do not care to fix a selling limit, but I should be inclined to sell before the guarantee expires. 2, 3, and 4. Sell on a market recovery. 5 and 6. Certainly do not buy back. DENHOLT.—I do not regard this as a promising share. The price may recover somewhat in sympathy with others on an active market, when you should sell. DUNELM.—1. Yes. 2. Quite satisfactory. DUBLIN WIDOW.—You should see a profit on each of them during the next twelve months. You must write to the secretaries with regard to dividend.

EARL'S COURT.—See reply to "Hopeful." ELBE.—You had better buy Linggis and Madagascar Preference. EKE.—1. This trust company is doing good business, and you should not part with your shares at present. 2. The planting programme of this company will make it a substantial producer before long, and the shares appear to be a good investment. 3. The smart recovery is expected to continue. You should not sell. 4. Take up all the shares to which you are entitled, as an early rise to 20s. is anticipated. 5. I shall deal with this in a future issue. 6. See first reply to "Anxious (Blackheath)." Do not convert the Malacca Debentures yet. ENDIVE.—This is little better than a gambling counter, but perhaps you had better hold for a while on the chance of a market being made.

FIDELITAS.—Hold for good dividends, which should be earned in the next year or two. FRITZ.—1. I have a very poor opinion of this company. 2. You might ask when the certificate will be ready. 3. I believe the shares are unsaleable. FLINDERS.—1. See reply to "Cadena." 2 and 3. Expected to double their present price within the next year. You do not say what they cost you. FEATS.—1. See reply to "Hopeful." 2. Yes, one of the best of the Borneo group. FUSILIER.—See reply to "Elbe." FIFER.—1. This is in good hands, but there is no market for the shares. You had better hold for a time. 2. You should hold these for recovery, but as you bought at rather a high price you should be prepared to take a small profit when procurable. FISHERGATE.—1. You are legally bound to pay the call, but if you think it desirable you can defer making the payment until compelled. 2. The price is expected to go a little better, but at the time of writing you could get 1s. a share profit, which I should be inclined to take, at all events for half. 3. Sell half on any rise and keep the others permanently. FIGARO.—1. See reply to "Cadena." 2. See reply to "Calomel." F. B. (Baden-Baden).—1. Both are good to hold for investment, but if you prefer to take a profit you will probably see an advance of a few shillings on the prices you have paid during the year. 2. I do not advise dealing with any outside brokers.

GRINDER.—Thanks for letter and enclosure. GYDIANO.—Hold for recovery. HOLMESDALE.—I said they might be held for £5, and I see no reason to alter my opinion. There should be a forward movement during the next few months. HONGKONG.—I am sorry that I cannot express an opinion with regard to the company mentioned, as it is not known in London. H. H. 134.—Not known on London market. Although you say the company was brought out last November, it does not appear in any of my books of reference. H. E. J.—Expected to pay a dividend this year. A good chance of recovery. HOLADIN.—1. See table in issue of June 15. 2. Probably by September. HOPEFUL.—Yes, hold. Output will be better after this month. HORMUZD.—1. Impossible for anyone to say, except the officials of the company, and they are not likely to disclose the information before the statutory meeting. 2-5. The company is in the best of hands, and the market consider the shares a fair venture. The price at the time of writing is nominally 6d. discount to par. I am not in a position to fix a selling limit, but I advise you to hold the shares for a small profit. H. GEE.—I expect you will see a profit on the price paid very soon. You will then be able to sell, or you may retain for the limit previously given. There is no reason for me to alter the opinion I gave you. HOPEFUL, Dublin.—1 and 2. I am waiting for report of shipments before commenting further on this property, but you may safely average at present price. 3. Not until the end of the year. 4. Double the present price. 5. I am not in a position to fix a selling limit for this share. 6. Certainly. 7. You have broken Rule 2. HIBERNIAN.—The selection you make is a good one, and I should not dissuade you from making the exchange, but you must bear in mind that you will have to wait a year or so before the full benefits of the exchange are obtainable. HOLYROOD.—No. HOPEFUL, Gorey.—1. Average the London Venture shares. 2. You had better put this question to the secretary of the company. 3. Good for guaranteed dividend and a profit ultimately, but I do not anticipate much movement in the near future. HUGO.—Yes. HIGHGATE.—See first reply to "Anxious, Blackheath," and wait for the approaching meeting. 2. 4s. premium. HADSOME.—Dividend expected in September. Hold till then. Developments satisfactory. HAMMER.—1, 3, 4, and 6. I would not. 2. Yes, but you must not be in a hurry. 5. On the basis of estimated dividends in the next three years the price is high enough. 6. I am doubtful as to a purchase just now. HORATIUS.—You cannot go far wrong with such shares bought at reasonable prices. When I begins to advance the price will move rapidly. 2 to 4 have improved since you wrote your letter. 5. A dividend is expected during the next few months. Most of the limits you name should be reached within the next year. HERMITAGE.—I should hold all for recovery, but I do not expect the last-named share to reach the price you gave, at all events, in the near future, and would therefore sell on a renewal of market activity. HENDON.—Sell these when you can.

ISTHMIAN.—1. I do not care for this company, but you may keep your shares for a time on account of the guaranteed dividend. Do not hold permanently. 2. Retain for recovery and appreciation. 3. Sell if the price again rises to 8s. IPTICO.—See reply to "Agatha." IRISHMAN (Dublin).—Retain all the shares mentioned for recovery. Some of them have begun to move forward. IBROX.—1. A dividend should be paid on this share during the autumn, and the present price may be doubled during the next twelve months. 2. See last reply to "Hormuzd." ISCA.—By double figures I meant £10. Limits for these shares hold good. IMBER.—You evidently believe that "in a multitude of counsellors there is safety," but, even if this be true, you will find it an unprofitable rule in rubber share speculation. I prefer my figures, but, of course, it is immaterial to me whether you accept them or those of someone else.

JOE.—1. See reply to "Calomel." 2. The valuation of London Asiatics in the table is calculated on the strict conservative basis of 500 lbs. to the acre with rubber at 2s. per lb. JOHNSTON.—1 and 2. Hold both and average now. 3. Hold these for a profit. You do not say what they cost. J. P. (Greenock).—It is impossible to notice many shares in each issue. The meeting will be called shortly, and in the meantime you had better address your inquiries to the secretary. JINKEE.—For the purpose you require I should select from your list Batu Tigas.

KINGSDOWN.—I believe that you will see a profit on 1 and 2 within the next year, and on 3 within the next few months. I should take a very small profit on 4 and exchange 5 as soon as possible. KILSAILAGHAN.—As they all have a fair chance of recovery I should realise the amount required from 1, on which you have a profit. KARAND.—1. This was explained at the meeting, and if you consult recent issues you will find that I have shown the value of the shares on a 10 per cent. basis. You may hold for much higher prices. 2. One of the best-managed estates in the East. Expected to touch £10 next year. 3. Not a very active market for the shares, but the estate is well managed. Keep until next year.

LEO.—1. This is a very good estate. I do not expect to see any further decline in the shares in the immediate future. As an alternative you might purchase Madagascar ordinary for capital appreciation. 2. Jugra Land shares were not quoted ex-rights until the 10th ult., so that the buyer is correct in claiming these. You mention a dividend, but I take it that you mean the rights. LA VERDAD.—You have a good list. You might add Linggi, Batu Caves, Madagascars, and amongst cheap shares Northumberland Tea and Rubber. See Note about Christinevilles.

MALAQUER.—It would save much time if you put your questions concisely and numbered them. All three of the shares named are good to hold for much higher prices than the present. With regard to the first, see reply to "Hopeful." For the investment you require you might buy Malacca preference or debentures, and Madagascar preference or ordinary. MALPAS.—It is delightful to receive such a philosophical letter. You are contented with the outlook for 1 and 2; I think you may regard the future of 3 as equally hopeful. Look upon all three as investments. MOORINGS.—You will see a rise in them shortly. Should there be any reaction you had better average. MY FANCY.—1-5. All are good to hold for recovery, but I do not care to give limits for 2 to 5. With regard to 1 you will probably see a profit in the near future. 6. See Rule 2. MAP.—1 and 2. Malacca debentures. 3. Merlimau. MAVINKERE.—1. Your assumption with regard to the meaning of the quotation is correct. I do not think you are likely to see a profit on these shares, but on a market revival you may be able to sell at a slightly better price than the present one. 2. If you sell now there is not much likelihood of your being able to get in lower down, as you suggest. MAC, Dundee.—If you told me what you gave I could help you, but I do not know whether your suggestion to sell at 20s. to 25s. involves a profit or a loss. In any event I should not sell until the markets become harder. Your suggestion to keep the other shares for a while is a good one. These are not likely to enjoy a free market. MOROCCO.—See article this week. You might buy Merlimau, Malaccas, and some of the shares mentioned in reply to "La Verdad." MONTROSE.—Do not sell your rubber shares. The returns of this company will increase rapidly during the next few months, when you should see a substantial profit. You had better sell the 4 per cent. debenture stock on your list. MALACCA.—1. See reply to "Calomel." 2. See reply to "Hopeful." 3-6. These will all prove to be good rubber investments and need not cause you any anxiety. MOLINERO.—1-4. All good to hold for investment. I suggest, however, that you sell 3 should the price in the next boom reach, say, 37s. MAC.—I should exchange these during the next two or three months. MILITARY.—1. No. 2. Yes. M. M. B.—1. These shares will soon be above your price. Do not think of selling yet. 2 and 3. Put these questions to the secretary. 4. Sent to you. 5. By the time that the first balance-sheet is issued.

NORMAN.—1. See reply to "Calomel." 2 and 5. Sell when you can do so without loss. Don't throw them away. 3. Hold for a good profit. 4. Take an early opportunity of exchanging this share. 6. A good investment which may be kept. 7. Your dear old broker is evidently not in touch with the rubber market. He will, perhaps, wake up later. NEDLOG.—I should retain all the shares in your list for a profit, which should be obtainable during the coming year or earlier. NEW AMEROSO.—I should not have made this selection for you, but I think, in the circumstances, you had better lock them away until there is a profit. Although somewhat unmarketable at the moment, they are all in good hands, and should eventually turn out well. NEMO.—1. I am told that the allotments were made very fairly. 2, 3, and 4. Write to the secretary. I believe you will see a substantial recovery in these shares. NORDE.—This seems a very unsatisfactory concern, and its American backing is a source of danger. The market thinks that a premium may be established shortly, when you will do well to sell. This quality of rubber is not favoured in Mincing Lane.

ONYX.—1. I have no knowledge of this. Write to the secretary. 2. Certainly. ONSLOW.—Please read my rules, and, in future, number your inquiries. All the shares to which you refer are going better with a general revival in markets; an upward movement in some of them has already commenced. During the next few months you will have the satisfaction of knowing that the opinion you have received regarding Madagascars is not based upon correct information. OPTIMIST.—1 and 2. Kinta Kellas, as they are producing. 3. Malaya shares. OPTIMISTIC.—Many thanks for your complimentary remarks. I prefer Linggis or Batu Caves to the concern you mention, but I think its shares are likely to go better, as the market talks of a 16s. dividend for the coming year. OUSEL.—1. The machines appear to be perfect and give a very high percentage of extraction. It does not matter whether any other machines may be invented or not. 2, 3, and 4. It will be well to wait three or four months longer, when the exact position of this company will be known. I shall comment on its progress in future articles.

PALMER.—1. You have a good list and should not sell now. Write to the secretary about 3 and 4, as the meeting is nearly due. 5. See first reply to "Anxious, Blackheath." P. O'H.—I have no faith in the ultimate success of the company, and its promotion was certainly unsatisfactory. Sell when you can. PATSY.—See reply to "Antrim." PIF-PAF.—1. I have always advised a sale of these. 2. See Rule 2. 3. See reply to "Calomel." Your price will soon be reached. PADDY.—1. See answer to "Cadena." 2. Yes. 3. Impossible to say, but an improvement is expected during the next three months. PIFFER.—1 and 2. Of the two I prefer P.P.K. 3. Yes. A dividend expected next year. PISA.—As you must sell, it is clear that you should take the profit on 2 and make up any balance necessary from 3, but do not sell until you require the money.—Q. C. S.—1 and 2. Prices should be higher in the time named, but it is impossible to say whether the limits will then be reached. With regard to 3, I consider the limit you have fixed somewhat extravagant. QUIZ.—1. The preference as a good rubber investment, and the ordinary as a share with great speculative possibilities. 2. Retain for recovery and appreciation.

RATHKEALE.—1. Do not sell. You could do better. RETRACHR.—1 and 2. Next year. 3. See last part of reply to "Malaquer." REX.—1. I should not buy now. 2 and 3. Should turn out well. REVENGE.—These are not in the front rank, but should not be sold just now. You do not say whether you have bought them or desire to do so. ROB ROY.—1. A good company, established three years. 2. A new company, which will become a producer next year. Some years must elapse before all the trees come into full bearing. 3. Meeting not before the end of the year. As regards probable dividend, you must write to the secretary. ROAK.—Hold both for recovery. I know of no special reason for the fall. RED CENT.—1. Buy more if the price declines still further. 2. Wait for the limit and then ask again. RANMORE.—See last part of the reply to "Ousel." If the chairman's figures are borne out, a profit of about a million sterling per annum will be made when the full plant is working. Hold your Nyassas. See my Notes with regard to Madagascars. REX HEVEA.—You have a good representative list of rubbers, all worth keeping for higher prices. They should all advance before next spring.

SANGUINE.—1. See reply to "Calomel." 2. Hold for recovery. 3. It is still quite possible. SUBURBAN.—Your "widow sister with a young family" ought not to buy rubber shares with her limited capital. STANLEY.—You have a good list of shares, all of which should eventually show you a good profit. For the purchase you now have in view you might buy Madagascar preference or ordinary. STEEL.—1 See Notes. 2. These will ultimately turn out well. SEASALTER.—1-3. A recovery in these is expected in the near future. 4 and 5. These queries do not come within my province. 6. Quite likely. SKERRIES.—I should change them for more marketable shares as soon as there is an opportunity. SCOLASTICUS.—I should sell these when possible. Most of the trees are Rambong. I shall be pleased to answer any definite inquiry you may like to put. SAMLET.—1. With the exception of E, you have a good list of shares, out of which you should do well. Kamuning "B" are 2s. fully paid and the "A" shares are only 1s. paid. The "B" shares will get double the dividend until a further call is made on the "A" shares. SLAINTE.—On the 10 per cent. basis the shares should ultimately appreciate to £4. STAMFORD.—1. You ought to have averaged after my Notes of a fortnight ago, but the shares are still very cheap. 2. Yes. 3. The company has a large area to work, and in time should do well. I prefer Madagascars. See Rubber Notes. SCALPEL.—See article this week and reply to "La Verdad." SUBSCRIBER.—Situated in the best part of the Malay States, and should do well, but there will be no dividends until 1914. SEE SEE.—1. These companies are getting a low price for their rubber. You are mistaken in thinking that they get within 1s. per lb. of 'Para;" the last sales realised only 5s. 8d. 2. Have been improving, and you may safely hold for £5. 3s. When this estate is in full bearing it will have cost over £100 per acre. I consider that the promoters simply floated the concern for an extravagant intermediate price. There is too much jungle, in a wrong situation, to please me. 4. These are quite high enough at £2, although the market are continually talking them higher. See Rubber Notes. SCRUTATOR.—1. The company has extensive assets, which may, or may not, turn out satisfactorily. The market talks the shares higher. 2. I should not touch the shares of this concern. I prefer those mentioned in the reply to "La Verdad." SOTTOBOSCO.—You have a very speculative list. I should not like to hold any of the shares except 3. If, as Mincing Lane expects, the market improves, and these shares go better, you should clear them out. SEAVIEW.—See reply to "J. P. (Greenock)." If you exchange, see list given to "La Verdad." SNAVE.—1. Yes. See reply to "Babaji." 2. The secretary would tell you this. 3. The price is now much firmer, and is said to be going better in the immediate future. SAVINGS.—See rule as to coupon.

TRUTH.—I have never before commented on this company, but, from its position and sponsors, I advise you to have nothing to do with it. TORPEDOED.—1 and 2. Linggi, Federated Selangor, Selangor, and Malacca Debenture. 3. Madagascar Preference and Ordinary and Northumberland Tea and Rubber. THIEW.—1 and 2. These companies are doing very well. Read my Notes last week and this. 3 and 4. Are expected to go better during the autumn. 5. An excellent and improving investment share. 6. Has been consistently condemned in this journal. You had better sell while at a premium. TOM YAH.—1. This company will do well. Do not be over-anxious. 2. The market thinks there is a 10s. rise in this share in the near future. 3. See reply to "J. P., Greenock," and wait for the meeting. 4. I much prefer Madagascars. 5. Not a free market. You would do better by purchasing 2. TRURO.—See my Notes. Average 2 and 8 immediately. Keep the others for the present. 9. I share your opinion, but Borneo issues have not been very popular, and this accounts for the discrepancy. 11. Sell at 9d. prem. or over; they are now nominally 1s. premium. TORY.—1. Yes, certainly. 2 and 3. No. TABLOID.—Worth holding for the guaranteed dividend. TAFFY.—1. A dividend expected next year. 2. Perhaps 25 per cent. at first. 3. I should hold these for improvement. TERRA.—Hold all three for better markets. Exchange 1 and 2 when you can do so without loss, and take a small profit on 3.

UNLUCKY ONE.—1 and 3. I prefer the shares mentioned to "La Verdad." 2. These are said to be going better. Being low-priced shares, you should hang on to them. 4. There should be great activity between now and the end of the year. VIDI.—I do not regard the prospects of either as encouraging. Exchange them both at a favourable opportunity. VETO.—

If you were a constant reader you would notice that I say almost every week that I can be of no use to any one who is so foolish as to buy rubber shares and carry over. Had you bought only the shares that you could have taken up you would have had no contangoes to pay, and, now that the market seems to be on the turn, you would not feel so tired. VASOL.—I regret that I have no space to answer such a general request as you make for "some information," but I shall be pleased to answer any specific inquiry about the company. I should take the first opportunity of selling the shares. VOX.—1. When shares are bought for special settlement the seller is responsible for calls made before the settlement. Of course, the buyer, when settling, has to refund the amounts so paid. 2. I should not hold these. VAUMOR.—1 and 2. Answered in Rubber Notes. 3. In the front rank still. VIATOR.—You have selected two good concerns, but neither is freely marketable. I prefer the shares mentioned in the replies to "La Verdad" and "Torpedoed."

WAX.—"To average" means to buy a second lot of shares at a considerably lower price than that at which the original purchase was made. Keep all your shares for much higher prices. WALTERS.—1. See reply to "La Verdad." Hold 2 for recovery and 3 for permanent investment. WATCHFUL.—You may buy both in the expectation of making a good profit. W. H. C.—All good to buy, but for the purpose you require you would do better with Madagascars. WUBBER.—A good concern, but take a profit. See 11th reply to "Truro." WASHED.—You are too late with the inquiry. The list will be closed before you see this.

XAB.—You had better hold all for recovery, which should take place within the next few months.

ZUBBER.—1. See reply to "Agatha." My table expressly stated that the estimate was based on results when all the area comes into bearing. 2. You would do better by buying Crudes and Madagascars if you do so immediately. 3. I do not understand this question, although I suppose that there is something in the old adage, "Good wine needs no bush." ZETA.—1. Recovery expected in the near future. Meeting should take place before long. 2. Second consignment of 1,200 lbs. just been sold. 3. See my Rubber Notes.

Miscellaneous.

ANIMA.—They are regularly dealt in on the London Stock Exchange. AUDREY.—They are separate companies, though the same group is behind each. The shares of either would make a fair commercial investment. ALPHA.—Scarcely a "safe" investment, but with present state of trade you might hold them for a while. ABDUL HAKEEM.—No. See Note in another column regarding the Hawthorne Silver and Iron Mines, Limited.

BORJUM.—There is talk of a reduction in the dividend. I am afraid the prospects of a recovery are not good. BENGCO.—The shares are not officially quoted. I can only suggest that you make inquiry through your broker. BRONCHO.—A bucket-shop business, in which the losses of the customers are the gains of the proprietors. You can judge from this whether their information would be "good" from your point of view.

DARRACQ.—Your contention sounds reasonable, but not being in the confidence of the board I cannot say how far it is justified. Better keep the shares and await the report. DENSHOTT.—The debentures should be all right, though the position of the preference shareholders is doubtful. You might sell the shares.

FINDHORN.—The issue is such a small one that if the concern turns out a success the dividends will be very large. If your brokers are in a position to obtain first-hand information their advice should be worth following.

HAWFINCH.—The outlook for the industry is not very bright, but at present prices the stock you mention should be worth retaining. HOPEFUL (Scarborough).—The shares look fully valued. You might exchange as suggested. HARRIER.—Since you wrote there has been some recovery. Hold.

J. D. G.—At the present price the shares ought to be worth holding. JULY.—1. You want a combination of a "sound investment" and a likely speculation. I am afraid I do not know of anything which would meet your requirements. 2. Not securities that I recommend, one reason being that dealings in them are illegal in this country. JERSEY.—The Official Receiver, Companies Winding Up Department, Carey Street, London, W.C.

LUNE.—I should be inclined to get out.

MANXMAN.—Hold the oil shares. As to the others, I still think the price I named should be reached, but that is no reason why you should not take a moderate profit when you can do so. MOTT.—1. You cannot escape liability for the calls by forfeiting what you have already paid. 2. I should not have subscribed to any reconstruction. 3. A tin-pot local concern of which I have no recent information, but I should be much surprised if it turns out a safe investment. MARGIN.—Have nothing to do with them or any other bucket-shop keepers. The system is a device for transferring money from the pockets of innocents to those of sharps.

NILE.—1. Not a concern which I can recommend. 2. I know of no reason whatever for uneasiness.

ORIGINAL.—You might as well take what you can get for the shares.

POWDER.—I do not recommend 1. No. 2 is a fair speculative holding. 3. The shares are not officially quoted, but your broker should be able to get you a price. As regards the issue of new shares, better write to the company. PECCANT.—1. See no special reason for advance. 2. Too speculative.

QUADRANT.—Bucket-shop keepers, and therefore to be shunned.

RUDOLPH.—The shares would make a very fair investment; they are regularly dealt in on the London Stock Exchange. RONALD.—Shares of this description have a speculative element in them, and therefore cannot be regarded as "safe" investments. R. D. T. C.—Yes, there is such a company, but this bucket-shop's recommendation of its shares is a good reason for leaving them alone.

SENESCENS.—To be avoided. Of course, the advice they would give would not be disinterested. I am astonished that a bank manager should have made himself a tout for such a concern. SOUTH ATLANTIC No. 92.—Thanks for information, which I have noted, though there is little hope that anything will be done in the matter. SLIEMA.—Such a sum should be kept in the P.O. Savings Bank. SAXON.—In mines Wit. Deep, and as to rubber, see my Notes.

TIVERTON.—The company has paid good dividends, but its financial position leaves much to be desired. The goodwill is enormous. Better sell.

WAX.—Sell 1 and hold the other two. W. S. R.—See Note in another column. W. J. T.—I do not recommend it. WALLACE THOM.—Withdraw your money as soon as you can from the concern in question and put it into the P.O. Savings Bank. You cannot get anything like the interest you mention with safety.

INSURANCE.

Law Guarantee and Trust.

CIRCULARS have been sent to various classes of people interested in the Law Guarantee and Trust Society, and a number of meetings representing various interests have been called; advice of all sorts has been tendered to everybody. Needless to say, the position is an extremely complicated one. Bad as it seemed when the failure was first announced, it has become vastly worse since then. Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady expressed the opinion that the creditors would not receive more than 16s. 6d. in the £, which would make it impossible for even the preference shareholders to obtain anything. The liquidators are suggesting that the claims of creditors should be postponed to the end of the year 1918, in order to allow of the realisation of securities to the best advantage, interest being paid to creditors at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum. The scheme suggested by the liquidators appears, as far as I can judge, to be the best possible in the circumstances. Policies were issued guaranteeing over £5,000,000 on mortgages and about £6,000,000 on debentures. It appears that these policy-holders are not "secured creditors" under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts, for the reason that the property included in their security is not the property of the society. All these creditors can prove for the full amounts due to them without deducting anything for the value of their securities—namely, the mortgages and debentures—unless actually realised before the date of proof. There are various other complicated circumstances which combine to render the scheme suggested by the liquidators about the best possible in the circumstances.

At the time of the failure the preference shares were regarded as being of some value. This hope must now be abandoned, and both the preference and ordinary shareholders must make up their minds to the loss. The preference shares were paid up in full, but the ordinary shareholders are faced with a call of £5 per share over and above the call of £4 per share which was made last year. This loss to the shareholders, the policy-holders, and creditors of the company is a very serious matter in itself, but an even more serious matter remains—namely, the need for a searching investigation into the management of the business and the responsibilities of the directors and the manager. In few instances have more emphatic statements been made in regard to everything being well with a company at a time shortly before a hopelessly bad collapse. The shareholders were told that there was "no intention whatever of making a call upon our shares," only to receive a call very shortly afterwards. Properties taken over were "not a subject of anxiety to your board," and it now appears that they ought to have been a subject of very considerable anxiety; there was "nothing to cause anxiety and alarm," when, if the directors had had the least inkling of the facts, the position was serious in the extreme. Even the last chairman of the company, who was in no way responsible for the failure, and who was called in in the hope that his great business abilities would enable him to get the society out of its difficulties, did not realise the full badness of the situation. His report was full, as far as could be ascertained accurate, and came as a terrible surprise to every one. This extraordinary ignorance and optimism on the part of the directors is a very disquieting feature. If men whose reputations stood high and who were serving the society as directors can remain for years so ignorant of the trend of a business, it suggests that they paid no attention to it, or that they were not kept informed of important facts by the manager. If the manager himself was ignorant, it is putting it mildly to say that he ought not to have been so. Whatever the explanation may be, it is imperative that there should be a full investigation into the conduct of the business. There seems to be no getting away from the fact that the shareholders, and perhaps the creditors also, were persuaded to take a course directly after the failure which they would not have taken had they been aware of the full facts as they are known to-day. Much good-intentioned but mistaken advice was tendered to them, and voluntary liquidation was decided upon because they were told that adequate investigation would be just as possible under voluntary as under compulsory liquidation.

Investigation costs money. The shareholders cannot be expected to add to their losses by paying for an investigation that would be unlikely to benefit financially either the ordinary or even the preference shareholders. All the assets that can be scraped together belong to creditors, and if there were no reasonable probability of obtaining any redress from the directors or manager the creditors would naturally prefer to put the money in their own pockets rather than pay for an investigation, even though this might cost but a small fraction of the assets.

The only conclusion that can be come to, therefore, is that in some way or another means must be found for an investigation by the Board of Trade. Justice to everybody demands that this should be done. It is requisite in the interests not only of creditors and shareholders, but of directors and officials. It certainly does not appear that the directors considered or insisted upon sound principles for the conduct of the business. It may, or may not, be the case that favoured individuals obtained a guarantee of mortgages on relatively bad security, while other people were refused guarantees on security that was much better. If such things happened, justice to the directors and to the shareholders requires that they should be known; if such things did not happen, justice to the manager equally requires that the facts should be made public. However the matter is looked at, an official inquiry of the most thorough character is imperatively necessary, and if this is not forthcoming the State will fail in the administration of justice, which is one of the most fundamental of its functions.

Answers to Correspondents.

[Inquiries on the subject of insurance are answered in this column every week. Every letter containing an inquiry must be accompanied by a coupon cut from the third page of the coloured cover of Truth ]

Inquirer.—1. The society is sound, reliable, and suitable. 2. Possibly the National Mutual of Australasia might be better. Engineer.—I doubt if you will obtain a lower rate of premium than you are quoted by the London and Lancashire Fire, which is a first-class company, and their policy is a good one. I will deal with the general subject shortly, either in an article or a letter to you. A. J., Mangalore.—All three companies are good, but perhaps in the long run you would do best with the United Kingdom Temperance or Scottish Life. I can recommend no better companies for your purpose than these two. Scot.—Century Assurance Company. Spinster.—1. The Legal and General is safe for the object you have in view. 2. The General Accident Assurance Corporation of Perth will give you the guarantee at a very small cost. Lancer.—I do not think you need have any fear about the security of your policy. Interested.—1. There is very considerable probability of the present rate of bonus being maintained. 2. Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York. I may comment next week on the points you raise. Como.—I should prefer the Norwich Union. I can make no better suggestion. Sirrom.—It is disappointing to find results so much less than the estimates. In themselves, however, the results are distinctly good, and you have no claim to any more than the office quotes. The bonuses are dependent on profits, and these for various reasons are less than it was expected they would be. White Hussar.—I think you may safely take the policy in the company you mention. Nancy Stair.—(a) I think you are entitled to rebate of income-tax on the premiums paid for life assurance, and your husband should make the claim when sending in his return. (b) The society is one of the best in existence. (c) Presumably it would be sent to the broker. Ebor.—I can recommend the Confederation for your purpose, but am not so confident about the other company you mention. N. De P.—1. I do not think residence abroad matters for the policy you mention. Obtain particulars from the Norwich Union Life and the Scottish Life. 2. Probably sound, but not among the best. G. Myles.—The figures given you were estimates of profits, and not guarantees. You shared the luck of the company, and things turned out badly. You have no claim to any more than you are offered, since if you were paid more some other policy-holder would have less than his share. The amount of the bonus is determined by the actuary. You had better take whatever option you prefer. You are only wasting time and trouble in disputing the matter. This particular society is subject to serious adverse criticism in connection with numerous cases such as yours, but unfortunately it is beyond question that you have no remedy. E. A. H., Southport.—I am entirely familiar with all the facts you mention, and you made a bad choice when taking your policy originally. You have, however, been perfectly fairly treated, and had I the space I could easily show that practically all your arguments are unsound.

THE UNION LIFE ASSURANCE.

IMPORTANT FORTHCOMING INSURANCE ISSUE. GUARANTEED DIVIDENDS OF 6 PER CENT.

A distinguished body of gentlemen interested in assurance and industrial enterprises in Canada assembled on Friday last at the London Chamber of Commerce to meet Mr. H. Pollman Evans, the president of the directors of the Union Life Assurance Company (Dominion of Canada), in connection with the forthcoming issue of capital. Viscount Maitland, chairman of the London Advisory Board, was to have presided, but at the last moment he telegraphed his regret at being unable to be present.

Mr. H. Pollman Evans, after expressing regret that Viscount Maitland had been unable to attend and his gratitude to the gentlemen present for their attendance, said :—

We are gathered together to-day to consider the extension in Canada of an institution of voluntary thrift.

It had its foundation in this country, where it has been brought to a stage of development and to such a degree of usefulness that it directly affects more than 20,000,000 people.

Here it has come to be regarded as almost a national institution. It affords an outstanding example of efficient and economical administration that in the completeness of its organisation is unrivalled by any other department of private enterprise. The institution to which I refer is that of Industrial Insurance, which makes such beneficent provision for the working classes.

In considering Canada as a field for the profitable extension of this institution it is important to examine the conditions under which it has been successfully established here and elsewhere, and then to compare the conditions which prevail in Canada for its successful application.

In countries where the system has been introduced we find that its ministrations have been first applied to the cities and towns and centres of dense population, where it has brought the greatest benefits.

The British Press has so kindly and enthusiastically championed the natural resources of Canada and its great unoccupied stretches of arable land that the ordinary man in the street knows more of these vast unpopulated areas than he does of the almost unprecedentedly rapid growth of our cities and large towns.

The story of limitless fields of waving wheat, of elevators bursting with the golden grain, makes a more powerful appeal to the imagination than the sooty triumphs of city activities.

The manufactured products alone of Canada in 1909 amounted to nearly $1,000,000,000, being an increase during the past eight years of $500,000,000, or double the production of 1901.

The Increasing Flow of Population.

This remarkable expansion in manufacturing has accelerated an already pronounced flow of population towards the cities and towns. In 1891 the percentage of urban population was 31.8 of the whole. In 1901 this was increased to 37.6; 1906 disclosed a further increase to 40.5, while last year it was computed that upwards of 43 per cent. of the total population of Canada reside in the cities, towns, and incorporated villages.

Great urban communities are being almost magically created in Canada. Montreal, with its suburbs, is said to have 592,000 population, Toronto over 400,000, while Winnipeg and Vancouver have 150,000 and 100,000 respectively. Besides which a score of large towns are rapidly approaching the status of substantial centres of population filled with manufacturing activity.

An army of regularly employed and well paid workmen form the bone and sinew of these centres.

The bank deposits during the past ten years have increased by upwards of 500,000,000 dollars. In the few days preceding Christmas of last year the Post Office money orders sent from Canada payable in Great Britain alone amounted to more than a million dollars, which is evidence of the thrifty character of the splendid new settlers which you have sent out to us. In the last three years the money orders issued by the Dominion Post Office Department payable outside of Canada have amounted to more than fifty million dollars, which throws an interesting side-light on the character of the working population.

Canada as a Field for Assurance.

To return to the subject of assurance. The policies of insurance in force in Canada equal only 7 per cent. of the population, while in Great Britain, out of less than forty-five millions of people, there are upwards of thirty-seven million policies in force, or a number equal to 80 per cent. of the population.

In the United Kingdom the premiums received annually by industrial life insurance institutions amount to about 7s. per head of the population, while in Canada, owing to the present undeveloped state of the business, the amount is less than 1s., notwithstanding the higher average rate of Canadian wages.

The cities and the growing towns of Canada urgently demand a more intensive development of this great system which has made the Prudential of England the colossus of the insurance world. The development of Canadian resources and the significant growth of urban population point to a field for the extension of the business that must appeal to every person who has seen the success of the great British offices.

Population is the raw material of industrial insurance, but instead of first having to assemble it at great cost, like a manufacturing enterprise, we find it lying at our very doors, daily piling up, in fact, before us, and awaiting only the enlargement of our facilities to turn it into a finished product which will return a fertilising stream of income, producing an abundant harvest of profits.

There is therefore in Canada comparatively a virgin field to be exploited. The company over which I have the honour to preside is already established in the confidence of the people, with a highly efficient field organisation, and is therefore in a strikingly favourable position to take advantage of the potential opportunities which a country like Canada, with its unceasing influx of population—the large part already familiar with the system in their native country—presents for its development. Such a company can hardly fail to reap an immediate and abundant reward as a result of continuing a vigorous and prudent policy of development. Not only will such a course produce substantial returns in dividends, but a rapid appreciation in the capital value to the shareholders is practically certain. Thus we have a threefold combination, which admittedly is difficult now to obtain in England—an absolutely safe investment, a reasonable return in dividends, and the assurance of steadily increasing capital values.

A Canadian Prudential.

It is given to the Union Life Assurance Company to have the opportunity to reproduce in Canada the success of the Prudential in England. It already has more than a fair start, and possesses the confidence of the people to a marked extent; the company holds in every respect the premier position, securing annually double the business obtained by the other two Canadian offices combined, but in capital resources for development purposes the company is not as big as its opportunity, and, like other enterprises, it is thought to be desirable to come to the Motherland for assistance to enable us to carry out with as little delay as possible the plans which have been formulated for creating in Canada, under the stringent Canadian insurance laws, an industrial life assurance office that in usefulness and profit will vie with, if not rival, the successes of the British companies.

No regular life insurance company has ever failed in Canada, which, I believe is an unexampled record of financial stability, and must be regarded as a tribute to the wisdom of Canadian insurance legislation and supervision, beneficial to shareholders and policy-holders alike.

It should be noted that before inviting the British public to come into the business, the Canadian shareholders have spent nearly nine years in bringing the undertaking to its present state of efficiency, and making a demonstrated success in the field which it covers. Sixty-two per cent. of the total industrial business of the Canadian companies is carried by the Union Life, which is effective proof of the advanced stage of success already obtained by the Company. The spade work has been done, the foundations of the business are deeply laid in the confidence of the people, a substantial permanent annual revenue has been secured, and reserve funds built up on a more stringent basis than the strongest British Industrial Office.

The New Issue of Capital.

Mr. Edward A. Rusher, F.I.A., F.S.S., assistant actuary to the Prudential Assurance Company, was invited to report on the proposed new issue of capital, and strongly recommended its introduction, and reported that the existing business alone was sufficient to pay moderate dividends on the whole capital, and that the extension of the business would result in substantially higher dividends and an increase in the value of the shares.

A minimum dividend of 6 per cent. for three years is guaranteed, by which time the directors believe that dividends of upwards of 10 per cent. may confidently be expected from the development of the business arising from the additional capital. The strong reserve funds held by the company and the comparatively higher interest rate earned lend additional strength to this expectation. It is believed that this issue of shares presents one of the most attractive securities which has been offered to the Mother Country from her dominions beyond the sea. It has the threefold advantage of a guaranteed immediate return, the considered promise of an increasing dividend, and the assurance of a rapidly advancing capital value represented by an increasing premium on the shares, and the fulfilment of these expectations is supported by the fact that in a history of sixty-two years there has never been a failure of a regular life insurance company in Canada. Such an unexampled record cannot but inspire confidence, aside from the inherent soundness of the Union Life business itself, as shown by its past success.

We confidently believe this is an exceptional opportunity to obtain a share on generous terms in a successful established business that promises steady and increasing returns, together with vast possibilities for capital appreciation.

I am deeply grateful to you, gentlemen, for coming here to-day, and more especially to Mr. Schooling, who is well known to you all. I need not say anything to you regarding him or his work, for he is a very well-known authority on assurance subjects in the City. He will have a few remarks to make regarding the proposed issue of ours, and I am sure that he will be listened to by everybody with the greatest possible attention and interest.

An Authority on Assurance.

Mr. William Schooling: I will not detain you very long, but there is one thing that I would specially like to call your attention to, and there are a few facts that I would like to lay before you in regard to the insurance side of this issue. It has been my business for some fifteen years past to write about assurance matters and to criticise insurance companies. When this matter of the Union Life was first brought to me I looked into the figures very carefully, and checked them with the Canadian Blue Books. I came to the conclusion that the Union Life had possibilities of very great development in Canada, and of much profitableness for the shareholders. You probably know—a lot of people do not—the distinction between ordinary and industrial life assurance. Industrial companies give policies for small amounts, the premiums for which are paid every week. These small amounts have to be collected, and this involves very considerable expenditure; at the same time, as you have seen in the case of the Prudential, of the Pearl, and other companies, a very big business is being done, and a small percentage of profit on a large business is sufficient to pay very good dividends indeed on the capital invested in the business. Industrial life assurance has this distinct characteristic: it is extremely difficult, risky, and expensive to start. A great many companies, tempted by the success of some of the big industrial offices here, have been started in this country, and a good many of them have failed during their early years; but when once the difficulties of the early years have been got over, then success has always been almost inevitable. You have got to muddle things in a more hopeless way than I have ever seen them muddled before, to prevent an industrial life office that has once got through its early years, being anything but a big success. Now, there are certain reasons why a Canadian industrial life office should be even more successful and more profitable to the people concerned in it than a similar business in this country. One point to which Mr. Evans has referred is that at the present time the number of industrial policies in proportion to the population is very small in Canada; it is only about one in fifteen of the population; in the United States it is something like one in four, and in the United Kingdom it is about eight policies for every ten people, so that there is in Canada a comparatively undeveloped field in which the Union Life can work. A second point, and a very satisfactory one, is that by the insurance laws of Canada insurance companies have to hold reserves calculated by actuaries attached to the Insurance Department of the Dominion as security for the policy-holders on a basis which is a great deal stronger than is really necessary; it is stronger than the valuation basis adopted even by the Prudential Company in this country. Personally I think this is a mistake, because the provision for the policy-holders is unnecessarily large. But it has this effect, that year by year as you calculate what your liabilities are you find that your funds have grown to a greater extent than is necessary, and that consequently you have large surpluses which are available for distribution in the form of profit to the shareholders. The business undertaken by the Union Life is mainly of this industrial class, but it also issues ordinary policies for which premiums can be paid yearly, half yearly, or quarterly. All these policies are issued on the non-participating plan, so that the policy-holders do not share in the profits, the whole of which go to the shareholders. This non-profit business is a good deal more popular in Canada and in the United States than it is over here, where, as you know, the great bulk of the ordinary life assurance business is conducted on the plan that gives the policy-holders a share in the profits or bonuses.

Factors Making for Success.

There are various other factors which make for the exceptional success of the Union Life. One thing is that in the United Kingdom the average amount of each industrial policy is only about £10, whereas in the Union Life the average amount of each industrial policy is £23, so that out of each individual the Union Life gets nearly three times as much in premium. As a matter of fact, they are more prosperous in Canada, and they can afford to pay rather more. The second conspicuous fact has been referred to in Mr Rusher's report, and it has been commented upon as singularly favourable by several actuaries with whom I talked on this subject, and that is that the policies do not lapse to anything like the same extent in Canada as they do in this country. If you talk to any man engaged in the industrial life business over here he will tell you that one of the great troubles and causes of loss in industrial business is that people do not keep up the payment of their premiums, and, consequently, their policies lapse. That means a loss to the companies owing to the necessity of their having to pay commission to their agents for getting the business. That commission is rather expensive in the first year or so, and is a distinct loss to the industrial companies over here, but that is a loss which the Union Life is not incurring to anything like the same extent. Then there is a third factor, which makes for even greater success in the case of the Union Life when compared with industrial companies here. The industrial offices here take anybody under these industrial policies. They do not require any medical examination, whereas the Union Life has always made a practice of requiring a medical examination even in the case of industrial policy holders. The effect of this is that more or less unsound and unhealthy lives are rejected, only reasonably healthy lives being accepted. The benefits of adopting that course are shown by the extremely favourable rate of mortality that prevails among the policy-holders of the Union Life. I will not weary you with figures by way of comparing the rate of mortality with that of companies in England or in the United States, but Mr. Rusher, in his report—Mr. Rusher is the assistant actuary of the Prudential, and a man who knows his business extremely well, and who could not afford to say anything he did not believe—says: "From the investigations I have made the business appears to have been carefully selected, the average claim rate being low for an industrial company of the age of the Union Life." Therefore you can well say that it is likely to produce a larger profit when claims come in at a later date than they otherwise would owing to the favourable mortality, and owing to the fact that people live for a longer time.

You know that nothing succeeds like success. The Union Life occupies the premier position among industrial Canadian life companies, and it is for practical purposes an impossibility to spend too much money on the development of industrial life assurance in the interests of the shareholders. The more extensive you make your organisation and the more quickly you build it up the greater are your ultimate profits. This is a case where the investors may quite soon get reasonable dividends, but it is essentially a case where a really big thing can be looked for, and, in my judgment, that ultimate success is a certainty, which you really could not avoid even if you tried.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

BOINSU RUBBER COMPANY, LIMITED.

The statutory meeting of the shareholders in the Boinsu Rubber Company, Limited, was held on the 14th inst., at Salisbury House, London, Mr. Jack Thomas Grein presiding.

The Chairman, in the course of his speech, said: You have all received a copy of the directors' report, from which you will have observed that the number of shares subscribed for is 308,842 out of a total of 340,000 offered to the public. This is one of the few companies whose issue was not underwritten, so that of the £264,016 received to June 30, in respect of shares allotted, none of the company's capital has gone to underwriters. The first business of the directors was to secure the services of an efficient manager, and they are pleased to say they induced Mr. J. P. Brown, late member of the Legislative Council of the Gold Coast Colony, to accept this position. Mr. Brown is rightly regarded on the coast as a keen man of business, and he possesses extraordinary influence with the native chiefs in the western division of the colony, an influence which we have reason to believe will be used in favour of this company in certain negotiations now pending, which should turn out to be of profit. The directors have very carefully considered the plan of operations to be followed, and have come to the conclusion that there are three important sources of revenue for the company. Briefly stated, these are: (1) trading; (2) tapping the wild rubber and vines and cutting mahogany on the company's own property; and (3) planting. The order in which these are stated is that of their present, although probably not of their ultimate respective importance. In the first place, the purchase and shipment of rubber can be started at once, and has already been commenced, the £1,000 referred to earlier having been remitted for that purpose. The next in importance as an immediate source of revenue is the tapping of the company's own trees and vines, of which Mr. Brown has estimated there are some 137,000 on the property. This work can also be commenced practically at once. There is a matter upon which you will expect me to say something—and that is with respect to the company's lease, which has been the subject of a certain amount of criticism. I should like to make a few remarks by way of clearing the air, for it is quite evident from the nature of the objections which have been brought to our notice that a great deal of misunderstanding exists. The prospectus, on the statements of fact in which you bought your shares, refers to the title of the company's property as follows:—"The estates are held from the Resident Chief of the district under a lease dated February 1, 1910 (ratified and confirmed by the Chief of Boinsu and the Paramount Chief's representative) for a term of ninety-nine years, from February 1, 1910. The lease is held by Mr. W. S. Rogerson at the low rent of £5 per annum, as trustee for the Boinsu Estates Syndicate, Limited." Now that is a perfectly clear and definite statement of certain facts. The lease was obtained by Mr. Rogerson from the chiefs; it was registered in the colony and stamp duty paid thereon, and it has since been assigned to this company. What the company bought was the lease held by Mr. Rogerson and nothing more. All we want is a fair field and sufficient time to allow our energies to produce results, and, given these, we have no doubt that when we meet you all again next year we shall be able to give a satisfactory account of our stewardship.

INTERNATIONAL TEA COMPANY'S STORES, LIMITED.

The annual general meeting of the shareholders in the International Tea Company's Stores, Limited, was held, on the 13th inst., at Winchester House, London, Mr. G. A. Tonge, J.P. (one of the governing directors) presiding.

The Chairman, in the course of his speech, said:—We are glad to be able to come before you again with a satisfactory balance-sheet and report. The profit for the past year is, as you see £123,150, and this is £6,900 in excess of that of the previous year. When I think of the adverse markets that we seem always to have, and also the growing competition that we have to meet, I feel that there is a good deal to be satisfied with. No business of this kind can be kept in a sound state unless ample provision is made for reserve, depreciation and development. Were we not looking well ahead we might, no doubt, easily declare a 10 per cent. or 12 per cent. dividend on the ordinary shares, but, as it is, the profit of £123,000 enables us to pay 7 per cent., to put £20,000 to depreciation account, £15,000 to reserve, and to carry forward £8,048, as against £4,906 brought in. You will notice that the reserve account now stands at the substantial sum of £272,383, and also that the freehold properties amount to £269,605. These latter consist mainly of shop property, which we occupy, much of it purchased years ago, and which, if it were revalued, would, I think, be found to be worth some thousands more than it stands at here. The item of debtors, £147,696, is slightly larger than last year, owing to the expansion of our wholesale trade, which is one of very short credit, and I have no doubt the whole of this item is liquidated by now. The stock at £298,859 is also rather heavier; this, of course, varies as the business increases, and as it may be necessary to protect ourselves more at one time than another against rising markets. Those of you here who have only recently become shareholders may like to know that this company was formed in 1895, the average profits for the three years prior to the conversion being about £55,000 a year. The vendors took the whole of the ordinary shares and a portion of the preference, and I may tell you that up to now they have not sold a single ordinary share and that they hold a larger number of preference shares than they did originally. The whole of the capital subscribed by the public has been returned to them in dividends, and if we were to wind up the business to-day, without any regard to the fixtures, fittings, leaseholds, plant, machinery, etc., the whole of the preference capital would be found intact in easily realisable assets. There are no debentures, and, what is more, no debentures can be created without the consent of three-fourths of the preference shareholders. As to the future, I may tell you that the turnover, both wholesale and retail, is far larger than at any time during the company's career. If we were able to make the percentage of profits that we used to make with more favourable markets some five or six years ago, our earnings would, I believe, be nearer £170,000 than £123,000. Whether we shall get these favourable markets again I do not know; but in the long run I think the business will progress as well in the future as it has in the past. We have now some 360 branches, and there are quite another 400 towns where we are unrepresented.

The report was unanimously adopted.

RUBANA RUBBER ESTATES.

Extension of the Planted Area—Rubber Prices.

The statutory meeting of the Rubana Rubber Estates, Limited, was held on Monday at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C., Mr. Edward L. Hamilton presiding.

The Secretary (Mr. Percy E. L. Taylor) having read the notice convening the meeting,

The Chairman said: Gentlemen,—This is the statutory meeting of the company, which it is necessary for us to hold in order to comply with Section 65 of the Companies Act of 1908. The business before us to-day is purely formal, and there are no resolutions to submit to you, but you will, no doubt, like to hear what progress has been made since the company was formed. From the report which has been issued to the shareholders, and which has been in your hands for some time, you will observe that 100,000 shares of £1 each have been allotted, and that 12s. 6d. per share has been paid. The issue was largely over-subscribed, and it was necessary to close the list a few minutes after it was opened. The preliminary expenses amounted to £951 17s. 3d. at the date of the report, and it is anticipated that the total will not reach the amount estimated for in the prospectus. The estate was taken over as from May 1, and the transfer of the property from the vendors to this company is, according to cable advices which we have received within the past few days, expected to be completed very shortly. The property, which comprises about 4,883 acres, is held, as stated in the prospectus, on exceptionally favourable terms. It is held in perpetuity free from rent until cultivated, and when cultivated the rent payable is only 50 cents., or 1s. 2d. per acre per annum—a very low figure when compared with the $3 and $4 per acre payable on land taken up on the new terms, which rent is payable whether the land is cultivated or not. The area under rubber cultivation on May 1 last, the date the property was taken over, was 1,119 acres, and the policy of the board is to bring the cultivated area up to 3,000 acres as quickly as labour conditions will permit. A start has been made, and at this date 220 acres have been felled, of which 140 acres have been burned. Mr. Duncan, our general manager, anticipates little difficulty in being able to successfully plant 500 acres before the close of the company's first financial year, say, by April 30, 1911, and if he succeeds in doing so it will bring the area under rubber up to 1,600 acres.

The Yield of Rubber.

The labour force is being increased gradually, and now numbers 820 souls, exclusive of Malays engaged in felling. Chinese are also being employed with satisfactory results. The estimated yield of rubber from the estate since the property was taken over is given by the manager at 10,000 lbs. for May, 12,500 lbs. for June, and for the first half of this month we have got, according to cabled advices received yesterday 7,500 lbs. It therefore looks like getting a yield of 15,000 lbs. or over in July. With the usual increase which comes with the autumn months of the year, and the additional trees which will be coming under the knife each month, it is anticipated that the yield will soon jump considerably, and it is hoped that the quantity—namely, 240,000 lbs. of rubber—estimated in the prospectus will be harvested during the first year of the company's operations. This is, therefore, not a waiting proposition. It is a concern producing rubber on a large scale, which should return to the shareholders a good dividend during the first year of the company's existence. A profit of only 5s. per lb. was estimated in the prospectus, but it is obvious that if the present prices of rubber are maintained the profit will be much greater. We must all recognise, I think, that the prices ruling to-day are abnormal, and while it is very pleasant for producing companies like ourselves to get these prices, I am convinced it would in the long run be better for the industry if we had a lower level of values. However, it is a matter over which we have no control, and which must be left to work itself out by the ordinary rules of supply and demand. A satisfactory feature is that the increasing yields during the next few years should fully compensate us for any probable decline in prices. The machinery recently sent out is working satisfactorily, and we are advised that there is no fear for some time of not being able to cope with the output. Arrangements will, of course, be made to send out more machinery in ample time to deal with the increasing crops. Every effort is being made to make the estate attractive for labour, and there is at present accommodation for 200 coolies more than are on the estate. A new hospital is in course of erection, which will do away with the necessity of sending the coolies across the river to the Nova Scotia estate. The growing requirements of the estate necessitate the erection of another dwelling for Europeans. The present European staff consists of a manager and four assistants, and we have as general manager Mr. William Duncan, one of the most experienced rubber planters in the Federated Malay States, who has the advantage of having been connected with the estate since it was first opened out. I believe we have a most valuable property, which, under the capable management which we have secured, should prove a very profitable investment for the shareholders. I think that is all I have to tell you to-day. There are no resolutions to submit to you, but if any shareholder wishes to ask any questions I will endeavour to answer them to the best of my ability.

No questions being asked,

Mr. Berthon proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman for presiding which was seconded by Mr. J. B. Young and adopted.

The Chairman having returned thanks, the proceedings terminated

KLIAN-KELLAS TIN AND RUBBER COMPANY.

The statutory meeting of the Klian-Kellas Tin and Rubber Company, Limited, was held at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C., Mr. Edward Bedford (chairman of the company) presiding.

The representative of the secretaries (Messrs. Taylor, Noble, and Co.) having read the notice convening the meeting,

The Chairman said:—Gentlemen,—This meeting is, as you are aware, quite a formal one, held to comply with the Companies Acts, and it is not to be supposed that in the short space of eleven weeks that has elapsed since the company was formed any very great progress can have been made. I should like, however, to refer to two items in the report, viz., £1,000 preliminary expenses. I would point out that the parent company, Kellas, Limited, paid all the usual preliminary expenses, and the only expense we have to meet is the stamp duty on transfer, which will certainly not amount to £1,000. The £1,000 remitted is intended to cover this expense, and is to be drawn upon for this and also other expenses in connection with planting which is proceeding upon the estate. Later on the report refers to £500 as the estimate of preliminary expenses. We think that this will fully cover the transfer costs, and with this exception all our working capital will be available for developing and equipping our property. The capital offered for subscription was largely over-subscribed. We have every reason to believe that the reserve capital, over which the vendor company has an option, will be taken up if and when we may require additional capital. Upon our properties active operations have commenced upon the Waterloo Estate, where our new assistant manager, who will act under the direction of Mr. W. Kellie Smith, reports that he is having all the old trees cleared and drained, and he has already commenced tapping. The 100 acres of planted rubber has been cleared and supplied up, and 200 acres adjoining is being felled ready for planting. Our assistant manager has not yet completed his census, but he estimates that instead of 200 old trees, as referred to in the prospectus, there are nearer 2,000, and some of these are the very best trees of 36 ins. to 48 ins. girth. We expect to plant 200 acres on Waterloo this year, and 200 to 300 acres on Waterloo and the same on the Kellas portion of the property next year, so that by the end of 1911, in addition to the actual old trees I have referred to, we may have 700 to 800 acres of planted rubber. Upon our tin area we have 232 acres proved, and we are proceeding with borings upon the 1,500 acres of new area. Our consulting engineers, Messrs. Lake and Currie, have in hand the work of equipment, and Mr. Currie, of that firm, is now in Australia with reference to the designing of the plant, and he will there contract for same. The plant will be shipped and re-erected on its site and worked by competent engineers from Australia, who will be selected by Mr. Currie, and we anticipate that the plant ought to be running by the end of this year.

After some questions had been answered the meeting terminated with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

KELLAS, LIMITED.

The third ordinary general meeting of Kellas, Limited, was held at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, London, E.C., Mr. Edward Bedford, C.E. (chairman of the company), presiding.

The Chairman in the course of his remarks said: The estimate for the year was 5,000 lbs. of rubber, and we actually realised 6,375 lbs. at 7s. per lb., while we planted 300 additional acres of rubber and had forty-three acres in course of planting. At the end of the year we had therefore 800 acres of planted rubber and forty-three acres in course of planting, while the remaining available resources were £5,000, represented by the uncalled amount upon our large estate. Still, if we had stopped at this point our capital would have enabled us to have brought our planted rubber area up to 1,000 acres, with the certainty that from the current year onwards we could from the rubber production have paid substantial dividends upon our capital, or as an alternative if we had desired to fully realise the possibilities of our property we could have deferred dividends and have devoted the profits to slow and steady development. Quite apart, however, from the rubber production of our estate you will remember that the original prospectus referred to the great possibilities of the property as a tin-bearing area, and during the year the borings disclosed and located valuable deposits of this metal. Statistical results of these borings were submitted to Messrs. Lake and Currie, the well-known mining experts, who formed thereon a highly favourable opinion and recommended the working of the deposits. I now come to the second portion of my statement—viz., the policy we adopted and its results to date. It was obviously impossible to adequately deal with the problem by supplementing the moderate amount of capital available from the profits as they accrued from rubber production, and the directors decided it would be to the interest of the shareholders to form subsidiary companies. In pursuance of this policy two companies had been formed—viz., the Kinta Kellas Rubber Estates, Limited, with a nominal capital of £80,000, to which we sold 800 acres of planted rubber and 700 acres additional land for extensions, 1,500 acres in all. We received £55,000—that is, £15,000 in cash and 400,000 fully paid 2s. shares. This issue provided a clear £10,000 cash working capital, in addition to reserve capital, which will give our first subsidiary £35,000 of working capital in all. This is ample to extend and bring into bearing the whole 1,500 acres, leaving all current revenue from rubber, etc., free for distribution. The issue was largely over-subscribed, and as the shareholders received preferential consideration this was equivalent to a very handsome bonus upon their shares. The crop of rubber is well up to the estimate stated in the Kinta Kellas prospectus, and it will, we think, be exceeded for 1910. We had for the current year sold forward 11,200 lbs. at 7s. per lb. and to this Kellas delivered 2,445 lbs. during January and February. The Kinta Kellas yield since the formation of the company has been: March, 1,400 lbs.; April, 1,730 lbs.; May, 2,096 lbs.; and June, 2,086 lbs. We have now practically delivered all the rubber sold forward, and as at present advised we do not propose to again sell forward at current prices. I come now to our second subsidiary, the Klian Kellas Tin and Rubber Company, formed early in May with a capital of £70,000. The property taken over was 232 acres of tin-bearing deposits and a right to select a mineral area. The company also acquired the Waterloo Estate of 1,000 acres. The rubber prospects here are also good, and on the Waterloo Estate tapping has started. The net result as regarded Kellas is that we have our interests in these two companies and a large acreage of land left. There is no doubt we shall be able to distribute large dividends.

Mr. Taylor seconded the adoption of the report, and it was carried unanimously.

DEMERARA RUBBER.

The statutory general meeting of the Demerara Rubber Company, Limited, was held on the 12th inst. at the London Commercial Sale Rooms, 30, Mincing Lane, E.C., the Hon. Lionel Holland presiding.

The Chairman, in the course of his speech, said: It is satisfactory to know that the issue was fully subscribed by the public; indeed, it was over subscribed. We have, I think, about 1,100 shareholders. As you are aware, your company was formed to take over two freehold plantations, and the collecting rights over about 4,000 square miles of land, bordering upon rivers in British Guiana. The plantations comprise some 1,200 acres, of which some 380 are already under cultivation. There are some 6,000 Hevea and 12,000 Sapium rubber trees, of from one to three years old on the Rubberton Estate, and 3,000 on the Land of Canaan. It will be a satisfaction to you to know that the transfers have been fully completed for these properties and possession granted to our company. Both the plantations and the licences for the concession have now been legally transferred, and our manager is in possession and at work. Our tenure is secure. Our plantation properties are freehold, and we have the advantage of holding our collecting rights direct from the British Government. The two plantations are known as Rubberton and Land of Canaan. We have, in Mr. Smyth, a manager of first-rate experience, an expert planter, with good tact in handling men, and with twenty-five years' experience in the colony. A recent report from Mr. Smyth tells us that both the Hevea and Sapium rubber trees are looking remarkably healthy and vigorous, and many of only three years old are 18 ins. in circumference. The Sapium Jenmani rubber tree is indigenous to the colony, and its rubber approaches the value of Para; but it comes to maturity in three years instead of five or six. It must be remembered also that Hevea Brasiliensis is indigenous to Brazil, and, as British Guiana adjoins that country, it can be no stranger there, either. We may fairly claim, therefore, that we have the right class of rubber trees and the proper soil and climate. We are out of the storm zone, in a district that is not unhealthy. Labour is reported plentiful, and we can obtain coolies on indenture from the Government when we desire them. Beside the few thousand rubber trees in the Land of Canaan estate, there are also about 32,000 cocoa trees and 7,000 coffee trees, besides kola, nutmegs, and limes, while the rest of the land is suitable for rubber, and some 500 acres or so are already prepared ready for planting. We ought to be getting at once our crops from the plantations, so that whilst the grass is growing the steed will not be starving. Our planters in British Guiana have the advantage of assistance from the Government Board of Agriculture. The Government overseers take the keenest interest in helping every planter, advising him on the best crops, the best manure, and the best treatment, thus preventing much waste of time and money in experiments. I think I may safely say that our prospects are thoroughly encouraging, and I believe before long that others will discover that this British colony is one of the best lands for investment in rubber-growing plantations and in balata. In brief, our sources of income are so various and good that we look with considerable confidence to the future. (Applause.)

ESSEQUIBO RUBBER AND TOBACCO.

The statutory meeting of the Essequibo Rubber and Tobacco Estates, Limited, was held on Thursday at Salisbury House, London Wall, E.C., Sir Henry Seton-Karr, C.M.G., chairman of the company, presiding

The Chairman said that the company started with ample working capital, as practically the whole amount offered was subscribed, and the balance of shares left over would be taken by the vendors in part payment of the purchase consideration. He thought that was an interesting point, as it showed that the company was in a strong financial position. They looked upon the tobacco business as something of a side issue, but it promised to yield a good contribution to their revenue. Dealing with their rubber estates, he said that they possessed some 200 square miles in British Guiana, about four days' journey from Georgetown, partly by river and partly by rail. It was stated on good authority that the territory at the head of the Essequibo and Demerara Rivers was very favourably situated for both balata—which is gutta-percha—and rubber. In fact, the country had been described as "one of the most luxuriant tropical regions under the British flag." The cultivation of plantation rubber in that colony promised to prove very successful, and the prices realised for British Guiana rubber in the past compared favourably with those obtained for Para rubber. With regard to the plantation question, it was one to which the directors were devoting very earnest attention. The evidence was that the rubber tree was indigenous to the colony, and, what was more important, that plenty of saplings could be readily obtained without having to be carried from some other country or district. They were on the spot, and only required transplanting and having the ground cleared. The evidence so far as they had been able to gather it was that these saplings would thrive and do exceedingly well. It was stated that they should mature for tapping in about five or six years, and he expected that the company would then have successful and thriving plantations. In the meantime, however, they would get their profits from the wild rubber and also from tobacco. He was pleased to say that there was no reason to anticipate any difficulty as to labour. Every one who was connected with rubber knew that this question of labour was one of the most practical importance which they had to face, and he would mention in this connection that the company had properly organised expeditions and an experienced superintendent to develop their concessions properly. With regard to licences, application had been made to the Government to obtain the transfer of licences as soon as possible. As to finance, he repeated that they had ample funds available for the conduct of this new enterprise in a British colony. They had more than enough money for their present requirements, but they were taking steps to acquire further concessions in the same neighbourhood. The directors were ambitious, and desired to enlarge their area, and important negotiations were now in progress for this purpose, which, if they were successfully carried through, the directors hoped and believed would add largely to the value of the company's enterprise.

In reply to questions, the Chairman stated that the shareholders could rely upon the directors not parting with any more money until the transfer of the properties had been completed. They would apply as speedily as possible for Stock Exchange settlement in the shares.

QUEER STORY.

AN AUTUMN MANŒUVRE.

MR. THOMAS BURTON, reservist and ex-corporal of infantry, tapped his pipe on the railings with a deprecatory gesture.

"I think you're asking too much for them spuds, Josh," he said, "a deal too much."

Mr. Joshua Pickles, landlord of the "Goat and Moon" public-house, to whom the remark had been addressed, was a large, clean-shaven man, with an air of physical well-being and a slight cast in his left eye. Early that year he had planted the three roods or so of ground at the back of his house with potatoes. The crop had been a good one, and the tubers were now lying in one of his outhouses until such time as he could get what he considered was a satisfactory price for them.

Burton had been "nibbling"—so to speak—at those potatoes ever since the crop had been lifted. In civilian life his profession was that of a "higgler," or general dealer in any commodity on which he could turn a quick profit. Farm produce, firewood, chickens, eggs—all was fish that came into his net, and he made a fair living out of it, in a small way. During the winter he amused himself with a little quiet poaching.

"I think you're asking too much for them spuds, Josh," he said, "a deal too much."

"That's just where you're mistook, my lad," replied Mr. Pickles; "It ain't been a good year for taters, and these of mine is first class. Taters 'll be a fine price when the winter comes on. Why, they're selling now in places at eightpence and ninepence a stone, and 'ere am I offering 'em to you at sevenpence-halfpenny. If it wasn't as we'd done business together before, you wouldn't get such a chance of making a bit."

"I can't come above sevenpence," said Burton, obstinately.

"Sevenpence-halfpenny is my minimam," was the publican's reply, as he stuck his thumbs into the armholes of his waistcoat.

"Come now, Josh; I'll spring a bit, seeing as you're an old friend. Four-and-nine a hundred; come."

Mr. Pickles did a small sum on the railings with his finger, and then shook his head decidedly.

"Seven and a 'alf a stone is my terms," he pronounced. "Take it or leave it."

Burton gave it up.

"We'll talk about it some other time, Josh," he said, and strolled away, with his hands in his pockets, to the end of the village, where he sat down on a little hillock by the side of the unfenced road and lighted his pipe.

It was a bright September day, and the tints of autumn were already beginning to show themselves on the face of the country. Burton was sitting at the edge of Medley Common, which stretched away behind him for some miles. In front of him lay the valley of the River Meddle, beyond which rose a fairly steep range of hills. Army manœuvres were going on in the district, and Burton could hear the distant sound of artillery beyond the hills and at times the faint rattle of musketry fire. His pipe was drawing well, and he puffed at it luxuriously, chuckling to himself as he thought of the foot-weary troops sweating on the other side of the valley. Presently a jerky sort of flickering on the highest part of the hills attracted his attention. To the uninitiated it would have conveyed nothing, but Burton at once recognised it as the light of a heliograph, for he had been a signaller, and a good one. The shadow of a large cloud came over the light almost immediately, but Burton watched the spot where he had seen the light, and soon discerned a tiny dark-coloured flag waving against the skyline. The flag was nearly three miles away, but the atmosphere was bright and clear, and Burton, although out of practice, was a highly trained signaller. The Morse code, once learnt, is not easily forgotten. Shading his eyes with his hands, the reservist called out the letters aloud as he read them off the flag. He missed one or two, to be sure, but he read quite enough to give him a very clear idea of the message which was being sent. And the message, as he understood it, ran as follows:—

Quartermaster,
1st West Anglians.

Brigade camps to-night Medley Common—stop—also cavalry brigade—stop—contractor broken down—stop. Buy all potatoes in Medley before cavalry arrive.

Brigade Major, 24th Brigade.

The moment the message was finished the ex-signaller looked round to see where it had been sent to, and observed beyond the further end of the common a cloud of dust. This he at once concluded was made by a baggage column, and after watching it for a moment he caught the flicker of another heliograph close to it. The message, then, had evidently been sent to the baggage column.

Now Burton, in addition to having been a signaller, had at one time been employed as a sort of deputy assistant quartermaster's clerk, and he knew a few tricks of the trade. He knew, for instance, that when a contractor for military supplies breaks down, and is unable to fulfil his contract, the troops are entitled to purchase what he cannot supply, at his expense, and with no restriction as to price. In most cases this condition of contract is practically null and void, for the required supplies cannot be obtained in time to be of any use.

Burton devoted the next two or three minutes to the operation known as "putting two and two together." It was clear to him that within an hour or less the little village of Medley would see a boom in potatoes. He got up, walked back through the village, and entered the bar of the "Goat and Moon," where he ordered a pint of ale which was served to him by Mr. Pickles himself.

"Josh," he said as he withdrew his features from the tankard after a refreshing draught, "Josh, I've been thinking over what you said about them spuds, and p'raps you may be right. Anyways I'll chance it and give you what you want."

Now it was a most unusual thing for Burton to give in over a bargain so easily, and Pickles at once suspected that there must be a good reason for it, though what the reason was he had not the slightest idea.

"Oh, them taters," he said in a dispassionate voice, "Taters is riz since you was here a while back. A chap's been and made me an offer of eightpence a stone for them."

"Have you took it?" enquired Burton anxiously.

Pickles scratched his ear with the stem of his pipe in a thoughtful fashion. The other candidate for the potatoes existed only in his own imagination, and had been invented entirely for Burton's benefit.

"I can't rightly say as I've closed with it," he said, "'cos I thought as you ought to 'ave a last chance of getting 'em."

Burton breathed a strangled sigh of relief, and a shrewd suspicion crossed his mind that the name of his rival for the potatoes was probably "Walker." That, however, was beside the point.

"Eightpence is a lot of money for spuds in any quantity," he said, "but I'll tell you how it is. I've just heard tell where I can get shut of a tidy lot at eightpence halfpenny, so I'll take 'em off you. I won't make more nor a shilling or two out of it."

Mr. Pickles promptly accepted the offer, and drew another tankard of beer for his customer—free of charge—by way of sealing the bargain.

"Good 'ealth," remarked Burton, as he attacked the second tankard, "How many spuds can you let me have, Josh?"

"I don't rightly know, 'cos why? 'Cos they ain't been weighed yet. There must be a matter of well over two ton though; nearer two ton and a half."

"I'll take the lot," said Burton.

"Well, we must keep a few for ourselves, else we'll be 'aving to buy 'em back from you at ninepence." He winked knowingly.

"Shall we say three hundred stone, then?" Burton suggested. "That makes a nice even sum. Ten pound note."

"When are you going to pay for 'em?" asked Pickles, when he has ascertained by the process of mental arithmetic that this calculation was correct.

"Soon as ever I gets the money for 'em, Josh; before the end of the month for certain, and I don't mind giving you a quid on account when I takes away the first load. That ought to be this arternoon."

Some other customers entering the bar at this moment, Burton discreetly took his departure, and wended his way to the other end of the village again. The train of wagons had now halted in the middle of the common, about a mile from the village, and, their approach having become known, a few of the villagers were going out to look at them.

Presently an officer appeared, riding on a bicycle, and as he was a man verging on middle age, and only wore a subaltern's badges of rank, Burton rightly concluded that he must be a quartermaster, and in all probability the quartermaster for whom he was waiting.

Burton drew himself up and saluted, and the quartermaster, recognising the "old soldier" at a glance, got off his bicycle.

"You're just the man I want," he said. "Do you know of anywhere in the village where they have spuds for sale?"

"I've got some myself, sir," replied Burton. "In fact, I don't think as anybody else has got any."

"Capital. How many stone can you let me have?"

"A matter of three hundred stone, sir, if you want as many."

"Excellent; how much?"

"Well, it's been a bad year for roots, sir, and spuds is selling high just now. I couldn't let 'em go under elevenpence a stone."

"All right; elevenpence a stone will do me. The money isn't coming out of my pocket. Where are they?"

"In a shed, back of the 'Goat and Moon,' sir; just a little way down the village. You'll send for 'em, I suppose?"

"Yes; I'll have a wagon and a fatigue party there in less than half an hour."

The quartermaster then mounted his bicycle again and rode off to the convoy, while Burton walked back to the "Goat and Moon," where a select party were now discussing their midday pint and the advent of armed men in Medley.

Burton sat down in the bar with his eye on the window, and was at once assailed—as an expert—with inquiries as to whether more troops would be coming, whether the band would play, whether Lord Roberts was there, and if there would be any "horse-soldiers."

Burton answered these and many other conundrums, drawing somewhat liberally on his imagination in doing so, and was also graciously pleased to accept several pots of beer. As an ex-soldier he was, under the circumstances, a person of unusual importance for the time being.

Presently a transport wagon with two or three men in fatigue dress inside it drew up outside the "Goat and Moon."

Burton at once went out and met the quartermaster at the door.

"The spuds is round at the back, sir," he said, "through that 'ere gate."

At this moment Mr. Pickles appeared in his shirt sleeves, scenting custom.

"So you've sold them taters already, have yer?" he remarked.

"Yes; this gentleman is taking the lot." He nodded towards the quartermaster.

"And what might you be giving for 'em, if I might make so bold?" inquired Mr. Pickles.

"I don't know that it's any business of yours, but if you want to know, I'm giving elevenpence a stone."

Mr. Pickles swelled visibly with virtuous indignation. So this was the reason that Burton had come to terms so easily, was it? He glared angrily at Burton. Elevenpence a stone! It was a downright swindle!

"Oh! Ain't it my business?" he exclaimed. "It is my business though. Them taters is in my shed, and I'm damned if I'll let anyone in there—not until 'e"—he pointed to Burton—"'ands over some of the profit 'e's robbed me of. It's a blooming swindle, that's wot it is!"

"Come now, Josh," said Burton, soothingly; "a bargain's a bargain, and you know as you made me pay a halfpenny extra."

"It ain't a bargain; it's a dashed conspiracy. Them taters doesn't leave my shed."

Matters seemed to be at a deadlock. A small crowd was beginning to collect round the disputants, under cover of which the fatigue party slipped in to the bar and hurriedly commenced refreshing themselves. Presently a bicycle orderly rode down the village, got off his machine opposite the "Goat and Moon," and, pushing his way through the crowd, saluted the quartermaster and handed him a written message.

"This came by helio, sir, just after you left camp," he said

Now the message was written on a signalling form, a familiar piece of paper to Burton, who had in his time handled some thousands of them, and, as he was standing behind the quartermaster, he was able to read over the latter's shoulder what it contained. The message ran:—

Quartermaster,
1st West Anglians.

Cancel order about potatoes stop contractor making good after all.

Brigade Major, 24th Brigade.

Mr. Pickles had by this time got rid of a good deal of his indignation, and had begun to realise that he was in the wrong and that Burton had fairly got the better of him

"I'll tell you what it is," he said; "you haven't played fair with me, but I don't deny as you've got the best of it. Come now; I'll give you a quid for your bargain, and take the taters back. How's that?"

The quartermaster, who was about to state that he did not want the potatoes after all, stopped in the act of speaking.

"Money down?" asked Burton.

"Well, yes, money down if you like."

"It's a bargain," said Burton, holding out his hand.

Mr. Pickles, after a little fumbling in his pockets, produced a half-sovereign, three half-crowns, a florin, and a sixpence, and placed them in the expectant palm.

At that moment a cavalry quartermaster rode up to the inn, and having dismounted and hitched his horse's bridle over the railings, made his way towards Mr. Pickles.

"Hullo!" he shouted, over the heads of the now rapidly increasing crowd; "Hullo! Is it you who have potatoes for sale?"

"Yes, sir," shouted Pickles, now beaming with good humour; "As many as you like; real prime ones; shilling a stone."

The cavalryman pushed his way through the throng.

"Hullo, Watkins," he said, as he saw the other quartermaster; "Are you after the spuds too?"

"I was," replied Watkins, "but I've just got this helio."

He held out the message.

"Many thanks for telling me," said the other, when he had read it, and, remarking that he would not want any potatoes, he turned on his heel, mounted his horse, and rode away again.

Watkins also announced that he had changed his mind about buying potatoes, and in less than a minute he, his wagon, and his fatigue party were out of sight.

Mr. Pickles stood aghast at this sudden change in the potato market, and turned to Burton for an explanation.

"Josh," said Burton, as he made his way into the bar again, jingling the change for a sovereign in his trousers' pockets, "Josh, after that, I don't mind standing you a pint of your own beer."

BOOKS.

A JOURNEY forward in space is equivalent to a journey backward in time in this, that you can find in one corner of the world or another the successive stages of civilisation through which our own race has passed from the earliest to the latest. In Mr. and Mrs. Routledge's "With a Prehistoric People" (1), for instance, you are transported to the stage of civilisation of our Saxon forefathers when trial by ordeal prevailed, and even to times yet more primeval, when the pots and weapons found to-day in British tumuli were first fashioned. There are, however, many things in this encyclopædic book which suggest that these prehistoric people, the Akikúyu of British East Africa, were less savage than our own savage ancestors. The position of woman—e.g., is supposed to differentiate essentially savage from civilised peoples, and, indeed, we were always taught that the higher position of women in the West was due not to civilisation merely, but also to Christianity. But among these prehistoric Akikúyu women are treated better and are respected more highly than amongst our own poor to-day.

The position of a Kikúyu woman in girlhood, wifehood, motherhood and old age is in many ways preferable to that of her white sister, and her lot is incomparably easier than that of the ordinary working man's wife at home.

The young girls, too, are far happier than their slum sisters of the West, while the old women are far more respected.

The young Kikúyu maiden has an amount of gaiety which many an English girl would envy. Almost every moonlight night she can go to a dance where she chooses her own partner . . . . A girl's betrothal is entirely her own affair. The leading wife of the chief of the Mungé was asked, "What I should tell the white women on my return to England about the women of Kikúyu?" "Tell them," she said, "two things. One is that we never marry anyone we do not want to: The other is that we like our husbands to have as many wives as possible"!

The latter aspiration will no doubt appear degrading to the suffragettes, but, on the other hand, the suffragettes themselves do not claim more to-day for their sex than the Akikúyu concede to it. The head chief, Karuri, has appointed a woman to be his lieutenant in a district where she reigns with much capacity; while on a committee of elders there are as many women as men. If on such a committee the sexes should happen to be sexually divided, then the vote of the old ladies carries the day. "The old ladies," said the chief's brother, in speaking of such a division, "would have their way, because," he added, emphatically, "it is a great work to have borne a child." Nor is "an old woman" among those savages a term of such intellectual contempt as it is amongst us. When a woman is very old—"so old that she has no teeth"—she is then "filled with intelligence," and on her death receives the high honour of burial, instead of being put out for the hyenas to devour. Can respect go further?" And this respect is not posthumous only. A young warrior is taught to get out of the road for an old woman. Yet more unexpected is the humanity to animals which is inculcated in the folk tale of the woman who threw stones at a little bird which was eating her corn and broke its leg, and the bird in revenge throttled her newly born child, but brought it back again to life when the grain it had been grudged was given to it. By the way, the insensibility to pain which Mr. Routledge noted in these savages suggests that Nature, "red in tooth and claw with rapine," may not be as cruel as we suppose her to be. Probably wild creatures feel less than savages, as savages certainly are more insensible to pain than the civilised. I remember Sir James Paget, the great surgeon, saying once to me that he did not think the most devoted saint to-day would have the fortitude to endure the agonies of the stake—so much more sensitive to pain had we become through the enervation of civilisation. Other doctors have assured me that the peasant bears better the shock of an accident or of an operation than the townsman, and the less civilised townsman better than the more civilised. Lastly I cannot resist quoting from this extraordinarily interesting and exhaustive account of the method of life and mode of thought existing amongst this primitive people the following passage as applicable to other dependencies of ours besides British East Africa:—

Theoretically it is an obvious absurdity to speak of raising the natives and at the same time deprive them of the best means of education, namely, self-government. This comes with a peculiarly bad grace from a people who are fond of pointing to their own primitive government as containing the germ of future greatness, at a time when its methods can have been little, if at all, less crude than those found among the Akikúyu of to-day.

In Mr. William Heywood's "History of Perugia" (2) you can trace many successive phases of the evolution of modern civilisation, hampered, however, in Italy by "the supremacy often of that strange third sex which the Roman Church creates by training up men from boyhood in a world that is not the world of men." Even as late, e.g., as the second quarter of the last century Gregory XVI. actually prohibited the intrusion of railways and telegraphs into his dominion, while "any one supposed to belong to the dangerous class of 'thinkers' was shadowed by the police even if he had nothing to do with politics." However, it is with the mediæval history of Perugia that Mr. Heywood familiarises you in this learned volume, on which he has expended four and a-half years of labour to such good purpose that "the old vivid, violent days" live again for you. You are impressed more with the violence than even with the vividness of these stirring times, and more with the sordidness and selfishness than with the magnanimity of the popes, princes, nobles, and peoples of the still-vexed cities of Italy. This "History of Perugia" is the first of a series of volumes on "The States of Italy" under the general editorship of Messrs. E. Armstrong and Langton Douglas, and the thoroughness with which Mr. Heywood has done his work augurs well for the success of the entire venture.

Dr. Frederic Howe's "Privilege and Democracy" (3) is a vigorous and convincing exposure of the effects of monopoly in all its various forms, but most of all of land monopoly, in producing the ever-increasing poverty of the poor in America. According to Dr. Howe, cotton is deliberately destroyed, the output of coal is artificially limited, hundreds of millions of acres of land are for speculative purposes kept out of tillage in order to raise the price of each of these commodities. Then the oil and the minerals of the country are monopolised; the railroads—themselves a gigantic monopoly—entered the mining business, discriminated against the independent operator, crushed him out of the business and acquired the control of his property. In old days we used to hang regraters of corn, but these regraters of land and its produce are the aristocracy of America. They are also our own aristocracy. Dr. Howe's remedy is single and sweeping—that all the revenues of the Government, both here and in the States, should be raised from a tax upon the value of the land. The very first effect would be the discouragement of land speculation; as Mr. Lloyd George put it, "if the speculator wants to remain a dog in the manger, he must pay for his manger."

Mr. Douglas Sladen, who collaborates with M. Eustache de Lorey in editing "The Moon of the Fourteenth Night" (4)—being the journal of Edouard Valmont, a member of the French Legation in Persia during the recent revolution—hardly exaggerates in ranking the volume with Pierre Loti's "Madame Chrysanthème." That part of the journal at least which describes the ill-fated Valmont's liaison with the lovely Persian girl is an idyll which recalls Pierre Loti's charming volume. But, besides, you have wonderfully minute, detailed, and vivid pictures of Persian manners and customs, and a most interesting and instructive insight into the motives, causes, and consequences of the Persian Revolution.

Mr. Bertram Mitford's "Ravenshaw of Rietholme" (5) opens promisingly with a haunted house, where the hero is beset within by ghosts and without by two scoundrels out of the three who vowed his death because his evidence had convicted them. The haunted house having served its incidental purpose, is dismissed without another thought by the author, who hurries his hero off to Africa to be tortured there by the third miscreant. The story, in a word, is made up of thrilling incidents somewhat incoherently strung together.

"Here's that too weak to be a sinner," cries Timon, "honest water, which ne'er left man i' the mire"—and this aptly enough describes the milk-and-water hero of "Plumage" (6), who was too irresolute to drag heroine number two into the mire. But this St. Evremond nevertheless contrives to make every one miserable before, to every one's relief, he dies.

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

The Duke of Argyll's new work, "Intimate Society Letters of the Eighteenth Century," has been compiled from correspondence preserved by his Grace's family, and extending back to the reign of Queen Anne. There are letters throwing light on the political history of the time and many dealing intimately with society life under the Georges. Over fifty pages are occupied with the correspondence of Mme. de Staël, and the literary interest of the work is enhanced by the inclusion of an original poem by Thomas Moore and verses by Sir Walter Scott, the MS. of each being reproduced in facsimile. The work, which is illustrated with portraits, is published this week by Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co.

Mr. Fisher Unwin asks me to mention that Miss Rosa Waugh is compiling a book of reminiscences of her father, the late Rev. Benjamin Waugh, founder of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. Miss Waugh will be glad to have the loan of any letters of interest written by her father and to hear from any one able to furnish personal recollections, especially in connection with the work which he undertook. Letters should be addressed to Miss Waugh at 29, Glynrhondda Street, Cardiff.

Meredith's incomplete novel, "Celt and Saxon," will be published by Messrs. Constable on Monday next. In this last novel the great writer's political opinions and his sentiments regarding his country are revealed, perhaps, more clearly than in any of his works.

The August number of the Cornhill will contain a new poem by Thackeray, the first editor of the magazine. Lady Ritchie has recently discovered her father's MS. of the poem, which will be given in facsimile. It is entitled "A Castaway," and is a translation from Beranger's difficult lines, "Ma Vocation," with which Thackeray prefaced his lecture on Goldsmith in "The Lectures on the English Humorists."

Mr. A. G. Folliott Stokes, who is the author of two notable books on the Cornish coast, "From St. Ives to Land's End" and "From Land's End to the Lizard," has now produced a third, "From Devon to St. Ives." Although especially valuable to those who would follow in his footsteps, his account of the glorious walk from Marsland Mouth to St. Ives Bay makes a wider appeal by reason of its literary charm and interest. Mr. Stokes loves the cliffs and moors of "the sea-girdled Duchy," and his impressions of the scenery and life of this land of romance are conveyed in a style that makes the present volume, like its predecessors, delightful reading. "From Devon to St. Ives" has numerous illustrations from photographs by Mr. A. Begbie, and a map prepared by the author. It is published (price 1s. net) by Messrs. Greening and Co.

In a foreword to "The House of the Sleeping Winds and Other Stories" (Rebman, price 5s. net), the book, which is dedicated to the Bishop of Truro, is commended "to all children between six and ninety years of age." A book of charming fairy tales which the author, Enys Tregarthen, has based on Cornish folk lore, it will be most keenly appreciated by young readers, whose pleasure will be enhanced by Miss Nannie Preston's clever illustrations.

The Rev. John Mathews' book, "Two Representative Tribes of Queensland," which Mr. Unwin publishes this week, is the result of observation at first hand by an investigator who has made a life-long study of Australasian ethnology. It deals mainly with two nearly extinct tribes—the Kabi and Wakka—inhabiting regions on the south-east coast of Queensland and a little above Brisbane. Professor A. H. Keane contributes an introduction to the volume.

Next week Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. will publish "Arion of Lesbos and Other Poems"—a second volume of verse from the hand of Miss Balbernie, whose gift finds expression in lyric and personal, as well as narrative and dramatic poetry.

"The Channel Islands," by Miss E. E. Bicknell, is the latest addition to Messrs. Methuen's Little Guides, a series of handy half-crown volumes whose distinctive features give them a much higher value than the ordinary guide book. The new volume has thirty-two illustrations and five maps.

MUSIC.

LAPARRA'S "Habanera," which was produced at Covent Garden on Monday, is an interesting work. Its book and its music both possess character and individuality. Two brothers being in love with the same girl, one kills the other, and the latter then reappears as a ghost to haunt the murderer and to take the life of the girl. The requirements of poetic justice would have been more nearly fulfilled if the brother had been sacrificed instead of an entirely innocent woman, and in other respects the story might be criticised; but none the less it makes a fairly telling drama, providing opportunity for some picturesque local colour, and Laparra's music is also, in its way, effective. It is operatic music of quite the modern type. The drama is everything and the music, to a large extent, merely illustrative and incidental. But it is clever of its kind with plenty of atmosphere and the right dark, sinister feeling throughout, and when, in a few instances, he does give freer play to his pen the composer shows that he can do good work, too, in a more lyrical vein. The work had the advantage of a fine performance. Mlle. Demellier, a new-comer, won good opinions as the girl, M. Dalmorès and M. Bourbon were both excellent as the brothers, and M. Frigara was the conductor.

London opera-goers should see sport when all of the operatic Richmonds who are now in the field get to work. In the past, two operas running simultaneously were part of the established order of things, though the pecuniary results were seldom satisfactory in the case of either. Then the disappearance of Her Majesty's left Covent Garden in possession, and apparently with little prospect of its monopoly being challenged. Now all of a sudden we are threatened not with two operas, but with three. Mr. Beecham and Mr. Hammerstein are both bold men, but the palm of intrepidity must be awarded to Mr. Hammerstein, since he announces his intention actually to build a new opera house. This should mean a good new music hall for London in due course. But I like Mr. Hammerstein's breezy spirit. "How about artists? Oh! Artists are discovered and then made. Did I not discover and then make Mary Garden, Tetrazzini, Sammarco, and so on?" Thus is operatic history made. Dr. Cook, of North Pole fame, apparently has a dangerous rival in Mr. Hammerstein as a "discoverer."

Preliminary particulars have been issued in connection with the forthcoming season of Promenade Concerts at the Queen's Hall, which will begin on Saturday, August 13, and continue nightly for ten weeks till Saturday, October 22. The list of solo artists engaged presents a grand total of eighty-seven names—or forty-four vocalists and the remainder instrumentalists. Thirty-two artists will be newcomers, while the others will include many who have long since established their popularity with Promenade audiences. The list of pianists is particularly strong, including many well known executants. Further, it is gratifying to note that a large majority of the artists announced are representative of native talent.

Talking of the promenades, a grievance reaches me. While many new vocalists appear every year it is complained by some that those chosen are not always the right ones. Many artists possessed of the best qualifications declare that they do not get a look in. This might be set down to professional jealousy, of course, but it is asserted that apart from any question of this kind it is quite extraordinarily difficult to obtain a hearing at these concerts. Yet, it may be asked, why should Mr. Wood choose other than the best obtainable? To what extent the complaint is well founded I will not undertake to say; but certainly I can say that the belief in question seems to be very widely entertained in professional circles.

Artists who enter into agreements with agents should exercise more care than they often do in regard to the terms which they sign. Such agreements are not infrequently scandalously one-sided—even when firms of high standing are concerned. A specimen lies before me at the moment. Its purpose was to engage the services of a violinist for a limited number of performances in a provincial town at the colossal fee of £8 for ten performances. So much having been set out, there followed the clause:—

> In consideration of this engagement the said artist undertakes to negotiate all subsequent re-engagements for..... through Concert Direction.....and to pay them such a commission thereon as may be agreed.

In other words, the artist was invited, in return for £8, to forfeit all her rights for the remainder of her career to appear independently in the town in question. Obviously, such a proposal was grossly unfair. The lady accordingly took exception to it, and lost the engagement in consequence, receiving, in reply to her representations on the subject, merely a curt letter of the "take it or leave it" order. Yet the firm in question is generally regarded as beyond reproach.

A grievance of another kind is that arising from the carelessness and unbusinesslike methods which characterise so many concert agents and others on whose goodwill artists are so largely dependent. I have in mind the case of a vocalist who applied some twelve months since to a well-known concert-giver for an engagement, and was heard by him at one of his "auditions." Subsequently he was informed that for the then coming season all arrangements had been completed, but that a note had been made of his name and qualifications, and that he would be communicated with again with a view to his being engaged for the following season. In due course the artist wrote recalling the circumstances of his trial, only to receive a reply stating that the record of his performance had been lost, and requesting him to come and sing again. Naturally, the artist felt annoyed, though, of course, it would not have done for him to show it. Such things should not happen.

Two of Mr. Liebling's most recent mots from the New York Musical Courier:—

> Schumann was a great composer all this month.
> Another thing which the commentators are emphasising just now is that Schumann's music sounds exactly as though it had been written by Schumann.

The boring "centenary" appreciation could hardly be disposed of more neatly.

A writer in the current number of the Orchestral Gazette (a publication which I am sorry to see is coming to an end) discoursing on clarinets and clarinet players, refers to Bärmann as the most famous of all clarinettists and the most fortunate, too, inasmuch as he enjoyed the intimate friendship of both Weber and Mendelssohn, who each wrote works specially for him—"a truly great artist and glorious man," as he was described by the composer of "Der Freischütz." Curiously enough, however, the writer makes no mention of that equally great artist of a later day, Richard Mühlfeld, who was favoured in a very similar way with the friendship of Brahms, and to whom the world owes indirectly some of the latter's finest works.

THE THEATRES.

"The Wiles of the Widow."

THERE are many indications of interesting novelties which will come in a goodly crop in the autumn, but at the moment there is very little happening in the theatrical world. As a matter of fact, the only novelty I have seen has been a short piece by Kathleen C. Lion, which has been put on in front of "The Naked Truth" at Wyndham's. It was called "The Wiles of the Widow," and proved to be an unambitious little farce, though it gave that clever actress Miss Clare Greet an excellent opportunity of showing her powers as a genial, amorous widow. Betsy Pye has buried one husband and has prudently interred him in a grave which is large enough to accommodate comfortably any possible successors. She thinks it better that they should all lie together, because then she will be there to smooth away any little difficulties and make the necessary introductions when the after life begins. There is nothing like looking ahead! She has already fixed on a bashful skipper as the next happy man, but he has an encumbrance in the form of a love-lorn sister, whom he has promised mother that he will never desert for another woman. This is the situation with which a resourceful widow has to grapple, and she does so most successfully. She persuades another of her lovers—a foolish village constable—that the unattractive Mary Beasley is not merely a paragon of all the virtues, but is dying of love for him and so drives him into wooing her, with excellent results all round. The piece was a little too long when I saw it, but it thoroughly amused the house. When in course of time Mr. Gerald du Maurier is ready to commence management at Wyndham's Theatre the successful run of "The Naked Truth," will be continued at the Prince of Wales's, while "The Balkan Princess" will, in its turn, find another home.

* * * * * *

The most interesting announcement for the autumn is that Mr. Vedrenne and Mr. Robert Loraine will start a season of management, opening with Mr. William J. Locke's romantic comedy, "The Man from the Sea." In the meantime Mr. Loraine is rapidly coming to the front as a daring aviator, for the identity of Mr. Robert "Jones" has now leaked out.

* * * * * *

Mr. George Alexander has put forth a very interesting programme, but for the moment he is not likely to give us anything new, as "The Importance of Being Earnest," after eight months, is still drawing full houses. Some time in the future, perhaps, we may see Wilde's "Duchess of Padua," but the next production at the St. James's will be Mr. L. E. Shipman's play, "D'Arcy of the Guards."

At the Variety Houses.

Theatrical matters having, as I said above, been very quiet during the past week, I have taken the opportunity of looking in at a few of the variety houses, and here there has been no cessation of activity. At the Hippodrome the great sensation is the mysterious eagle which flaps its way round the auditorium carrying a white-robed girl in its claws. So far from the girl seeming to resent her position, she sings cheerily all the time. Before this curious wild fowl makes its appearance the house is thrown into darkness, and the puzzled audience vainly tries to fathom the mystery of the apparition, for the creature has no visible means of support the while it sails over your head. It is rather amusing to watch people lighting matches in order to shed a ray of light on a problem which baffles the majority. I daresay I could guess how the thing is done, but it is a very effective illusion. Chung Ling Soo, the Chinese magician, is now in the last week of his present engagement, and so too are the company of dancers from the Imperial Russian Opera, St. Petersburg. Most fascinating dancers are these Russians, and I particularly fell in love with Mlle. Ludmila Schollar. She is a perfect artist and delightful to watch. Her interpretation, with M. Alexis Kosloff, of Glazounow's Bacchanalian dance is wonderful, but she is charming in everything. These Russians give you first Tschaikowsky's ballet "Le Lac des Cygnes," and follow this with a suite of dances, and the whole entertainment is a thing to see.

What interested me particularly the other evening at the Tivoli was the very fine series of bioscope pictures showing aviation at Rheims. The monoplanes rounding the marks on the course look exactly like giant dragon-flies, and it is very pretty to watch them canting over as they take the curves. It all looks so easy and pleasant that it is rather a pity to spoil the impression by suddenly throwing on the screen a picture of the disastrous accident to the Baroness de Laroche. A flying machine when flying is a beautiful sight, but when smashed to pieces on the ground it is a grim and pitiable object. Other attractions are Miss Clarice Mayne, who imitates that old Tivoli favourite Marie Lloyd very cleverly; Mr. Arthur Melrose, who gives a wonderful whistling accompaniment; the Two Bobs, a pair of most agreeable American comedians, who sing and dance with such an air of imperturbable good humour that you take a fancy to them at once; and Miss Carrie Moore, who has deserted musical comedy for the moment. She is a most vivacious little artist, and is exceedingly popular. I should, by the way, say a word, too, for Miss Mary Law. She plays the violin with great feeling, and, what is more, she makes a most charming picture.

Miss Elsie Southgate, who now makes her first appearance on the variety stage, has sprung at once into great favour at the London Pavilion. She is an admirable violinist, and she is accompanied on a Mustel organ played by Mr. James Coward. The effect is very pleasing, and thoroughly deserves the applause with which it is nightly received. In point of fact, you would go far to find a more finished and artistic turn. That irresistible humorist Mr. Malcolm Scott is back here again now, and Miss Ray Wallace's imitations at the piano are both amusing and clever.

RACING NOTES.

LAST year the Jockey Club passed a new rule at the First July Meeting enacting that "no weight shall be allotted to a horse in a handicap until he has run three times in the United Kingdom." The rule was proposed by the Stewards, and was passed by sixteen votes to six. This year, at the First July Meeting, the Stewards proposed to revoke their new rule, and their motion was carried by twenty-two to five, its only vigorous opponent being Lord Durham. A body such as the Jockey Club, which passes a rule of this kind one year and rescinds its decision twelve months later, has certainly established no increased claim to the confidence of the public in its discretion. The really absurd feature in the affair is that the most zealous advocate of the change was Captain Greer, who as one of the Stewards had been mainly responsible for the new rule. During the present season there have been enormous fields of horses at many meetings, most of which were palpably and preposterously backward, and which were started simply in order to qualify them for handicapping. Many two-year-old races of small value brought out huge fields, but the results were melancholy and farcical. At Newbury in April there were thirty starters for the Beckhampton Plate, of which only two were backed, and this pair finished first and second. The new rule was passed for the benefit of the handicappers, most of whom appear to be either incapable or scandalously careless. Not a week passes but there are results which elicit croakings over unfortunate errors or oversights on the part of the handicappers. I read somewhere the other day that the object of the present officials is to follow as nearly as possible the system of Admiral Rous. If this is the case this result reminds one of the fable of the ambitious frog, or recalls "all the contortions of the Sibyl without one particle of her inspiration."

It ought to be a fundamental rule that a dark horse (or one which has only started when obviously unfit) should be placed on an equality with the heaviest weighted animal of its own age. When a horse has shown good form, and has then gone into retirement for a season, it ought, when its name reappears in the lists, to be handicapped on its best running. Moreover, handicappers ought to keep both their eyes and their ears on the alert, and they cannot do their work respectably unless they have a considerable knowledge of the owners and trainers with whom they have to deal. The one object of the present handicappers seems to be a large acceptance, so that horses of all classes are ridiculously "flattered," and running is complacently accepted as true form which every one knows to be wholly unworthy of notice, either from the animal being backward or from other causes. Handicappers rarely take the whole range to which they are entitled, the result being that a full half of the horses weighted are obviously "out of it" from the very first.

Mr. James Smith, whose death was announced last week, was for many years a prominent figure on the Turf. He was backer, bookmaker, commissioner, and owner. There was nothing in any way suggestive of racing or any other sport in his appearance, and it was truly remarked of him that he looked like the typical prim churchwarden of an old-fashioned parish. Mr. Smith won a large stake when he carried off the Cesarewitch of 1862 with Hartington, who ought also to have won the Cambridgeshire, and a few years later he went for coups over King Alfred for the Derby, and over Blue Gown when the Derby winner was beaten for the Cambridgeshire by See-Saw. His great win was in 1876, when his horse Rosebery brought off the double event of the Cesarewitch and the Cambridgeshire. He made a very considerable fortune on the Turf when he was but a little over fifty, but afterwards he embarked in a commercial undertaking with most disastrous results. There is profound truth in Fielding's saying that "men are rich not by what they get but by what they keep." Mr. Smith started the Sportsman in the sixties, and when he controlled that paper it was conducted with great ability and conspicuous and uncompromising independence. The vigorous attacks of the Sportsman on the late T. Jennings in 1873, after Flageolet had been beaten for the Two Thousand, excited quite a sensation on the Turf, and an action for libel was commenced, but the case never reached the courts.

St. Nat was not started for the Soltykoff Stakes at Newmarket, being in reserve for Hurst Park. Canvas Back was made favourite, but she was very easily beaten by Prince San, who had run well in a race during the First July week. This colt is still capable of much improvement, and he has no other engagement until the Prince of Wales' Plate at York. Nerestan, who had been so heavily backed for the Princess Plate, when he was beaten by Pietri, was plunged on for the Khedive Plate, and a lot of money went on Mushroom, who had 12 lb. the worst of the weights. The race was won, after a slashing finish, by the colt by Florizel II. out of Meadow Chat, one of the horses belonging to the King, which was leased to Lord Derby. The great tip for the Chesterfield Stakes was Hair Trigger II., a dark filly by Fowling Piece out of Altcar, owned by Lord Derby, that had been well galloped. She was favourite "for money" at the finish, but she was never dangerous. There was a very fine race between Romeo and Night Rider, and the former colt was most lucky to win. He is no flier. Hair Trigger II. has a good chance of retrieving her reputation at Hurst Park on Saturday, as she is in the £1,500 race with a 10 lb. breeding allowance, but she meets Night Rider on only 1 lb. better terms than at Newmarket.

Backers appeared to have gone crazy on Thursday, when Virgin Queen was backed for the Reach Plate at the ridiculous odds of 11 to 10, there being thirty-three starters for the race! This was something like a field for a plate of £150! The favourite was only beaten a head, the winner being News, and next to the pair came Peggy Hyland, the only other starter which had been backed for any money. Plungers had substantial reasons for lamenting their infatuated folly, and they were tumbling over each other in order to accept the slightest shade of odds about Virgin Queen.

The result of the Eclipse Stakes justifies the opinion expressed in Truth as to the harebrained folly of the backers of Lemberg for the St. Leger at the insane price of 2 to 1. It is now perfectly clear that Lemberg cannot really stay. He was to win "easily" or "in a canter" on Friday, in the opinion of his admirers, but his performance, if regarded as a St. Leger trial, was in the greatest degree unsatisfactory, as he appeared not only to be deficient in stamina, but he ran during the last two hundred yards in a somewhat shifty fashion. I have never been able to understand why the Eclipse Stakes was regarded as a good thing for Lemberg. He had met Neil Gow on three occasions, and when both were well Lord Rosebery's colt beat him by a head in the Two Thousand. When the pair met in the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster Neil Gow won easily, but Lemberg was amiss. In the Derby, when Lemberg won, Neil Gow finished nowhere; but on this occasion he was not up to the mark. There was no excuse for either colt on Friday. Placidus disappointed his friends, as he ought to have done better on the Two Thousand running, considering that he now had 10 lb. the best of the weights. Lemberg had the best place, but many good judges were of the opinion that Neil Gow would "just have won but for his hanging badly at a critical point in the race." All the luck was certainly with the Manton colt, but I shall be vastly surprised if he beats Neil Gow at Doncaster.

They will have other chances of meeting, as both are engaged in the Jockey Club Stakes and in the Champion Stakes. In the £10,000 race Lemberg will have to give Neil Gow 3 lb., and it does not appear likely that the Manton colt would stay such a tiring track as the last mile and three-quarters of the Cesarewitch course.

I mentioned last week that Cellini was a great Newmarket tip for the £5,000 stake on Saturday. Mr. Neumann's colt won very cleverly, and he has now got into form. Prince Palatine was very heavily backed, but he ran badly. The tip everywhere in the morning was Black Potts, but Lord Rosebery's filly could only get second, although she had 7 lb. the best of the weights. Cellini is a splendidly bred colt, being by Cyllene out of Sirenia (dam of Siberia and Electra), and he was never in better racing condition than when he was beaten at Ascot. I do not fancy, however, that he will turn out a flier.

Mercutio was a great tip at Newmarket on Wednesday morning for the July Handicap, but he did not run. This horse is sure to win a T.Y.C. handicap before long, and he must be remembered whenever he is started for such a race.

Nerestan will probably be entered for some two-year-old races during the Sussex fortnight, as he has no other engagement until the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster. This colt ought to win the next time he starts. He was very unlucky last week at Newmarket.

There ought to be some very interesting sport at Goodwood next week, but the parties from neighbouring country houses are not likely to be so numerous or so large as usual, and Great Dean Park will not be represented, which will make a considerable difference, as for some years past Mr. and Mrs. William James have always brought a great number of guests to this meeting.

There are forty-four acceptances for the Richmond Stakes on Tuesday, including Romeo (8 lb. extra), Pietri (3 lb. extra), Cellini (8 lb. extra), Longboat, Mary Carmichael, Porphyrio, Canvas Back, Prince Palatine, and the colt by Persimmon out of Dame d'Or. I expect that Pietri will win this race if he can beat Cellini, as his defeat of Nerestan in the Princess Plate at Newmarket was a good performance. When Nerestan was beaten last week at Newmarket (in the Khedive Plate) he got off very badly, losing several lengths. There is a large entry for the Ham Produce Stakes, and the Duke of Portland may win with Spalato. Lord Falmouth has a grandly bred filly in Estelle, by Orme out of Quintessence. The Lavant Stakes on Wednesday will be an important race if it brings out Night Rider, Sunstar, St. Nat, Hair Trigger II., Meleager, and Wrinkler. St. Nat may win. There are forty-seven acceptances for the Rous Memorial Stakes on Thursday, including Persephone, Cyllius, filly by Isinglass out of Sceptre, and Rhosmarket. Persephone ought to win this race. The Prince of Wales's Post Sweepstakes of £1,400 will probably bring out Pietri and Wrinkler, of which pair I rather prefer Mr. L. de Rothschild's colt.

As to the three-year-old races, there were forty-seven acceptances for the Sussex Stakes, and the course would just suit Admiral Hawke, but he was unluckily struck out when the minor forfeit was declared. Placidus may win if he represents the Netheravon stable. Decision (who failed as a stayer at Newmarket last week), Winkipop, Charles O'Malley, Moyglare, Louvigny, and Ulster King are all left in. There are twenty-seven acceptances for the Gordon Stakes, including Admiral Hawke, Sanctuary, Brig of Ayr, Tressady, and Cardinal Beaufort. Admiral Hawke may be able to win this race. The Nassau Stakes has a large number of fillies left in, and Maid of Corinth may win. Winkipop will have 12 lb. the worst of the weights. No attention should be paid to the speculation on the Stewards' Cup which is daily reported, for that is now a purely post-betting race. Master Hopson or Whisk Broom may win. Last year I gave a plumper for Lagos for the Goodwood Plate, and he won easily. For next week's race I fancy Queen's Journal.

There are only fifteen acceptances for the Liverpool Cup, and Rathlea appears to be regarded as the pick of this handicap. I am told that Koul will run well. He has a very light weight. Last Call will be near winning. Bachelor's Double ought to win the Atlantic Stakes.

THE ARTISAN GOLF AMATEUR—ROWING—LORD'S.

One wondered how long the tongue of good or ill repute would keep off W. Mitchell, who played for the amateurs of England against Scotland. He is a gardener. He is a member of the artisan golf club, Cantelupe, which plays at Ashdown Forest. Having won his match at Hoylake he gets into the semi-final at the amateur championship, and then he begins to get into trouble. He wins the Golf Illustrated vase at Sunningdale and an open amateur competition with a record score at West Drayton. This is really too much of a good thing. An artisan golfer gadding about the country in this way! If he is not a professional, it is whispered, he is going to be one. He is using these successes in amateurism as a stepping-stone to an appointment somewhere as a professional golfer. Well, I know nothing whatever of Mr. Mitchell's plans or intentions. The difference between an open champion and a semi-finalist in the amateur championship is very great, and one may assume that Mr. Mitchell, being a good golfer, is no fool and fully realises this very elementary proposition. Of course, it must be rather upsetting to the recognised pothunters in metropolitan competitions to find a mere gardening fellow, don't you know, coming and taking all the honour and glory from them. Of course, it is not the sweepstake nor the prize that these real gentlemen amateur golfers care about. They are mere incidentals to the game. Nothing, of course, to gentlemen, but everything to a gardener. And by the same token that is why a gentleman may play for a dozen golf balls offered by a firm of ball-makers for the best score within certain dates made on the club course. A dozen balls, a week's wages for an artisan, a flea-bite to the Southern gentleman who spends more time on the golf links than at his office, if he has one.

I am moved to these comments and reflections by a strenuous letter in Golf Illustrated denouncing these cavilling slanderers of Mr. Mitchell and asking for fair play for him. After all, these prattlers are prattling as one would expect them to prattle. From the King downwards no prominent person is safe. And when the poison of jealousy is added to the draught of tittle-tattle it makes nasty drinking. The writer of the letter naïvely observes that Mitchell is a better amateur than many of his critics. I quite believe this statement. And yet I know I must be wrong; for on the authority of the journal in which that letter appears there never were and never can be such blue-blooded amateurs as there are in golf. They are the very aristocracy of the amateur world. I have been chastised for doubting this statement. That very journal has attacked me. An artisan golfer using amateur meetings as a stepping-stone to a professional appointment. If it were true, if there were a grain of truth in the allegation, how fearful! What a scandal! Such meetings may properly be utilised for men to rise to such higher things as golf course architects or club secretaries. And yet I suppose if the gardening arisocrats like Carter or Veitch were to employ Mitchell as an expert on lawns or greens the fat would really be in the fire. Mine own little hope is that Mitchell's success will give a fillip to the artisan game in the south. I hope to see municipal links developed, and then, as in Scotland, the artisan golfer will play with all sorts and conditions of men. Then it will be as in curling north of the Tweed, where the notorious poacher may lead his side and under him the laird and meenister may play. Social conditions in golf prevail in the south. Certainly in a golf club social conditions are less observed than in the decent London clubs. There is a competition for membership amongst metropolitan clubs. The ability of the would-be member to pay the entrance fee and subscription is the test for membership and not the ability to play the game. Some day in the future one may see the artisan golfer of distinction elected an honorary member of the local club.

I have referred to the offer of a box of a dozen golf balls as a prize. And the reason of the reference is on this wise. A correspondent tells me that at his club on the notice-board is displayed an intimation that a certain firm will give a box of balls to the player who, playing with one of their balls, does the best net score between certain dates. He asks what is my view on this subject. I reply that it is a smart bit of advertising, that it is a fair indication of the bluff that is written about the purity of amateur golf, and that my only doubt is whether the genuine pot hunter (and by this term I include the man who prefers to play for side bets rather than risk his handicap in a club competition) will find the offer worth his while to accept. I do admire the business spirit of the advertisers and their accurate knowledge of what is meant by an amateur playing for a consideration. It means practically nothing.

A fine day and a high wind for the Cockney Henley, otherwise Molesey Regatta, and, as usual, a maximum of races in a minimum of time, with a large crowd of spectators. There was a new club which I devoutly hope may make its mark in higher things. The Old Westminsters, with their pink colours, which nearly became the colours of Cambridge University, won the junior eights from the London and Westminster, and Pinks, who I think was at Clare, won his senior sculls. Then that popular oarsman, the old light-blue Thomson, with young Swann, took the senior and Garrick pairs for Trinity Hall. They met the veteran Steve Fairbairn and Swanston, of Jesus. London beat Thames in the eights, and it was the other way about in the fours. College crews had disbanded after Kingston. Then at Maidenhead there was another regatta. The London County and Westminster won the eights, and Eton Excelsior rowed away from Marlow in the Town Challenge Cup for fours. There was a row over for Maidenhead for the Orkney Cottage Challenge Cup for fours. This was a sad falling off, says a friend who was present, from the old days when Orkney Cottage turned out a four. Very pleasant were the old days when the crew trained at Orkney Cottage. One recalled a four stroked by C. W. Kent, and the others were W. F. C. Holland, R. C. Lehmann, and Benjie Cotton, who died so many years ago. If the Hon. Harry Lawson, M.P., has the old log he may read how in practice above Boulter's Lock they put in fifty to the minute. They trained reasonably strictly, and Kent, with the race practically in his pocket, used to get as nervous and incomprehensible as though he were stroking the Varsity crew at Putney. They used to play tennis in the afternoon, and their efforts would have graced a dame's school. Those private clubs kept some of the best oarsmen fit and keen. They brought the elder and the younger generation together. The local crews may have been a little jealous, but their adversaries were ever willing to coach and help them. Those crews helped to maintain the standard of oarsmanship. Where are the glories and the colours of Orkney Cottage, Abney, and Fieldhead? If they flourished nowadays one would hear less of Belgian and Canadian styles. Those up-river home clubs exercised a potent influence for good on English rowing.

right forearm. Wherefore it comes to pass that the Old Etonian polo team will not be able to pursue the quest of the trophy that the Meadow Bank team took to America last year. This is a matter for extreme regret; success might not have been for them, but experience would have been valuable. Already one hears inquiries as to what is being done for the representative team next year. Are matters moving or are they not? Historically I opine that it will be well to wait and see. The assistance that was offered to the Old Etonians in the way of ponies is some indication of the help that sportsmen will give, and already the claims and merits of all players are being definitely classed. In these two particulars alone one finds some genuine foundation on which one may build a pious hope for success. Time will tell. Wait and see.

In the Gentlemen and Players' match at Lord's thirty wickets fell, and there were thirteen "ducks' eggs." The former were beaten by ten wickets. The Players had to go in to make one run. There was the usual interval. The pitch was rolled and F. R. Foster sent down some practice balls. All very sedately and true cricket working, but a silly waste of time. Hartley played two good defensive innings for the losers. Neither side were ever really masters of the bowling. Hirst, Fielder, and Smith—the long discarded of Surrey—got the most wickets. The ball was shooting in the old-fashioned way. There was no off bowling. The bowlers went for the wickets. Lord's was as tricky as it ever has been, and the batsmen did not shine on the troubled ground. Fancy shooters, and they were as plentiful as blackberries in the old days when Grace was young. One wonders if those new stands and the huge pavilion pen up the water and keep off a drying breeze from the grass at Lord's.

THE BOATING GIRL.

She is crowned with a garland of roses;
  She is garbed in the purest of white:
On her cheeks there's the hint of a blush, and the tint
  Sets my heart pit-a-pat at the sight.
She has one of the sweetest of noses
  That would send a bard off in a fytte:
Oh! she's certainly pretty, but there, what a pity,
    She can't row a bit!

She has got all the terms of the sculler,
  Such as "rowlock" and "feather" and "swing:"
She can show off her frock in the crush of the lock—
  She is well up in that sort of thing.
But she turns such a beautiful colour
  When you hand her the sculls, which she grabs
With a frown on her brows—and she catches a thousand
    Most horrible crabs.

Then her steering: my word, it is awful!
  She protests she has done it before,
But as soon as she starts there's an ache in our hearts,
  And one feels much inclined to say "Lor'!"
But it fills your large masculine maw full
  Of the oaths that would tingle her blood
When you see her begin to direct the boat into
    The bank or the mud.

Yet I care not a jot, when another
  Takes her place with the ropes in the stern,
For we sit in the bows, and I pour out my vows,
  While my breast is beginning to burn.
For I'm not just exactly her brother,
  Though I give her a bit of my cheek!
And my vows are not slighted; our troth has been plighted;
    We wed in a week.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

THE PRICE OF PROGRESS.

THE sad death of Mr. Rolls has been followed by the sort of outcry which he himself would have been the first to deprecate. It is deplorable that his life should have been sacrificed, and the event is assuredly not least regretted by those who knew the man himself. For his personality was singularly winning. No man was more modest or had less of the showman about him. For public notoriety he had a positive dislike. How indignant he was, for instance, when, a few weeks ago, a too imaginative reporter put some words into his mouth which he had never used after his Channel flight! Yet this was certainly not because he had any false ideas as to his own importance. On the contrary, no one could have been more utterly free from side or superiority. He was, in truth, a man of an essentially sober and serious disposition with a good deal more of the student than the dare-devil in his nature, and it was this very fact which made him the special hope of the aviation movement in England. He was always regarded as the embodiment of caution and circumspection, one who never allowed himself to be rushed into rash courses by imprudent counsels, and there is something bitterly ironical in the fact that he has been the first of all our English aviators to pay the penalty for his daring.

Yet it is to be feared that such sacrifices must be. They are the price of knowledge. It is asked if the result is worth the sacrifice. So far as present achievements go perhaps it is not, but who can set limits to what may be accomplished in the future? The science of mechanical flight is in its infancy at present, and yet, even so, what enormous progress has already been effected! It is only two or three years since a beginning was made, yet what astonishing triumphs have already been witnessed. Certainly much remains still to be discovered, but this can only be done by a process of trial and error, which must inevitably be attended with deadly risks. All the greater is the honour due to those dauntless spirits who knowing all the dangers yet refuse to be deterred. It restores one's faith in the race to witness such splendid courage. On the same day, too, the Frenchman Morane soared to a height of nearly three-quarters of a mile, and flew at a speed of something not far short of sixty miles an hour. Who can limit future developments when such things can be done already?

The supreme need of the present is, of course, automatic stabilization, and this may be discovered at any moment now. By applying the principle of the gyroscope or in some other way the thing may be done, and then the whole movement would take on a new aspect forthwith. Naturally there would still be dangers, but nothing compared with those which beset the aviator every time he goes up at present. Some time ago it was announced that an English aviator had actually solved the problem, but as nothing more has since been heard on the subject he is presumably still experimenting; and scores and scores of others are doing the like. There is no need, therefore, to talk of failure or to despair of the future at present.

Unfortunately, Mr. Rolls has not been the only recent victim. There was also the terrible death of Wachter at Rheims, and in this case also the precise cause of the accident seems to be more or less uncertain. Either it would seem the stays supporting his planes were not strong enough to withstand the strain, or, as some think, the fabric of his planes, having been stretched possibly too tightly in the first place, tried to expand under the influence of the sun's heat, and in the result burst. In any case, the result was shocking and deplorable. Meanwhile, there is no lack of candidates to carry on the work, while as to practical results already achieved, it may be noted that if war broke out to-morrow the aeroplane, even in its present condition, would probably prove invaluable for scouting purposes. Experiments have already been made, too, both in France and America to test its usefulness in other ways, such as the dropping of bombs on to battleships. At the same time it may be hoped that the aeroplane in its perfected state is destined to serve wider and finer purposes than this, and when the time comes the names of such men as Rolls, Wachter, Delagrange, and others who have given their lives to the cause will not be forgotten.

The increased motor taxes are now in full swing, and it is a case of paying up (in spite of the heroic counsels of those who advocate refusal and passive resistance), but there is no question as to the gross unfairness of the system which has been adopted for the further mulcting of the unfortunate owner. There is, for instance, the manifest injustice of the method of classification by groups ("under 6½ h.p.," "under 12 h.p.," and so on) instead of by unit of horse power. Under this arrangement a four-cylinder car with a cylinder bore of 127 mm. pays £10 10s., whereas if the bore is 128 mm. it pays £21. It needs no argument to point out the grotesque inequality of such an arrangement. And there is not the slightest necessity for it either. The Chancellor of the Exchequer actually stated, indeed, that he would have adopted the obviously fairer plan of taxing by unit of horse power if the matter had been properly represented to him at the time. Could anything illustrate more forcibly the folly of divided counsels which is afflicting automobilism and its representative organisations at present? Clearly, however, after the Chancellor's statement, the system which has been adopted cannot possibly be permanently maintained.

Another serious ground of complaint is the fact that, though the year has now run half its course, owners are being called on to pay up the additional amount for the full twelve months, although the amended licences issued carry only to December 31. This can only be characterised as sheer swindling. A pro rata arrangement should obviously have been adopted. Then steam has a grievance of its own—in the case, at all events, of double-acting engines, for otherwise it comes off exceptionally cheaply. Thus whereas a two-cylinder petrol car with four-inch cylinders is rated at 12.9 h.p. and pays four guineas, a double-acting-engined steamer with cylinders of the same size finds itself rated at over 25 h.p., and has to pay £6 6s. This is another manifest absurdity. It is being complained, too, that two-cycle engines will be similarly hard hit, though it is possible in this case that the new regulations will not be so interpreted, since it is not clear that a two-stroke engine will be classed as a "double-acting cylinder." It is, however, very obvious that the whole question will have to be gone into again and placed on a more satisfactory footing, and with this end in view action can hardly be taken too soon, since the Treasury is not a department which moves in a hurry, and with the beginning of a new year the whole matter will come up again.

Dear Sirs,

We have pleasure in giving you, after two years' trial, our matured opinion on the qualities of your tyres. We have used them on our own cars under all conditions of wear and surface, both in town and country, and they have maintained a remarkably high average of service from the beginning. We have had an indifferent example or two, but striking an average we have not yet found equal results from any other tyres that have come within our personal experience, and this opinion is reflected by practically every customer to whom we have recommended them.

Yours faithfully,
SEALE & DE BECKER, Ltd.

WOMAN.

THE ODD WOMEN.

THE old problem of what to do with our boys is being rapidly pushed from its pedestal of urgency and importance by the question of what to do with our women, or rather for those women who do not and cannot solve the matter for themselves. The attention of the public is so much concentrated on the women who are working in trade or in professions, that the claims of the lady who, through no fault of her own, has arrived at an uncertain age without having acquired any marketable talents are somewhat overlooked. This neglect is perhaps most noticeable in the various schemes put before the world for the adequate housing of women. In nearly all of these it is the business girl or the working woman who is catered for, while the very hard lot of the gentlewoman with means too limited to keep a home of her own together is overlooked. Without any disrespect to these ladies, may I suggest that what is wanted for them is a residential shelf, which shall remove them from the soul-destroying atmosphere of the cheap boarding-house and the dark awfulness of apartments in a "mean" district. Readers of Gissing's "Odd Women" will require no picture of the utter drabness and dreary sameness of depression suffered by the gentlewoman who spends her life, in a manner at the best but dimly reminiscent of her class, in a market where the thing she wishes to purchase is priced extravagantly.

The thing which men and women work most to procure is society; the thing they value most is privacy; and a blend of both results in social sanity.

That gentlewomen of limited incomes who are not equipped by their education with the power to earn may be regarded as drones is true, but that in no way alters the sadness of their lives or diminishes their claim upon society, which in the disappearing generation made them what they are. Unlike most claimants on society, they demand neither work nor charity. All they want is opportunity—the chance to pass their lives in the greatest possible comfort to themselves; to obtain what everybody wants, the greatest possible purchasing power for their incomes.

A correspondent points out that the question of the housing of this very large class of the community was raised before the Women's Congress just prior to the outbreak of the Boer War. The movement then started by Miss Hobhouse resulted in the erection of the Alexandra Flats at Wimbledon for the wives and daughters of officers engaged in the war. It is a fact that the Army, perhaps more than any of the services or professions, contributes to the number of pathetically helpless women of small means. The reason for this is no doubt to be found in the conditions of military service. But the Army has, in common with the Navy and the Civil Service, a peculiar responsibility towards its women kind, as by social custom the wife of an officer in the Army, the Navy, or the Civil Service cannot very well during her husband's lifetime engage in any money-making pursuit, and frequently when the death of her husband throws her back on her resources she finds that any earning ability she may have earlier possessed has atrophied from lack of use. Also too frequently she is left with but very little to live upon, and unless she is content to spend her days as that very unwelcome person, a non-paying guest with some member of her family, she is condemned to the cheap boarding-house or solitary apartments, to which she is ashamed to ask her friends. I believe that many of the schemes for the housing of business women have been successful financially, and there seems no economic obstacle to the erection of blocks of cheap flats run on commercial lines for the accommodation of the gentlewoman of limited means. In Germany the problem has been solved—surely what has been done in Germany can be attempted in England.

THE NEAR-LONDON SCHOOL.

The exact relationship of parent and pedagogue is as difficult of definition as are most other rule of thumb relationships. The anxious parent will certainly not care to relinquish, with the trimestrial cheque, all claim to her daughter; equally natural is it that the harassed trainer of youth should sometimes feel that, but for the exigencies of pupil-supply, parents might well be dispensed with altogether. Further, a mother may justly feel that no one understands her treasure as does she herself, while the schoolmistress may claim that whereas parental experience is reckoned in units, her own can be measured in tens or even hundreds. It is in such struggles for the balance of power that the original object of school is too often forgotten—the ultimate good of the child.

It is, perhaps, in the near-London school that the differences become most acute. The London parent has much to do; the London house does not always admit with comfort of the establishment of a governess "suite;" what, then, can be better than a school which combines wisdom, amusement, and companionship with facilities for frequent parental visits? There are numbers of such schools round London, at Wimbledon, Richmond, Croydon, and High Wycombe. From a hygienic point of view they are unexceptionable. Riding and all sorts of games are a recognised item of the bill. Usually, and because they cater for the girl who is going to see something of the world, they are more or less polyglot. In one such school of my acquaintance French is the "lingua franca," but in view of the cosmopolitanism of the pupils an ingenious arrangement provides that among themselves they speak the language they happen to be studying. This has advantages in the way of fluency and also in the study of cosmopolitanism generally; against it is the fact that a superlative accent in any one language is rare. But, after all, a superlative accent in a foreign tongue is in any case rare among Britishers.

The near-London school, again, has the advantage—and this characteristic most attracts the foreigner—of being within reach of galleries, museums, and concerts. It is true that the intellectual benefit derived from donning your best clothes, and being herded through the National Gallery by a mistress is often lost in the excitement of the outing, together with a promise of cream cakes as a wind-up. Nevertheless it familiarises the pupils with names and subjects, which may afterwards form a useful skeleton to be clothed at will. There are, moreover, always the few who enjoy music quite apart from the personality of the player and their own familiarity with his programme.

Altogether there is much to be said for the near-London school, always provided the necessary adjustment exists between parent and schoolmistress. All schoolmistresses know the parent who from the moment she has decided upon a certain school has not a good word to say for it. The subsequent antagonism between the powers can but have a disturbing influence upon the child, to say nothing of the sense of a divided authority. Further, if her mother visits Betty every week, Betty is sometimes bound to have a cold, to look tired, to have left half her buttons undone. It was partly on account of the buttons that she was sent to school, and, being human, she has always had a cold every winter. But, having shifted the responsibility both for buttons and colds, the aggrieved parent too often adopts an attitude of injury and suspicion, quite confident that what she herself failed to prevent might have been prevented by some one who is paid for the purpose. Other parents, again, demand an immediate result from school-training. Every week they like to dig up the seed to see whether it is growing, and more often than not, when it does grow, they do not perceive it. On the other hand the schoolmistress, who in the nature of her office is apt to become a little god on wheels, is apt to carry her omniscience too far. Rules and regulations have no merit in themselves; they exist for the pupil, and the pupil does not exist for them. The schoolmistress is often singularly unelastic in this respect—very often from sheer principle. Thus the near-London school is singularly provocative of friction. The only remedy is a closer sympathy between the contracting parties, which remedy will only be possible when both parents and teachers regard each other as fallible human beings, and therefore worthy of regard.

FURNITURE FURNISHED.

Though he be pitied by the worshippers of household gods, the Oriental who relies on his mat for all furniture has at least one advantage over his Occidental brethren. It is, in the nature of things, impossible for him to commit in his house-furnishing the grosser errors of taste. Nor is the advantage a slight one. For no man to-day can afford to have bad taste; or, if he have, he must also own the necessary wisdom to conceal it. Furniture is become as much an index of character as is dress, manner, or education—in the limited sense. Fifty pounds may have less purchasing power than five hundred, but it can testify to as much or even more taste. The time is past when furniture was reckoned in the solidity of its mahogany, as is also the period when art muslin, sore-throated flower-pots, and "fancy" goods reigned over middle-class England. Perhaps, indeed, the reaction from Victorianism, both early and late, was never more marked than in the almost universal revival of all the best periods of furniture, both English and foreign.

To the cosmopolitanism of this revival no more eloquent testimony is needed than a casual visit to the Midland Furnishing Company at their premises in Southampton Row. Here is practically every style of furniture, old, new, and copied. Here are all the Louis', elegant in their French polish, gilt, or inlay work; there are the beautiful English periods from old black oak to the fumed oak of to-day, from Jacobean times to Queen Anne, Chippendale, Sheraton, Hepplewhite; there, again, are the luxurious Chesterfields and voluminous arm-chairs, dumb witnesses that we of the twentieth century love most of all to be comfortable. It is, indeed, pleasing to find how, amid French elegancies, amid Persian and Egyptian decoration, English furniture more than holds its own. For English furniture combines with grace and elegance a firm basis of utility. During the visit of which I am speaking I did not see an English chair that a stout man need have hesitated to sit upon, which, after all, is the supreme test.

The rage for eighteenth-century English furniture at the present moment is such that a family of my acquaintance recently spent three months in Madeira solely for the purpose of scouring the country for imported specimens, in which it used to abound. Yet, in spite of a decreasing birth-rate, it is obvious that we cannot all sit on the chairs of our great-grandfathers. For my own part, I have always preferred a good reproduction—not a "fake"—to a bad original. Two fine original Jacobean chairs in the show-room of the Midland Furnishing Company bore a price due both to their beauty and to their history. Now, many of us can afford beauty, but not history as well; some reproductions of the same chairs which I saw upstairs could have demanded no better advocate than themselves in defence of the reproduction.

The most fascinating method of furnishing is, of course, to "pick up" things one by one until you have furnished according to whatever ideal you have in mind. If you have plenty of money and plenty of leisure, if you do not mind sleeping on the kitchen table until you have "picked up" just the Hepplewhite bedstead for which you have been looking, and, most important of all, if you have definite taste and an instinct for the fitting, no better plan could be found. At the same time, it is difficult to imagine the comfortable furnishing of a small flat or cottage on this system for the sum of £50; it is still more difficult to imagine that the entire furniture of the small flat or cottage shown at Southampton Row costs only £50. This complete outfit is, I am told, used largely for riverside cottages, whose owners, using it only for the week-end, want neither the trouble nor the responsibility of a large outlay. It contains everything, from two stout and durable beds down to the very coal-scoop.

I have said that no one can afford bad taste, but even the experienced furnisher may find many pitfalls among such an "embarras de richesses" as awaits him in these rich stores at Southampton Row. There is no harm in mixing styles if only you know how to do it. That the mixture may sometimes go wrong can be deduced from the story of the "nouvelle riche" who, having shown a visitor over her newly furnished house, threw open a door exclaiming, "And that is my Louis XV. room." "Indeed," said the visitor, "do tell me what makes you think so." The sets of completely furnished rooms exhibited at Southampton Row obviate such mistakes as this, and enable the purchaser to see at a glance both the effect of any particular style, and, moreover, its exact price. He can see the effect of chintz, leather, or stuff; he can decide between a Jacobean dining-room or fumed oak, according both to his taste and his purse. All this he can do in a few minutes without the weariness of much hunting in a little time and the disappointments thereby entailed.

Sour Milk Treatment

A Point to Remember.

The Bacillus Bulgaricus thrives best on casein and milk sugar. St. Ivel Cheese contains both these substances in sufficient quantity, and by the method of manufacture the over-development of lactic acid is prevented. Thus the lactic acid cultures can be kept alive for a longer period in St. Ivel Cheese than in soured milk, as in the latter an excessive amount of lactic acid rapidly develops and destroys the Bulgarian germs.

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Wednesday.—The sun it shineth once in a way, and I am revelling in the fact at Newmarket, where I am staying at Diana's favourite resting-place with Diana as companion-in-chief. Ours is the ideal hostess, demanding nothing but a sincere admiration for her judgment of a horse, our sincere sympathy when this has proved at fault, some appreciation of her gowns and of her garden, and a tender consciousness of her cook.

It was quite a small gathering, and I was glad to see that fête gowns were in the minority. There is joy at Newmarket over the sinners who have repented of their over-dressing, and of turning the Heath into a garden party without the flowers. The order of the day is as it should be, cotton frocks, and coats and skirts of all materials; long may such ways of wisdom endure.

I ran against Mrs. Berkeley Levett this morning in a neat grey serge and black hat, looking very comfortable, resting on her umbrella, which is fitted with a shooting seat. Since Mrs. Medcalfe's advent to the enclosure she, too, has followed the example of the old habituées, and carries a shooting-seat stick. I met Baroness Daisy de Brienen smartly adorning coarse black Shantung, the coat rather short and loose in the back, and worn over a double-breasted black waistcoat, with pretty soft white frills to her shirt. Miss Naylor was in a black and white cotton coat and skirt, while the Duchess of Newcastle's white piqué was of the neatest tailor-made variety, and they had both adopted most becoming big French hats of white, liberally bestrewn with ribbon bows. Mrs. Willie Lawson, in black and white check, was getting the latest tips from Mrs. Featherstonhaugh, in a grey and white flannel tailor-made gown, crowned with a black hat becomingly trimmed with white coque's feathers and the head of a once merry little yellow cockatoo.

I saw Mrs. Sassoon in grey and Mrs. Rothschild in black, all smiles after the win of Meadow Chat, one of the horses belonging to King George, which during the year of mourning are run in the name and colours of Lord Derby. Mrs. George West, as handsome as a painting, wore an extraordinary black satin coat lined with white and black thin flannel, and the quaintest hat of Panama, with the entire crown and outside covered with dull black gros grain silk and a bunch of white coque's feathers rampant, the brim beneath revealing the natural Panama. Mrs. Maclaughlin kindly relieved her black and white foulard by little bands of red; her red sunshade was quite a pleasing oasis in the monotonous desert of drabs and greys which overspread the scene. After the day's work of racing was done we motored home to the joys of croquet and tennis, and to-night the ices at dinner, of most excellent vanilla cream, were served with a maple sugar sauce, which should ensure the cook a special order of merit. This sauce is a great improvement on pistache or cherry, and just as easy to make, which means that it is very difficult, as are all good deeds. Our hostess looked lovely in a gown of Malines lace with blue ribbons gleaming beneath at bust and knees, and one of the three residing males had the grace to protest against further discussion of the foregone conclusions on the Heath, and to sum up the financial position of the multitude with the indisputable reflection, "Money's neither here nor there."

Thursday.—A perfect day, and a full attendance upon it; London contributing most liberally, and sending us Mrs. Albert Petre in black ninon with a short coat of moiré and a large black hat with a grey weeping plume on it; Mrs. Dighton Probyn in black charmeuse of the neatest pattern, with coral pink wings outspread upon her black hat; and Mrs. Claude Levita, the personification of youth, in grey ninon hemmed with gold embroidery. Lady de Bathe in white embroidered linen, and Mrs. Naylor in white serge were held fast in the kicking-strap style of skirt. Lady Hesketh was in black, stepping it becomingly in admirable boots of patent leather, grey-topped. Mrs. King, who brought Lady Edith Franklin, wore foulard—and a good foulard, too; and little Mrs. Colgrave's delicate mauve frock cried aloud for a wistaria-trimmed hat. Lady Ilchester and Lady Wolverton successfully combined black hats with white gowns. Lady Wilmot belted with patent leather her white spotted muslin frock, and there was nothing amazingly ugly or pretty, except Q.'s pony, which is perfect, and I envied him its possession when in company with a few wise others he rode it to watch the racing. There were no feminine equestrians thus indulging; a little cause for regret which Diana and I voiced whilst motoring back; and amongst other regrets we talked of poor C. S. Rolls, and remembered visiting a nephew at Eton who was at Dr. Damen's house with him, where these two had installed electric light for their own use in their bedrooms. Even then his energy and scientific interest were manifest.

Friday.—I rejected the fatiguing fascinations of Sandown; yet town has its trials, and friendship its forfeits. Marjorie insisted that I should take her to a dance, thus seriously inconveniencing me, for I had planned the conducting of Sydney to the opera. However, I yielded in the better cause of kindness, and then my charge most promptly vanished from view with her favourite detrimental, only demanding my support at one special moment when a disapproving relation lounged into sight. It was a delightful affair of many interests notwithstanding this drawback. Lady F. was an attractive circumstance, in a gown of grey satin with a trellis of diamonds and pearls under the arms and forming her sleeves, while embroidered bands held her waist and her train drapery at the back and the trellis twinkled again on her underskirt. There was a most fascinating little dark-eyed girl in a cerise petticoat with a tunic of purple chiffon and a bunch of red flowers at one side of her hair. I recognised many of the white satin, bugle-trimmed dresses as recent triumphs snatched from the July sales. Masses of polychromatic sweet peas decorated every available corner of the rooms. I took advantage of my inactive responsibility to devour two suppers, when I arranged to tea with E. next week to meet H. G. Wells. He has been one of my favourite heroes in real life ever since his Tono Bungay induced me to consider flying seriously, and to recognise "Uncle" as the most modern and popular type of Don Juan.

Saturday.—I have been holding a family Levee. Joan and Lilian came in to discuss holidays, and Virginia to tell us what delightful polo they had had at Hurlingham, and that if she should add another dress to her already over-stocked wardrobe she would like rose-red and white foulard veiled with grey ninon, finally winding up her praise of one she had met with, "And I must have it long. The girl I saw looked so nice with her feet decently covered, and I'm rather tired of my ankles." Virginia's ankles are, perhaps, of exhaustible charm, while her feet bear no resemblance to the little mice of lyrical fame which peeped in and out—they are firmly out. I should say she whispers "Sixes" to her bootmaker in confidential moments.

Joan, our irrepressible worker, is full of her holiday, and where she shall spend it, and how. Beset by her sense of patriotic duty, she is yet convinced she would be somewhat bored did she follow its path to Devonshire as I suggested. Geographically she is very instructive, and I gained much information on the exact position of Etrétat and Dieppe, while Blankenberghe was clearly placed before me, and Dinard dangled alluringly. "I will go to Dinard if you will come with me," she graciously concluded.

After many years of intimacy with my nearest and dearest, I think the summer months which make them the furthest are like to lead to the happiest winter of contented re-union. Unlike the little boy of history I can play alone, and I prefer to pretend to do so. Joan may go to Dinard, I shall wander about England and Wales, having carefully secured the right companion to share that solitude I boast of loving.

Lilian held forth on bathing dresses at great—no, scant—length, deciding that black satin was the material of her choice, and reminding us of the admirable wear of the black taffetas she chose last season. Certainly a black bathing dress merits consideration, and with a tunic fastened down one side, a belt of patent leather, and stockings of the finest silk gauze it grants the complexion every opportunity for distinguishing itself. And she swims well, does Lilian, in deep waters and in shallow, and she will doubtless float somehow safe to harbour.

The spotted and plain bathing dress.

Joan has a good scheme for a bathing gown made of red and white spotted linen under a tunic of red; but I urged her to contemplate the more unusual effect of brown or grey similarly treated.

After all this momentous confabulation, directing everywhere and leading nowhere, we went out to lunch together at the Savoy, and met that impassioned and beautiful Suffragette Inez Millholland, who has just come over from New York with Mrs. Belmont and proposes materially to assist the cause in London. When I have time and opportunity I should like to try to persuade her that there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in her militant want of philosophy. She was wearing a nice white frock and hat, and disported obtrusively the green and purple badge of her servitude to the cause of freedom.

Constance Collier was at the next table in a capital coat and skirt of coarse purple linen, buttoned with amethyst and silver, and bearing a black satin collar, crowned with a white Tegal hat hemmed with violet satin and wreathed round the low crown with purple and red satin roses and grapes. She confidentially told us of a fine play she is to "heroine" in America this autumn, and she spoke of Charles Frohman with sufficient enthusiasm to make me realise she was an exception to Owen Hall's rule. "An actress is a person who stands on the same boards every evening thinking ill of her manager."

Mrs. A's Letter-Box.

I have been persuaded to counsel through these columns all wise women who send me their dress difficulties to solve. But their inquiries must be clearly addressed to Mrs. A., "Truth" Office, Carteret Street, S.W.

Jester.—I should advise a dark blue serge coat of the three-quarter length with a patent leather belt and broad revers opening to the waist showing an ordinary lawn shirt, which can be made without a collarband and outlined with a round piece of Irish lace. A white Tegal hat bound with blue silk and a small wreath of blue and violet silk flowers might complete this. Patent leather shoes are much nicer than tan, and black silk stockings of the thinnest gauze description should be worn. You would not need another long coat, and you would thus limit your burdens.

WORK AND PLAY.

Looking back on women's work this season, it seems to have covered a wide scope. Of the members of one club alone, artists were represented at the Academy, by one-woman shows in Bond Street, in Glasgow, Paris, Dublin, Buenos Ayres, and Venice, at these cities' respective exhibitions. The serious reviews, no less than the lighter magazines, have been largely encouraging to women's work; and as to books, we have had them of every kind. Mr. Belloc's witty remark in the House that it turned him cold to hear women considered intelligent because they wrote books—"no occupation of the educated man or woman requires less intelligence"—could hardly apply to works throwing new light on a whole period of art, or "the esoteric meaning of the seven sacraments."

* * * * * *

To judge by the headings in the Press, it has come as a shock to many people to find from a perusal of the reports of the Women's Congress that philanthropy, and, more surprising still, female philanthropy, is not always of an impertinent character. Opinion may be divided as to some of the effects of the woman's latter-day movement, but one thing stands undoubtedly to its credit, and that is the elimination of the old type of district visitor, whose faith in a luridly worded tract as a remedy for evils which were largely economical and hygienic was one of the most pathetic features of Victorian womanhood. It is being more and more widely recognised by those at the head of philanthropic effort that the well intentioned but badly equipped women helpers frequently do more harm than good. Nowadays many a woman goes through a course of hygiene and domestic economy before embarking on the still very badly charted sea of philanthropy.

* * * * * *

That the art of fine needlework is being revived in the schoolrooms of our aristocracy is proved by the dolls' bazaar at Lansdowne House, where dolls entirely dressed by themselves were sold by the daughters of duchesses and marchionesses in aid of charity. Lady Lansdowne herself believes in the old-fashioned accomplishments of women, which a few years ago seemed in danger of extinction. Home-made sweets were also sold, so evidently the arts of the kitchen are also not unknown to the rising generation. It really seems that the increased facilities for women's education are serving rather to bring them closer to old ideals than to draw them away, in spite of gloomy prognostications from military clubs and bachelor haunts.

* * * * * *

There is a great deal of common sense in the scheme of "the good Lord Shaftesbury" for Promoting the Employment of Women. The society which was the outcome of it advances money to parents of the professional classes who cannot afford to train their daughters in some employment which will make them independent. The money is repaid when the student begins to earn—by easy instalments. No interest is charged, no voting or subscriber's letter is necessary; each applicant is judged on her merits. It is obvious that such a scheme as this requires tangible support, and those who are impressed by the tragedy of the middle-aged, untrained, spinster daughter when left an orphan should send donations, or apply for particulars, to Miss King, the secretary of the S.P.E.W., at 23, Berners Street.

The revival of dancing in girls' clubs comes at the same time as an awakening idea that it ought to be included in the curriculum of all schools. It is extra, as a rule, and then consists only of an hour and a half in the week. But a number of educational authorities have recently declared that dancing is the best form of exercise possible in school, and of course it has the advantage of being useful afterwards. Mr. Cecil Sharp advocates the teaching of folk-dances, which he calls "the wild flowers of the dance world," followed by the gavotte and minuet. The morris dance has recently been revived with great success, and the fact that it used to be danced only by men does not prevent it from being very charming when performed by girls.

The ladies' part in the gymkhana at Ranelagh last week was one of the most amusing competitions—musical chairs, or, as one spectator, evidently of un-sporting tastes, remarked, "musical pens." The struggles to get into the stalls were very amusing, and Miss Odell, on a fine grey, who had evidently played the game before, afforded an example of what understanding between horse and rider can do. Two of the competitors arriving at one stall together, the judges had a difficult task, not in adjudging the winner, but in persuading her that her generous wish that her rival should succeed was unavailing. The gymkhana was very successful, and drew a fashionable crowd to the restful spaces of Ranelagh.

The Imperial Rifle Club, which will be opened next month at 36, Bruton Street, will add to the advantages of a social club a first-rate rifle range, and both men and women will be eligible for membership. Mrs. Quintin-Dick, who is an enthusiastic rifle shot, is on the committee, which also includes Lady Noel-Walker, Lady Perrott, and Viscount and Viscountess Molesworth. Miss Eva Fenton, secretary of the club, proposes to inaugurate monthly shooting competitions, which should do much to encourage this excellent form of sport, for rifle shooting can only be regarded as a sport or a hobby in the case of women. That they can cultivate it with success, however, has been shown by some of the recent records at Bisley.

Caravanning is a delightful way of spending one's summer holiday, and offers a life full of attraction to those who enjoy a healthy, open-air existence. How to "LA JOSEPHINE'S" NEW WAIST-LINE CORSET is the ideal of perfection. The contour is graceful, the fashioning elegant, and the build on anatomical principles. Particulars and prices on application to 280, Regent Street, London.

"caravan" with the maximum of comfort and the minimum of inconvenience was demonstrated at the meet of the Caravan Club at Coulsdon, Surrey, last Friday. The meet presented a picturesque village of vans and tents. Not all of the vans suggested the simple life. Particularly luxurious was that of Sir James and Lady Moody, who are ardent devotees of the road. Miss Tucker, an intrepid lady camper-out, was a conspicuous figure in the assembly. Finding no caravans in British Columbia, Miss Tucker lived the simple life so thoroughly that she now prefers "sleeping out" to caravanning or any other kind of life. Although people may wax enthusiastic over playing at gipsies in a van—especially if they have read Countess von Arnim's witty book, "The Caravanners"—it will probably be some time before the open-air habit leads them to follow Miss Tucker's example, and scoop out a hole in the ground for their bed, with the sky for their roof, and no protection in the world against "creepy crawlies."

THE SECOND-BEST GIRL.

["The Bill excludes married women, who are the best class of women. Because they are the best they are married."—Sir Edward Clarke, K.C.]

Farewell, sweet dreams of wedded bliss!
  Fade, visions of domestic joy!
The thrill of the connubial kiss,
  Caresses that will never cloy—
These pleasures I may never know,
For I am doomed to single woe!

I see myself, in years to come,
  A bachelor of crusty mien,
Bereft of the delights of home,
  Sad, musing on "the might have been."
No prattling tongues my ear shall bless—
I'm doomed to single wretchedness!

You ask, "Why take this gloomy view,
  With hosts of loveless maids around?"
Though girls be many, friend, 'tis true,
  The best in marriage bonds are bound.
And I, for one, should be afraid
To wed a girl of second grade.

LETTER FROM MADGE.

Dearest Amy,—The cheap sales are more prolific in bargains than ever owing to the mourning and also to the bad weather we have had till now. We looked in at Liberty's yesterday, and were tempted to buy many things we do not need because they were so very inexpensive. Among them were tussore coats embroidered by hand and of exceptionally good cut, and burnous coats in lovely shades. The blouses at half-price seemed the chance of a lifetime, some satin, some Paisley silk, some crêpe de Chine, and the dress lengths would have been equally irresistible but for the difficulty about having them made up. It is so convenient to buy gowns ready to wear, and there are enough of these to make one pass the dress lengths without regret. The picturesqueness of the styles and the beauty of the embroideries make a Liberty gown a cherished possession. We wandered into the furniture department and found equally low prices ruling there, brocades, tapestries, cretonnes, rugs, carpets, and hangings of excellent quality being cleared at reductions that will appeal to every one. Send for a catalogue of the sale and profit by this cheapness.

The absurdities of the Board School curriculum must have been food for the laughter of the gods for many years, and it is good to find that at last they are attracting attention from some of our prominent men who know something about the various phases of life and their needs. General Baden-Powell (if you hesitate how to pronounce his vowels, remember that his schoolfellows used to call him "bathing towel") has been speaking at University College under the auspices of the Parents' Educational Union. He told his audience that at a school in a mining district he found girls being taught to paint flowers who knew nothing about cookery, and that the boys, who should have been receiving technical training, were taught to draw from the round. These boys are probably going to work in mines during the greater part of their lives. Why not teach them something that would make their work easier to them in the long, hard days to come?

The whole system of Board School teaching needs overhauling. A committee of ladies and gentlemen should be appointed to examine the matter and set things in the right way. Even when useful subjects are taught the teaching is not practical. In some places needlework is still inspected and judged by men, and it is only quite recently that girls have been taught to cut out or have been allowed to make garments for themselves. A girl whom I employed to do some sewing could do the needle part of the work most beautifully—in fact, admirably. But she had never heard of a gusset and had not the slightest notion what counter-hemming meant. She could feather-stitch quite perfectly, but could not arrange a seam for herself unless it was all straightaway work.

And then there are the cookery lessons. They are supposed to be given in order to teach girls to cook in their own homes. But in the schools there is a complete batterie de cuisine, and the young learners have no idea how to manage without all the various utensils, whereas in their own homes there is seldom more than a more or less shabby saucepan or two, a frying-pan, a baking-tin, and a couple of kettles. How are they to adapt their knowledge of cookery to such changed circumstances?

The Caseys are at Homburg, early as it is in the season. They write that they are having beautiful weather and the Spring is greatly improved by the addition of a fine new concert pavilion and big promenade hall near the Elisabeth Spring. They are staying at Ritter's Park Hotel, their sitting-room with a balcony overlooking the park.

As Arthur is suffering from such a variety of ailments after his attack of influenza, the best thing you can do is to take him to Evian-les-Bains, where his gouty symptoms will soon disappear. You know it is from the famous spring at Evian-Cachat that we get the effervescent bottled water so well known here and so strongly recommended by the faculty. There are luxurious hotels, the Royal a perfect palace in its own park and with about one hundred suites of rooms; and the Splendide, also in its own grounds. Both these are under the same management as the Ritz and Carlton in London.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

Dearest Madge,—The tourists who were with us last week saw only the smile in Erin's eye, without so much as a hint of the tear. Every one, who still wants to learn Ireland, should have been learning it then; sunny impressions are so helpful to kindly feelings—there is nothing like them for burning up old fallacies and prejudices. There are so many, however, from your side of the Channel who do not come to learn, but to teach—who want us to be their kind of Irish, instead of our own kind. We think that we, who have been in the business so long, know best how to be Irish. Our friends the Smiths have been staying under our own particular roof on a first visit to the land; their views have brought this subject into prominence. Such a surprise.

In their own country they showed no trace of the teaching virus, and now what admonitions we receive daily as regards all Irish things under Heaven! Fred sums it up "as if we are to adopt their tiddy-iddy-little ways, and give up our own wide, go-as-you-please ones!"

Lord Kitchener, with his brother, Colonel Kitchener, has been flitting about various parts of the country renewing his acquaintance with the beautiful South-West, in which he spent his early years, and visiting the fine coast scenery in other parts. One can imagine that wherever Lord Kitchener goes he is gathering the "harvest of a quiet eye." His friends who knew him in his youth say that he was a ceaseless hard worker, leaving no "shining hour" unimproved—an example to the multitude who, with ever-increasing strenuousness, pursue pleasure as their chief good.

Sir Neville and Lady Lyttelton have left the Royal Hospital, Kilmainham, and taken up their residence in the official quarters on the Curragh of Kildare. The Royal Hospital will be open again for the Horse Show week, when, as usual, Sir Neville and Lady Lyttelton will entertain a party of visitors.

Do you care for Irish stories? A friend of Fred's relates a late experience. Having advertised for a gardener, stipulating for a married man, he found that the first applicant was unmarried. "You take up my advertisement," he said, indignantly, "and now you say that you are not married." "Nayther am I, your honour." "Then why the d—— do you apply for the place?" "Shure, it 'ill be all right wonst you take me." "All wrong, you mean." "Faith, an' I don't, your honour. Hav'n't I three of them courted up to the asking?"

This year's Horse Show week is expected to be a record one. Hotels in Dublin and its neighbourhood are prepared for an unusually busy time. House parties will be entertained, not only in Dublin and the near counties, but in the more distant ones, which motors draw into the circle of neighbourhood. Race meetings and polo matches have long been extra attractions of the week. This year the aviation meeting, immediately following the Horse Show week, with Sunday only intervening, is an exciting and novel attraction. The fact that there has been no "flying" in Ireland as yet naturally increases the excitement and attraction of the occasion. The pity is that disaster has been so frequent of late in aviation enterprise. Experience is the only compelling teacher, however, and aerial science must soon learn that even in it there can be too high flights.—Yours ever, CLARE.

I had not room in my last for all my recipes dealing with nice things in season, so I now send a few more:—

Trout à la Dumas.—After boiling a salmon trout weighing two pounds, divest it of its skin and when it is cold coat it with thick mayonnaise sauce mixed with a quarter part of liquid aspic to give it more consistency. Decorate the surface with crescent-shaped slices of truffle, sprigs of chervil and lobster coral. Place the trout on a bed of shred lettuce and make a border with cucumber in this way: Cut the cucumber into pieces two inches long, take off the skin with a fluted cutter and remove the seeds with an apple corer; fill the cups, thus formed, with chopped lobster and chopped capers, mixed with aspic jelly and cream, all whisked together. Put a spoonful of mayonnaise sauce on the top and sprinkle them alternately with chopped truffle and red coral.

Lamb Chops à la Minute.—Remove the skin from the fat of the chops, turn the ends round, and place in the hollows of each half a kidney. Dust all well with pepper, salt, grated nutmeg, and chopped parsley. Wrap each chop in a well-buttered paper, closing the ends carefully and tightly. Fry them in sufficient boiling beef dripping to cover them completely. When they are done, drain them, and remove the buttered papers. Place the chops upon a dish, and garnish them with little heaps of fried parsley. Serve them very hot.

Lamb Cutlets with Purée of Mushrooms.—Skin the mushrooms and put them into a stewpan with a little butter. When they are well heated add four spoonfuls of velouté sauce. Do not let them cook long or they will lose both colour and taste. Rub them through a fine wire sieve, adding a lump of sugar and a tablespoonful of cream, and put them in the stewpan. When they come to the boil moisten them with some veal stock and season them to taste. Throw in a few sprigs of parsley, some green onions, and three small turnips. Let the whole simmer for an hour, then put in the cutlets; let them cook until tender. Pass the gravy through a fine sieve upon the cutlets, and, before straining it, throw in a lump of sugar.

Bouchées de Fraises à la Carmen.—Make a paste with 8 oz. ground almonds, 8 oz. of sifted icing sugar, the juice of half a lemon, and the yolks of two eggs; roll it out stiffly, using sifted icing sugar, cut it into rounds and with them line small bouchée moulds. Brush them with beaten egg, prick them well with a fork and dry them some hours in a cool oven, then remove them from the tins. Make half a pint of creamy Vanilla ice, put a portion in each bouchée, and fill them with small ripe strawberries, sprinkled with sugar and kirsch. Whip a little cream very stiff, with sugar and kirsch, and pipe it round the edge of the bouchées, using a leaf-shaped tube. Dish them on a fancy paper.

Ever your loving Cousin, MADGE.

THE ELECTRICAL INDUSTRY.

By A. ROSENTHAL.

METALLIC FILAMENT LAMPS. ELECTRICITY SUPPLY CORPORATIONS.

A COMING STRUGGLE.

One of the most interesting features regarding the introduction of metallic filament lamps is the present attitude of the electricity supply corporations towards the manufacturers of those lamps. At first, no notice was taken of either lamps or manufacturers. Their advent was not regarded of sufficient importance to attract attention, but gradually the supply corporations began to notice a difference in the consumption of electricity, and only in this manner was their attention attracted and their interest aroused. A hostile attitude then followed, and some of them even went so far as to do everything that was possible to discourage the consumers of electricity from using them. That policy was both wrong and harmful, as events have since proved. It was the same policy of antagonism that was adopted by trade unionists when machinery was first introduced, and as is now a matter of common knowledge, it also proved a wrong one.

THE FORCE OF EVOLUTION.

It is, of course, easy to understand how workmen should have been alarmed at the introduction of machinery which was going to dispense with a great deal of labour, especially as that so frequently happened, but, on the other hand, the dislocation was only a temporary one. After a time things found their level. Other employment was found for those who suffered, and the whole world benefited to an extent which is almost difficult to realise. The introduction of machinery was a striking example of the force of evolution. It showed clearly that there is no such thing as being able to stop the hands of the clock or set them back. It is in the nature of things that civilisation must progress, and a better realisation of that important fact would help to quicken the hands of the clock in the march of time.

History, however, repeats itself, and the introduction of the metallic filament lamps is merely another instance of it. The electricity supply corporations have had their eyes opened, and they now see the folly of their ways. What they regarded as a calamity has now proved to be a blessing, because, although the quantity of current used by each consumer is considerably less than when carbon filament lamps were used, the number of consumers has greatly increased. The cost of burning electricity has been so much reduced through metallic lamps, that a great many people find that it is now cheaper to use it for lighting than gas. In course of time this fact must become better known, and consequently the number of consumers will continue to grow very largely. With a great many people the question of economy has to be primarily considered, and for that reason alone they have continued to use gas. On the point of convenience there can, of course, be no question of comparison, while the aspect of cleanliness and health is also a matter for great consideration.

GAS BEING OUSTED.

Consumers who have once tested the difference can never go back to gas. It is almost like going back to the living modes of last century, and that, of course, can never be. Electricity was destined from the first to oust gas, and the ousting is proceeding at a fairly rapid rate. Even in comparatively small houses and flats that are being built, electric fittings are invariably installed—the rest is merely a question of time.

For street lighting, metallic lamps are proving a great benefit and saving to the ratepayers. Several corporations have experimented with them for that purpose, and the results have been most astounding. In each case there has been a great saving in cost. The amount varies, some of them exceeding £2 per lamp per annum. But corporations, like some individuals, are very slow, and only a few of them so far have installed metallic lamps. Meanwhile the ratepayers suffer through this neglect, and they will do well to stir up the controlling bodies to a more prompt realisation of their duties. If there was any question of doubt on the point, there would be some excuse for delay, but the doubt stage has long been passed, and the sooner corporations bestir themselves, the better it will be for themselves and the ratepayers. A saving of over two pounds per lamp per annum is no small item even for wealthy corporations, especially in these days of burdensome taxation.

A BRITISH LAMP.

The Liverpool Corporation is one of the latest to essay the installation, and they have just ordered one thousand of the "British Metallite" lamps. This lamp has been chosen because of its special virtues both as regards the quality of light and economy. The light is bright, and resembles that of the sun more closely than any other which has ever been seen. The lamp is less brittle than other metallic filaments, which means diminished breakages. The filaments are more pliable on account of a special secret process of the inventor, and this in itself is a great consideration, for many of the metallic lamps break with the slightest touch.

Corporations, perhaps, are more interested in the question of economy, and in this respect the "British Metallite" stands upon a pinnacle. It has been subjected to a variety of comparative tests, and it surmounted them all. It is the first metallic lamp which was manufactured in this country commercially, and the inventor is a Britisher. Orders for it are pouring in from all parts of the world in colossal quantities. During the past few months America alone has sent orders for over fifteen million filaments per annum under contract for the next five years, but colossal as that amount is, it is small compared to the increase that would have been, had the manufacturers been in a position to cope with the demand.

ENGLAND WAKING UP.

As it is, every available corner of the factory in Horsell Road, Highbury, London, N., is taxed to its uttermost capacity for space, but negotiations are proceeding with the object of purchasing a larger factory in order to be better able to cope with the demand. When that stage is reached—and it will be very shortly—an epoch of great magnitude and importance to the electrical industry in this country will have taken place, for it will mark the real beginning of a great struggle to wrest the supremacy from America and Germany. For a long time those countries have been allowed a fairly free hand in this industry, but great captains of industry have at last awakened to that fact, and begun to realise that Britain is equally as capable at least as those two countries in that respect. The cry "England! Wake up!" has been heard, and it is being acted upon. A stimulus has been necessary, but it has come, and now that it has come the future may be regarded as one of great promise. All that is required is characteristic enterprise and perseverance of the same quality and calibre as that which brought about Britain's commercial supremacy, and that won for us the blue ribbon of the Atlantic after Germany had been allowed to take it from us

PROSPECTUS.

The Union Life Assurance Company was incorporated in 1902 by Special Act of the Dominion Parliament of Canada, with the object of extending the benefits of Industrial Life Assurance to the working classes. The history of the Company has been one of unexampled progress. It has secured more business in Canada during the past eight years and has a larger number of policies in force in Canada than any other Canadian life assurance company either Ordinary or Industrial.

The Company issues both Ordinary and Industrial Life Assurance on a purely non-participating basis. The policyholders do not share in the earnings or surplus of the Company. All profits are the property of the Shareholders, and are therefore available for distribution as dividends or for accumulation on Shareholders' account.

Companies transacting Life Assurance in Canada are required by the Insurance Act of the Dominion to file annually with the Government sworn Statements of account including annual policy valuations, which returns are subject to verification by personal inspection of the Superintendent of Insurance and the Actuary of the Insurance Department.

The following table, compiled from the Company's Returns, demonstrates the marked progress of the Company since its incorporation.

PROFITABLE NATURE OF INDUSTRIAL ASSURANCE.

The principal business transacted by this Company is Industrial Life Assurance. This system was first successfully introduced by the Prudential Assurance Company of England in 1848. It has resulted in making that Company one of the greatest institutions in the world, with over nineteen millions of policies in force, a number equal to nearly half the population of the United Kingdom, to which its business is confined.

Few fields of investment have yielded more substantial returns than Industrial Life Assurance, and experience has shown that there are no safer and more profitable investments than the shares of well-established and prudently managed Industrial Life Assurance Companies. That the profits of established Industrial Assurance companies are large may be judged from the following figures:—

| NAME OF COMPANY. | Dividend and Bonuses. | Amount Paid up per Share. | Market Price. | Premium per Share. | Capital Paid up. | Total Market Value. | Increase Over Par Value. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Prudential Assurance Company, Ltd., London | 55% | £5 | 65 | £0 | £1,000,000 | £13,000,000 | £12,000,000 |
| Pearl Life Assurance Company, Ltd., London | 50% | £5 | 65 | 60 | £140,000 | £1,820,000 | £1,680,000 |
| Britannic Assurance Co., Ltd, Birmingham | 25% | £1 | 30 | 29 | £30,000 | £900,000 | £870,000 |

During the ten years 1900 to 1910 the Market Price of Prudential Shares has increased from £36 to £65; Pearl Shares from £7 10s. (£2 paid) to £65 (£5 paid), and Britannic Shares from £2 15s. to £30.

CANADA AS A FIELD FOR INDUSTRIAL LIFE ASSURANCE.

The unprecedented growth of Canada in population, the unceasing influx of immigrants, and the material industrial progress during recent years, make it the most promising field for Industrial Assurance. During the last six years 1,069,374 persons have emigrated to Canada, and it has been computed that nearly 400,000 immigrants will have entered the Dominion this year. The industrial classes of Canada are regularly and remuneratively employed, and abounding prosperity is shown by the Bank Deposits having increased in the last ten years by over 300 per cent., or more than Five Hundred and Fifty Million Dollars.

The number of Industrial Policies in force in Great Britain is almost equal to the entire population of the country as compared with 1 to 4 in the United States, while at present in Canada they number approximately only 1 to 15 of the population. The scope presented for the business of Industrial Life Assurance in Canada is therefore obvious.

The Union Life Assurance Company has in force over 62 per cent. of the total Industrial business transacted by Canadian companies. This commanding lead should be maintained, and the opportunities for the extension of the business in Canada are far greater than in the United Kingdom, where Industrial Assurance has been thoroughly developed.

The business of Life Assurance has been transacted in Canada for sixty-two years, and been under stringent Governmental supervision for forty years, during which time there has not been a single instance of insolvency in the history of Canadian Proprietary Life Assurance Companies. This is substantial evidence of the soundness of the methods required by the Government.

The funds of Canadian Life Assurance Companies are required by Law to be invested only in such interest-bearing securities as are permitted by the Insurance Act of Canada.

OBJECTS OF THE ISSUE.

The Union Life Assurance Company has established so substantial a Premium Income and created so valuable a business as to justify the introduction of Additional Working Capital with the object of extending the organisation throughout the Dominion of Canada, thereby enabling the Directors to take full advantage of the favourable opportunities now presented, due to the large growth in population, increasing immigration, general industrial development, and withal to ensure to the Company the maintenance of the premier position which it now holds in relation to Industrial Assurance in Canada.

REPORT OF MR. RUSHER, F.I.A., ASSISTANT ACTUARY OF THE PRUDENTIAL.

Mr. Edward A. Rusher, F.I.A., F.S.S., of the Prudential Assurance Company (of England), was invited to investigate the business of the Company, with special reference to the proposed increase of Share Capital, and the following is his report:—

"London, E.C., 27th April, 1910.

"To H. Pollman Evans, Esq.,

"President, The Union Life Assurance Co. (of Canada).

"In accordance with your instructions I have the pleasure to report on the business of the Union Life Assurance Co. (of Canada) with special reference to the proposed increase of Share Capital.

"The Company commenced operations in 1902, transacting both Ordinary and Industrial business. Its steady growth is shown in the following table:—

TOTAL ANNUAL PREMIUMS ON BUSINESS IN FORCE AT END OF YEAR.

| Year. | Dols. | Increase. Dols. | Year. | Dols. | Increase. Dols. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1902 | 47,600 | 47,600 | 1906 | 322,227 | 94,844 |
| 1903 | 119,975 | 72,375 | 1907 | 376,573 | 54,346 |
| 1904 | 159,568 | 39,593 | 1908 | 423,462 | 46,889 |
| 1905 | 227,383 | 67,815 | 1909 | 516,735 | 93,273 |

"From this it will be seen that by the end of last year the Company had built up a premium income of well over half-a-million dollars, and it should be an easy matter to make even greater progress in the future, seeing that the population of Canada is rapidly increasing.

"This business is all on the 'non-participating' principle. Under its special Act of Parliament the Company has power to issue also participating policies, but I understand that it has no present intention of doing so, and indeed the present bye-laws restrict its business so as to exclude such assurances.

"From the investigation I have made the business appears to have been carefully selected, the average claim rate being low for an Industrial Company of the age of the Union Life.

"The Company has built up what I consider to be a valuable connection, and with continued prudent management, especially in taking precautions to discourage the lapsing of policies when once on the books, it has great possibilities of expansion in the future.

"The point upon which I am asked to report naturally resolves itself into the question whether there are reasonable prospects of satisfactory dividends being declared upon the capital already issued and paid up, together with the further capital now proposed to be issued, the two together amounting to 1,100,000 dols.

"There is no doubt that new capital may at the present time be introduced with advantage, and in fact it is imperative that it should be if the Company is to take proper advantage of the connections it has already secured.

"In this connection it may be noted that the business already on the books is sufficient at the present time to pay dividends at a handsome rate on the existing paid-up capital, and at a fair though necessarily much smaller rate on the total increased capital.

"As bearing upon future prospects, I understand that the previously existing arrangement with the National Agency Company has been determined, and that a new arrangement has been entered into whereby that Company, accepts, in return for its services, an annual payment of £8,000, plus a sum equivalent to three per cent. upon the total premiums paid in the year.

"Taking this arrangement into consideration, and assuming that the same care as hitherto continues to be exercised in the management of the business, I am of opinion, after thorough examination of the facts placed at my disposal, that the existing business should be sufficient to provide an immediate dividend at a fair rate on the whole of the $1,100,000 share capital, and that, even if the business should not increase at quite so rapid a rate as indicated by the figures for 1909, the Company will in a very short time be in a position to pay a dividend at a substantially higher rate.

"Hence, seeing that it is proposed to apply the whole of the new issue to the development of the business, the shares should before long stand at a substantial premium.

"EDWARD A. RUSHER, F.I.A., F.S.S."

The National Agency Company, Limited, referred to in the report of Mr. Rusher, was incorporated in 1901, by Royal Letters Patent issued by the Government of Ontario for the express purpose of acting as Managing Agent for any registered Insurance Company; it was associated in the foundation of this Company, and was appointed Managing Agent.

Mr. Charles J. Harvey, Fellow of the Institute of Actuaries (Great Britain), was also consulted in reference to increasing the Capital, and stated:—

"I would suggest that the same conservatively aggressive policy be continued if your Company would reap full advantage from the splendid position which it has now attained. Additional funds should be invested from time to time; in support of this I may say that the profits of Industrial Insurance will return to the investor substantial dividends upon practically any amount that may be judiciously invested in the business."

GUARANTEED DIVIDENDS.

The National Agency Company, Limited, guarantees for three years from the date of this issue a minimum dividend of 6 per cent. per annum upon the amount for the time being paid up thereon. The Assets of the National Agency Company, Limited, are as shown by the annual statement for the year ending December 31st, 1909, $1,638,931.

The Directors are of opinion that after the three years the extension of the business resulting from the additional capital will, together with the existing business, enable the Company to pay increasing dividends of upwards of Ten per cent. upon the paid-up capital, and that the shares will command a substantial and steadily advancing premium.

During the past eight years, instead of distributing dividends to the shareholders, the Directors have adopted the conservative policy of developing the business and of building up a strong Assurance Fund, in consonance with the practice of successful offices.

MANAGEMENT.

So far as the Directors can ascertain the progress of the Company has been unparalleled in the history of Industrial Assurance; and the promise of an extended and remunerative business has satisfied the Directors that the policy of expansion adopted by them, and which they propose to continue, will be materially assisted by the increase in the financial resources of the Company.

Due to the adoption by this Company from its inception of the system of medical selection of risks in the Industrial Branch, the death claims have been less than 17 per cent. of the premium income received. This is believed to be lower than that of any industrial life office of similar age. The average ratio of the British Industrial offices of equal age is upwards of 40 per cent. Compared with this, the experience of the Union Life has resulted in a saving of income already equal to more than 10 per cent. on the paid-up capital of the Company, including this issue, and which will steadily increase in amount with the growth of the Premium Income. This result ensures greater returns to the shareholders of this Company.

The management which has brought the undertaking to its present successful position as the largest Canadian Industrial Life Assurance Company, will continue to direct the policy of the Company in conjunction with the most competent actuarial advice.

In addition to the Directors of the Company in Toronto, in whom the management of the Company is vested, Advisory Boards have been appointed in the Maritime Provinces, and in the United Kingdom, who will give the Directors advice and assistance in all questions which may arise locally.

This issue affords an opportunity for an investment in an established business of known merit with great potentialities.

Dividends will be payable either in London at the fixed rate of exchange of 4.86 dols per £ sterling, or in currency at Toronto at the option of each shareholder.

Applications for Shares should be made on the accompanying form of application, and sent to the London City and Midland Bank, 5, Threadneedle Street, London, or to the Royal Bank of Scotland, St. Andrew Square, Edinburgh, or to any of their respective Branches, together with a remittance for the amount payable on application. Where no allotment is made the amount will be returned in full, and where the number of shares allotted is less than that applied for, the balance of the application money will be applied towards the remaining payments.

Interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum will be charged on all instalments paid in arrear of their respective dates, and failure to pay any instalment when due will render previous payments liable to forfeiture.

The Company will pay a brokerage of ½ per cent. on allotments made in respect of applications bearing broker's stamps.

An application for a settlement in and a quotation of the Shares will be made in due course to the Committee of the London Stock Exchange.

Copies of the Company's Special Acts, Bye-laws and the Reports and Agreements, referred to above, may be inspected at the office of the Solicitors at any time between the hours of 12 noon and 3 p.m. whilst the list remains open.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application may be obtained from the Bankers and Solicitors of the Company as above.

Dated July 16, 1910.

FORM OF APPLICATION.

This Form of Application to be filled up and sent entire, together with a Bearer Cheque for the amount payable upon application, to the London City and Midland Bank, Limited, 5, Threadneedle Street, London, E.C., or to any of its branches, or to the Royal Bank of Scotland, St. Andrew Square, Edinburgh, or to any of its branches.

The Company has been formed with the objects mentioned in the Memorandum of Association, and primarily for the purpose of acquiring as going concerns as from the 15th day of April, 1910:—

(1) The "British Metalite" Lamp and Metal Filament Manufacturing Business, Goodwill, and Assets in the United Kingdom of the Bryant Trading Syndicate, Limited; and

(2) The Business, Patents, Processes, and Goodwill of the International Filaments, Limited.

1. The Bryant Trading Syndicate was established in 1900 for the purposes of acquiring real estate in America. In 1902 they began to manufacture Carbon Lamps, removing in 1906 to the present factory at Horsell Road, Highbury, London, N.

In 1908 they secured the inventions and secret processes relating to the manufacture of "British Metalite" Filaments and Lamps and the sole rights for the United Kingdom. They have spent many thousands of pounds on improving the manufacturing processes of the filaments, until their present high state of efficiency was reached.

Orders for those filaments have been received for such quantities that the present factory accommodation is totally inadequate to meet the demand.

The Syndicate was the first British company to manufacture Metal Filament Electric Lamps and Metal Filaments for Lamp-making in Great Britain.

Continuous experiments have been made in England, under competent and expert supervision, with the object of substituting Metal for Carbon Lamps. As the result of these experiments, "British Metalite" Filament Lamps and Metal Filaments are now being manufactured by the Syndicate under a special process in this country, and it is claimed for them that they are superior to and compete successfully, both as regards price and efficiency, with any of the foreign productions now being so extensively sold and used in this country. The "British Metalite" Lamp emits a pure white light, and as compared with the ordinary Electric Carbon Lamp saves from 70 to 75 per cent. in current, whilst the superior life of this Lamp, compared with other Metal Filament Lamps, combined with its brilliancy and efficiency, are factors that have led to the "British Metalite" coming into popular and increasing demand. The results of comparative tests made at the National Physical Laboratory are shown below.

The Works of the Bryant Trading Syndicate, Limited, are fully occupied in every department and have contracts in hand for a considerable time to come at profitable prices. The services of their Engineer, Mr. F. Harrison, A.M.I.E.E., will be retained, together with the highly-trained and efficient staff, which, in view of the specialised and technical nature of this business, is a most important factor.

The nominal Capital of the Bryant Trading Syndicate, Limited, is £100,000, of which £63,557 has been issued, the assets of the Syndicate appearing in the Balance Sheet as at 15th April, 1910, standing at the sum of £86,926 1s. 4d. Of this amount £48,297 17s. 3d., representing real estate in America, will be retained by the Syndicate, and the balance of £38,628 4s. 1d., including the inventions and secret processes, patents, trade marks, plants, machinery, book debts, and all assets in the United Kingdom, together with the benefit of all existing contracts, will be acquired by the Company. The Liabilities of the Syndicate will be discharged by the Vendors.

The Directors are of opinion that they are acquiring the sole rights in the inventions and secret processes for the United Kingdom and abroad on extremely low terms, and such opinion is confirmed by the estimate of profits hereinafter mentioned, and by the report of the eminent Electrical Filament Expert, Dr. C. Heinrich Weber, which is not out hereafter, wherein he values the rights in the United Kingdom alone at a minimum sum of £100,000.

2. International Filaments, Limited, is a Company formed with a Nominal Capital of £20,000, and has acquired all the Foreign and Colonial Rights, Patents and Secret Processes relating to the manufacture of Metal Filaments and Metal Filament Electric Lamps, known as the "British Metalite" Lamps and Filaments. This Company has for some considerable time past been manufacturing under its rights for foreign shipment, and has in hand considerable contracts and orders, as stated hereafter. The Liabilities of International Filaments, Limited, will be discharged by the Vendors.

PROPOSED OPERATIONS OF COMPANY.

It is estimated that the present issue of Preferred Shares, if fully subscribed, will provide the Company with a working capital of about £248,500.

The present works are no longer adequate for the growing and prospective business, and it is intended out of the present issue to build or acquire additional premises in the provinces capable of coping with the large and rapidly increasing volume of trade both for Lamps and Filaments, and effecting such economies in production as will materially enhance the profits. It is estimated that the cost of the new works and equipment will be the sum of £75,000, and that the productive capacity of the said works will secure an output exceeding five million Lamps and two hundred million Filaments per annum, and the Directors have in view suitable works in the North of England which they are advised will be eminently suitable for the purposes of the Company.

Contracts for the United States of America alone exceeding Fifteen Million (15,000,000) Filaments per annum for the next five years are already in hand and in course of execution, in addition to large Trade orders, and the Syndicate is on the list of Contractors for, and has received orders from, amongst others, over fifty Corporations, the War and Admiralty Departments, Home Office, Crown Agents for the Colonies, several of the principal Home Railways, Tramway Corporations, Hotels and National Telephone Company. Arrangements have been made both in the United Kingdom and abroad to develop the business on an extensive scale, whereby a large proportion of the trade in all countries will be secured, and on the installation of the Company's proposed larger works contracts (already offered to the Company) amounting to many additional millions will be accepted.

The Company is intended to be a parent Company, and will acquire the benefit of all improvements to be made by the Vendors in the inventions and secret processes to be transferred to this Company, including the exclusive right to take out further Letters Patent where deemed necessary in respect of the said Inventions, Processes, and Improvements in all parts of the world, and will, whenever considered expedient, form subsidiary Companies, grant licences, or associate with existing firms or companies interested in the sale or manufacture of Metal Filaments and Lamps, as the Directors may deem advisable and advantageous, and assist in their formation and development with cash advances or cash investments made by this Company under Agreements giving it a permanent interest in the subsidiary companies.

The present minimum consumption of Incandescent Electric Lamps within the United Kingdom is estimated at 40,000,000 per annum, but when the fact is more generally known that owing to the introduction of Metal Filament Lamps electricity has become cheaper to use as an illuminant than gas, the demand for those lamps will be enormously increased. At present gas supplies 90 per cent. of the artificial lighting in the country. It is computed that before gas can compete successfully with the "British Metalite" Lamp as an illuminant it will have to be supplied at 7½d. per 1,000 cubic ft., an obvious impossibility. It will thus be obvious that there is wide scope for development under a well-defined system of organisation by which the Company should eventually bring the output and sale of their "British Metalite" Lamps in the United Kingdom alone up to at least 5,000,000 annually.

The Articles of Association, and the Agreements, Reports of Experts and Chartered Patent Agents, Certificate of Tests, and Valuation of the Plant and Machinery by Messrs. Miller, Reid, Paxton and Co., 5 and 6, Clement's Inn, London, W.C., together with Counsel's opinion, can be seen at the Offices of the Solicitors to the Company at any time during business hours while the Subscription List is open.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained at the Office of the Company or from the Bankers, Solicitors, Auditors, and Brokers.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best EPIGRAM, CONUNDRUM, LIPOGRAM, BOUTS-RIMÉS, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this Journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the TRUTH OFFICE by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a quarter to the same competitor.

7. ALL NEW CONTRIBUTORS ARE REQUIRED TO FORWARD WITH THEIR FIRST ANSWERS THEIR REAL NAMES AND ADDRESSES FOR REGISTRATION; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed twelve, and must under no circumstances consist of more than fourteen, letters.

9. COMPETITORS MUST ON NO ACCOUNT CHANGE THE NOMS-DE-PLUME THEY HAVE ONCE ASSUMED.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed:—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," CARTERET STREET, QUEEN ANNE'S GATE, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,640.

In passing the second reading of the Feminine Suffrage Bill last week by a majority of 163, the House of Commons may be said to have affirmed the principle of Votes for Women. And although this somewhat barren affirmation is as far as matters are likely to get at present, and the walls of Jericho show no promise of falling yet awhile, still the mere fact of so substantial a majority having been obtained even in an academic debate may well have caused a thrill of exultation in those lady stalwarts who have fought so vigorously for The Cause.

As far as I am aware, there are no poets in the ranks of these ladies to sing a triumphal Ode over their initial victory, which is a pity. For surely the theme is worthy the lyre of a Tyrtæus or a Pindar. Perhaps some of my readers who have the divine afflatus may feel inclined to step into the breach and supply the omission.

In that hope, I offer herewith the usual weekly prize of Two Guineas for

THE BEST TRIUMPHAL ODE, IN THE METRE OF BURNS'S "SCOTS WHA HAE WI' WALLACE BLED," CELEBRATING THE RECENT VICTORY OF THE WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE BILL IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

N.B.—No Ode must exceed the number of verses in the original model, viz., six, or four lines each.

All Odes must reach TRUTH office by the first post on Monday August 1.

ENTRE NOUS.

BEFORE all my readers have gone away for their holidays may I make a last appeal to the ladies among them to take a few dolls away with them? I do not mean that the dolls want change of air, but that they want clothes—very badly, in point of fact—and if the holiday season happens to be wet, as seems more than possible—what better way could be found of beguiling the time than dressing dolls for London workhouses and hospitals? The next Truth Toy Show will soon be in sight, and there is an immense amount of work to be done by those ladies who are good enough to undertake it. Dolls in any quantity desired will be forwarded at once to any lady who will kindly send me a postcard specifying her requirements.

While on this subject, may I say a word respecting the Tress Barry Fund? For the benefit of new readers of Truth it should be explained that the purpose of this fund is to perpetuate the gift of a new sixpence to the children in London Poor-law institutions, which was made anonymously for many years every Christmas by the late Sir Francis Tress Barry. As less than 12,000 sixpences suffice for the purpose, the amount required is very small—especially in comparison with the pleasure the fund gives. It would be a great convenience if this money could be subscribed before the time arrives for the more serious business of raising another Toy Fund. I, therefore, venture to ask all those who sympathise with the object of the Tress Barry sixpences to let me have their contributions now, so that this fund may be made up and closed.

The King and Queen are to arrive at Portsmouth Harbour on Friday afternoon from their cruise down Channel in the Royal yacht. Their Majesties will leave the Harbour Station at five o'clock for Victoria. The King and Queen are to pay another visit to Windsor next week, and on Friday night they will leave Euston by special Royal train for Ballater, arriving at Balmoral on Saturday morning for a stay of about two months.

A paragraph went round the Press last week which announced "officially" that no date has yet been fixed for the Coronation. It is difficult to understand why there should be such an attempt to make a mystery about the date of this ceremonial, for it has been privately arranged that the Coronation is to take place next year on June 21 or 22, and the fact might just as well be made known now instead of being kept a quasi-secret until about January next. Ascot Races had been fixed for June 20 and three following days, but the Stewards of the Jockey Club were privately instructed to change the date of the first day of the meeting to June 13, in order that it might not clash with the Coronation. In 1902 the Coronation was originally fixed to take place on the Wednesday in the week after Ascot.

The Government do not see their way to spend any money on the beautification of Buckingham Palace. And up to the present nobody has responded to the suggestion recently made in Truth that the re-fronting of this edifice should be carried out by a national subscription as a memorial to King Edward VII. Under these circumstances it may not be out of place to mention a suggestion made to me the other day by a correspondent—namely, that coastguards should be set to work to whitewash the walls and tar the roof and chimneys. The building would then at least be clean, the cost would not embarrass the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the decorative scheme would have associations which might not be unpleasing to his present Majesty.

A weekly journal states that "no arrangements have been made concerning the future residence of Queen Alexandra," to which it is added that her Majesty herself wishes to live at Kensington Palace when she is in London. This is all nonsense. Queen Alexandra has expressed no such wish, and it has always been settled that in the event of her widowhood Marlborough House would be her residence in London. There is no available accommodation at Kensington Palace, and this is a house which Queen Alexandra has very seldom visited. Marlborough House was the town residence of the Queen Dowager Adelaide from 1837 until her death in 1849.

---

Sir Henry Ewart had an audience of Queen Alexandra on his relinquishing the appointment of Crown Equerry, which he had held for over sixteen years. This post was formerly political, and it was then held by a member of the House of Commons. The office was made a permanent one by Queen Victoria in order to prevent the retirement of Lord Alfred Paget, who had lost his seat for Lichfield. Sir Henry Ewart was for ten years an Equerry-in-Ordinary to Queen Victoria, and previously, for two years, he had been a Groom-in-Waiting.

---

Queen Alexandra has decided to pay a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland at their beautiful seat on the Traun See, in Upper Austria. Queen Alexandra's last visit to the Gmunden district took place during the summer of 1886, when she was the guest of both Queen Marie of Hanover and the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland. Her Majesty's visit will be strictly private, whether she goes to Gmunden before her stay in Denmark or afterwards.

---

The Duke of Connaught has been staying for a few days at Tidworth, where Prince Arthur is now stationed. H.R.H. was the guest of the officers of the Royal Scots Greys during his visit. The Duke and Duchess of Connaught and Princess Patricia are going abroad for a few weeks, and they will not return to England until shortly before their departure for South Africa.

---

Princess Louise Duchess of Argyll has left Kensington Palace for the season, and she will reside during the next month at Kent House, near East Cowes. Princess Louise will spend the autumn at Roseneath.

---

The King and Queen of Denmark have taken up their residence for the summer at the Castle of Charlottenlund, which is about seven miles from Copenhagen. Their Majesties are to spend several weeks during the early part of the autumn at Fredensborg, the Royal domain on the Esrom Sö, which is surrounded by beech forests, in which the Emperor Alexander III. frequently hunted by moonlight during his annual visits to King Christian and Queen Louise. The château of Bernstorff, which is within a few miles of Charlottenlund, is occupied by Prince Waldemar and his family. Bernstorff was the favourite country residence of King Christian.

It has been stated in several of the notices of the late Duc d'Alençon, that his father, the Duc de Nemours, was a suitor for the hand of Queen Victoria, which is utter nonsense and rubbish. How could a Roman Catholic ever have been a suitor for her late Majesty's hand? There was a tale after the death of William the Fourth that Louis Philippe would like one of his sons to marry Queen Victoria, but it was mere gossip, such an alliance being absolutely impossible for religious reasons. Louis Philippe must have been aware that any such project was altogether chimerical, and his son-in-law the King of the Belgians was a most efficient Orleans agent at the Court of St. James's. The Duc de Nemours was on terms of more intimate friendship with Queen Victoria and Prince Albert than any other member of his family, as he had married Princess Victoria of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, who was a first cousin of her late Majesty and the Prince Consort, and she was a great favourite at Court. The Duchesse de Nemours died very suddenly at Bushy Park in 1858.

---

Count Albert Mensdorff has left London for Vienna, and he will be away until the autumn. During his Excellency's absence from England the Austro-Hungarian Embassy is in charge of the Councillor, Count Adam Tarnowski. It is probable that when Count Mensdorff is received by the Emperor, when his Majesty returns to Schönbrunn from Ischl early in September, arrangements will be made as to the representative of the Imperial Court at the Coronation. It is expected that the Archduke Frederick will come to London next June to represent the Emperor Francis Joseph. He is the brother of the Queen-Mother of Spain, and he is the richest member of the Imperial Family, having inherited the bulk of the vast property of his uncle, the Archduke Albert.

Lord Calthorpe, who died on Friday night in his 81st year, took no part in public life, his main interest throughout his life being country pursuits. He farmed on a large scale at Elvetham, his place in Hampshire, where he owned noted herds of Shorthorn cattle and Berkshire pigs, a choice flock of Southdown sheep, and a very good stud of Shire horses. He was an excellent landlord, and very popular among his tenants and neighbours. Lord Calthorpe was ground landlord of the flourishing Edgbaston suburb of Birmingham, and he owned a considerable estate in the district. His gifts to the University of Birmingham were valued at about £40,000. Ampton Park, near Bury St. Edmunds, the former seat of the Calthorpes, which is one of the most beautiful places in Suffolk, was sold many years ago. Mrs. Carlyle described the Ampton gardens as "unequalled since the original Eden."

Mr. Asquith is going to Scotland directly Parliament is up for the recess, and he will spend several weeks at Archerfield House, which is rented by him from Mrs. Hamilton Ogilvy, of Biel.

---

Lord and Lady Londonderry are to arrive next week at Wynyard Park, which place will be their headquarters until after Christmas. There will be a large house party at Wynyard during the third week in August for Stockton races.

---

The Duke and Duchess of Portland are to return at the end of the week to Welbeck Abbey, where they will have a large party for their Tenants' Agricultural Show in Welbeck Park on Monday. They will proceed from Welbeck to Langwell House, their place on the east coast of Caithness, where they are to reside until the middle of October.

---

There is no party this year for Goodwood races at Arundel Castle, and the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk are staying at Filey, where they have taken a house for a month, after which they are going to Kinharvie House, Kirkcudbrightshire, for a few weeks. The Duchess of Norfolk has been a frequent visitor to Filey, as she used to come over often with her sister (now Mrs. Eric Drummond) from Everingham Park, Lord Herries' place near Beverley.

A FRIENDLY HINT.

Your honesty as high I rate
As any Briton's in the land.
But why, Keir Hardie, will you prate
Of what you do not understand?

Not long ago your wondrous lore
Of India's problems made us stare;
You would insist you knew far more
Than men who'd spent their lives out there.

Close students of the grave Hindu
In thirty years don't learn his ways;
A month was quite enough for you;
You sized him up in thirty days.

Now once again your knowledge rare
In unknown fields itself disports;
Imaginative views you air
About the ways of Kings and Courts.

The King your fervid fancy sees
Is nothing but an idle drone,
Who lounges in luxurious ease
And ne'er a good day's work has known.

While minor Royalties, 'tis clear
(You say it, so it must be true),
Are parasites and loafers mere,
With nothing in the world to do.

. . . .

Dear Hardie, just a parting hint,
A friendly, warning little word;
If you'd avoid, in speech or print,
The making of yourself absurd——

Talk Labour! There you carry weight;
But don't yourself in pitfalls land
By ill-advised attempts to prate
Of what you do not understand.

During the debate on the Civil List the contention was once again raised that the estates of the Duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall are the private property of the Sovereign. The origin of these estates in Plantagenet times, the Act of Anne forbidding alienation of Crown property, the frequent intervention of Parliament to regulate these estates, and, perhaps most significant and latest of all, the necessity for Acts of Parliament in the days of George III. and of Victoria to enable those monarchs to hold "private" estates—all these things make it plain that the Duchies are not ordinary private property, but public property appropriated to the use of the occupant of the Throne and the heir apparent.

The temper of the House of Commons has changed, however, since in 1837 Lord Melbourne resisted the motion of Lord Brougham for the production of the accounts of the two Duchies. The Woods and Forests Estate, which is in a similar position, had been surrendered by William IV., and was being again surrendered by Queen Victoria, in consideration of a Civil List; but it was still sought to maintain the secrecy of the management of the Duchies. Lord Brougham withdrew his motion, but since the first year of Queen Victoria's reign the accounts of both Duchies have been submitted to Parliament every year.

---

A most interesting feature in the accounts is the growth of the value of the estates in quite recent times. At Queen Victoria's accession the net income from the Duchy of Lancaster scarcely reached £12,000; at the birth of King Edward VII. that of the Duchy of Cornwall was less than £20,000. Those incomes have now become for 1909 severally £64,000 and £87,000. The Duchy of Lancaster's affairs are managed, of course, by public officials; but all these estates are in the nature of appurtenances to the Crown.

---

Between 10 and 11 p.m. on the 19th instant the House of Commons voted, without debate, £58,391,506 for the use of various Ministers. This was done under the Balfour arrangement—so good for Ministers, so bad for the taxpayer—which allotted twenty days in each session for Supply, and no more. Permanent officials can now juggle the Estimates to any extent by putting forward non-contentious votes in the early days of Supply and keeping back others which would lead to criticism. As the House can no longer perform its primary function of controlling expenditure, it is surely time to hand over the Estimates to a standing finance committee, as is done in every Parliament except our own.

The tariff reform press has been more than usually amusing over the report of the Labour Party's mission to Germany. For months, indeed years, past we have been "fed up" with the fairy tales of deputations of working-men who have been despatched to Germany by tariff reform agencies, and have come back lost in wonder at the happy lot of the German proletarian, his high wages, his sumptuous diet, his luxurious clothing, his spacious house accommodation, his constant employment, and the absence of any parallel to the poverty and hardship everywhere prevalent in this unfortunate land of ours. However, the representatives of English labour having undertaken an investigation on their own account, and reported a very different state of things, it has now been discovered that these trips are worth very little, that the tripper cannot possibly get any insight into the real social conditions of the country he visits, that he only sees what he wants to see or what the organisers of the trip want him to see, and that being unable to speak German he can learn nothing at first hand, except with his eyes.

---

All this is obviously true, but the Labour Party has rendered an invaluable service in getting it admitted. It is only because any rubbish is considered good enough to bolster up the tariff reform cause that the public has been deluged so long with the worthless evidence of working-class trippers to Germany. A few weeks ago one of these "deputations" returned to fool English workmen with its "impressions" of the conditions of labour in Germany after having visited ten German towns in ten days!

---

It is necessary, of course, for the Free Trader to fight the Tariff Reformer on whatever ground the latter may take up; and as long as Germany is paraded as a conclusive example of the blessings of protection too much trouble cannot be taken to show credulous and ignorant English people the other side of the case. But it is a great mistake, from the free trade point of view, to allow this issue to be fought as if the example of Germany were conclusive of the whole question. Why does the Tariff Reformer preach exclusively about Germany when practically the whole of Europe exemplifies the results of protection equally well? Because the case of Germany is the only one on this side of the Atlantic which is of the slightest use to him.

---

I venture to suggest to the Free Trade Union, and all fighting on the same side, that it is high time this exclusive concentration on Germany was stopped. Let us have some evidence and object-lessons from a few of the other Protectionist countries. There is Russia, for example, where the disastrous effects of high tariffs upon the proletariat are perhaps better exemplified than anywhere else in Europe. Without going so far as that, there are plenty of useful lessons to be learned on the other side of the English Channel, and apart from tariffs, the economic conditions of France are much more closely analogous to our own than those of Germany. Italy, again, whose tariffs have meant the utter impoverishment of the South for the sake of the industries of the North, can teach us a great deal worth knowing. It is one of the weakest features in the Tariff Reform case that it refuses to take account of the condition of any Protectionist countries but Germany and the United States. For if the economic results which are attributed to protective tariffs in those two countries are not found in others where the same policy is at work, it follows that the whole argument as to the effect of German and American tariffs is fallacious.

CHURCHILLIANA.

I.—By a County J.P.

Infernal impudence, I say!
What? Give them time their fines to pay
And not commit them straight away
To prison for their crime?
Oh! D—n the interfering prig!
He for his boots is far too big.
Give time? Tut. Here's a pretty rig!
I'd like to give him "time!"

---

Mr. Winston Churchill's speech on prison reform during the debate on the Home Office Vote was of happy augury for the future. It exhibited a wide and large-hearted recognition of the duty of the State to its morally afflicted citizens disfigured by no mawkish sentimentality towards those offenders. In nearly every passage it admitted evils in the present system, which have been continuously pointed out in Truth. Particularly in regard to the imprisonment of the young person, of which of late I have given so many flagrant examples, the Home Secretary spoke with no uncertain voice, and in regard to imprisonment in default of a fine in the case of older offenders he was equally emphatic.

---

One conclusion at which Mr. Churchill has arrived is made especially plain. It is no use trusting to the discretionary power of magistrates either in regard to the imprisonment of youths for trifling offences or as to the time to be allowed for the payment of fines. In regard to both these questions magistrates have been instructed by circulars from the Home Office again and again. But Shallow goes his own way in spite of anything the Home Office may say, and nothing less than a legislative limit to his powers is likely to prove of any effect. This Mr. Churchill promises for the autumn. From other reforms promised it would seem that Mr. Churchill has also managed to sever some of the swathings of red tape which have made of the Home Office the most unprogressive of the Government departments. Completely to unfetter the Home Office would be a greater feat even than teaching a metropolitan magistrate that he is not infallible, and now that he has set his hand to the plough I trust the Home Secretary will not look back.

---

CHURCHILLIANA.

II.—By a Lady of the Period.

Oh, yes! A very smart young man
And quite a first-rate measure;
I cannot but its clauses scan
With true parental pleasure.

"Parental." That's the word; because I first stirred public feeling
By showing up our prison laws
And all their shame revealing.

Aye! Don't forget this fact most plain;
To me alone you've owed it.
If Winston reaps the ripened grain,
'Twas Christabel that sowed it!

---

Mr. Asquith had not much to say to the episcopal deputation which interviewed him about Poor-law Reform, except that the Board of Education had joined hands with the Labour Exchanges over their scheme of "blind alley" rescue. If the scheme is to go through, other Departments will have to come into line with Mr. Buxton's efforts—notably the War Office, which is a very large employer of unskilled boy labour. Why should not old soldiers fill cartridges while the boys are learning trades?

---

By the way, Mr. Runciman should see to it that no poaching is allowed on Board of Trade preserves. According to the Courier the Liverpool Education Committee intend to boycott the Labour Exchanges and set up an employment bureau of their own for boy labour—a very foolish proceeding on the part of the Liverpool people. It is for the Education authorities to train the boys, and for the Labour Exchanges to place them. There should be no break of gauge between adult and juvenile labour, and no duplication of registration, which is a waste of time, work, and money.

---

In this matter, if the Scotsman is correctly informed, the Edinburgh School Board is trying to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds. The Board wants to have a Labour Exchange under its own roof and control, but run by Government officials. In other words, the Edinburgh School Board is to do the piping and the Board of Trade the paying. This is one way of "co-operating," but it strikes me as being too canny for Whitehall.

---

If any of my readers have doubts about the malpractices of the military oligarchy now in power in Turkey, I invite their attention to Mr. J. B. Bourchier's speech at last week's meeting of the Balkan Committee. As Times correspondent in the Balkans Mr. Bourchier must necessarily be pro-Turk in his official communications to the leading journal, but his unmuzzled account of what is now going on in Macedonia shows up the Young Turk in his true colours.

---

CHURCHILLIANA.

III.—By an Old Prison-Hand.

Them concerts and lectures! Confoozle and blame me!
He's kidding, of course, such a story to pitch.
By music and spouting uplift and reclaim me?
Excuse me for larfin'. It's really too rich!

What? Touch in my bosom some fine hidden feelin'
With good "'Ome, sweet 'Ome," and them droring-room songs?
Bah: The one brand of ditty as I finds appealin'
Is the East End 'All brand with its double-ontongs.

Mind! I'm not Winston's pious intentions for stoppin'.
He's welcome to try on the game, if he likes.
But regenerate me with his Wagner and Chopin?
Not much. What do you think?

Yours, W. Sikes.

A great many husbands have been seriously disturbed lately by finding the following circular among their wives' correspondence:—

MADAM,—Having knowledge of your valuable pearls and believing you recognise the risk incurred in habitually wearing them, we take the liberty of informing you that we are prepared to exactly duplicate your jewels with Tecla Pearls, and confidently state that the reproductions will be positively indistinguishable . . .

It certainly does seem rather taking a liberty—the more so if the lady addressed has no pearls so famous that the firm are likely to have the knowledge of them that they lay claim to. There may also be ground for the opinion of various husbands that the communication is an inducement to ladies to dispose of their jewellery surreptitiously and impose upon their families and acquaintances with counterfeits. But no doubt the artificial pearl, like the artificial diamond, supplies a widely felt want in these days of Socialistic Budgets and reduced incomes. I suppose that people who have to pay supertax feel that they really can't afford to wear real jewels, any more than keep up big places in the country and subscribe to hospitals.

In another column I publish a letter in answer to my inquiry about the blackbirds who consume my cherries. The theory that the birds suppose the cherries to be provided for them as a reward for their singing is in the highest degree fanciful, both on the part of my correspondent and that of his clients. I can assure them both that I would sooner give coppers to an organ-grinder. The song of blackbirds, thrushes, or even rooks, like that of human beings, may be very pretty at the right time and place, but becomes an unmitigated nuisance when you are compelled to listen to it against your will, as you so frequently are. In the small hours of the morning it is calculated to awaken the very worst passions in human nature.

---

The opinions of blackbirds about cherries are clearly revealed by their demeanour. They do not think I plant cherry trees out of affection for birds. They are not even Socialists, holding that the kindly fruits of the earth belong to all creatures in common. They consider that my cherries belong, not to me, but to them exclusively. A year or two ago, when they had not been able to remove the whole of the fruit as soon as it was ripe, I stood under a tree while my gardener went up to gather the few cherries that were left. The blackbirds fluttered about, abusing him and swearing at him in precisely the same language that they use to my cat when he is out in search of a hot breakfast or lunch. My man remarked that they would have pecked his eyes out if they had seen the chance, and I have no doubt that they would have attacked him had they been in sufficient numbers. Obviously they regarded him as a thief looting their property.

I am glad, at any rate, to see that the advocatus diaboli does not attempt to deny that blackbirds eat cherries. That being so, he will not convince many people that they do not eat strawberries. The impression that I have derived from the eternal controversy on this subject is that birds vary their diet from time to time according to circumstances, and that people who write books on natural history, or letters to newspapers, denying the predatory habits of this or that bird, generalise too widely from limited evidence or evidence which has passed out of date. The enormous increase of wild birds in England since the Legislature first interfered for their protection is very likely to have compelled them to extend their dietary, so that the present generation will eat what their forefathers turned up their beaks at.

When this subject was under discussion in Truth a year or two ago a friend of mine related an experience which illustrates this point. He had an argument with one of his men as to the benevolent intentions of a flock of starlings who were busy in his wheat-field. The man—an elderly countryman—contended that no starling was ever known to eat grain. My friend fetched his gun, sent a boy into the wheat, and gave the starlings two barrels as they rose. He opened the crops of a dozen or more and found them all full of wheat. He himself, he said, had been brought up in the belief that starlings only ate grubs and insects, and were "the best friends of the farmer." He thought that this was very possibly true at a time when starlings were rare in England by comparison with what they are to-day, but that, having increased ten, fifty, and a hundredfold, they were compelled to try new food, and, having begun by eating corn of necessity, they had acquired a decided taste for it. This sounds plausible enough, and I have no doubt that the same thing is true of a great many birds besides starlings.

The remarkable article in the Quarterly Review on "The Character of Edward VII." is of profound interest. Mr. Arthur Benson is supposed to be the writer. The methods of instruction devised by Queen Victoria and Prince Albert for their eldest son, with the assistance of King Leopold, Baron Stockmar, serious statesmen, and gushing ecclesiastics, were admirably adapted to convert him into an intolerable prig of the Harry Merton order. "Every hour of his time" (until he was past twenty) "was mapped out by his governor and preceptors and submitted for approval." He was never allowed to go out without special permission, and the governor decided by whom he should be accompanied, there being a peremptory order that he was never to be lost sight of. He was not even permitted to choose his own books. This system of high tension and severe restraint did not alter King Edward's original character, for he remained to the end of his life just as Lady Lyttelton described him when he was in his fourth year—"Very intelligent and generous, and good tempered, with a few passions and stampings occasionally." It is impossible to read the Quarterly article without coming to the conclusion that the early death of Prince Albert was a happy thing for himself, for his wife, and for their children. There must have been serious clashings between the Prince and his eldest son, which would have led to much mischievous results, both public and private, and they would have been very painful to all concerned.

The four Gott Folio Shakespeares, which formed part of the library of the late Bishop of Truro, were sold at Sotheby's on Friday for £2,936. Mr. Quaritch had previously offered £3,000 for the lot. These books were valued after the Bishop's death at £7,000, and at the sale at Sotheby's in March, 1908, they were withdrawn at £3,850.

The Thackeray celebration has recalled the story of Monckton Milnes endeavouring in 1848 to obtain for him the appointment of a London police magistrate from Lord John Russell. It was fortunate for Thackeray that the application failed, as if he had received the post he certainly would not have been able to deliver the lectures by which he made the bulk of his fortune, and it is most probable that "Pendennis," "Esmond," and "The Newcomes" would never have been written. In 1845 Dickens applied through a friend for the same post, but Sir James Graham did not encourage the project, and Dickens consoled himself by undertaking the editorship of the Daily News, a position which he resigned very soon after the paper started.

The newly established Readership on Social Anthropology at Oxford has been filled by the appointment of Mr. R. Marett, fellow and tutor of Exeter College, who has acted during the last three years as secretary to the Committee for Anthropology. The electors are the delegates of the Common University Fund, and the stipend is £300 a year. The appointment of Mr. Marett is regarded as a very good one, and it has met with cordial approval from competent judges.

The King has approved of the appointment of the Rev. Dr. Chadwick, vicar of St. Giles', Northampton, to the Crown living of St. Peter's, St. Albans. Dr. Chadwick is a Low Churchman, and the benefice which he vacates is in the gift of the Simeon Trustees.

The Archdeacon of Oxford has presented the Rev. O. S. E. Clarendon, curate of Maidenhead, to the vicarage of Iffley. This benefice is of small value, but it is rendered a most desirable piece of preferment through the beautiful position of the village on the Thames, within two miles of Oxford. The church is small, but it is one of the finest examples in England of Norman architecture, and the west front is widely celebrated. There is a famous yew tree in the churchyard, and the picturesque old vicarage contains some fine panelled rooms and a remarkable buttery hatch.

Chancellor Newbolt is to be the canon in residence and Sunday afternoon preacher at St. Paul's Cathedral during August. Canon Barnett, who has been in residence at Westminster Abbey since the 1st, will continue on duty during next month, but I am sorry to hear that he is unable to preach as usual owing to the delicate state of his health, which causes much anxiety to his friends. Canon Barnett's interesting and original sermons always drew very large and attentive congregations on Sunday afternoons during his month of residence at the Abbey.

The Duke of Rutland has presented the Rev. T. F. P. Rawlins, curate of Grantham under Bishop MacCarthy, to the rectory of Redmile, Leicestershire, which is of the net value of about £300 a year, with house, and vacant by the death of the late incumbent. Redmile is a village within a short distance of Belvoir Castle.

The Dean and Chapter of Durham Cathedral have presented the Rev. Ralph Watson, vicar of Beamish, to the rectory of St. Margaret's, Durham, which is worth about £350 a year, with residence, and vacant by the preferment of Canon Robertson to the important living of South Shields.

What local newspapers call an "unseemly squabble" took place at a meeting of the Llanrwst Board of Guardians last week between two of the members, a rector of the Established Church and a Nonconformist pastor. The bone of contention was whether two old ladies (sisters) should receive outdoor relief or come into the workhouse. The old ladies were like the two parsons, they could not agree. They refused to live together. The Establishment asserted that they ought to be brought into the workhouse, while Nonconformity declared for out-relief and freedom. The board being Welsh, Nonconformity carried the day, though not until its champion had warned his opponent to be careful that he did not find himself in hell one day. If the old ladies are as quarrelsome as the guardians it is evidently in the interests of the peace of the workhouse that they remain outside.

The promoters of the latest Irish Catholic lottery advertise an extraordinary assortment of prizes—ranging in variety and value from a motor car and a pony and phaeton to such things as a sack of flour and a fat sheep—and an imposing array of patrons, headed by the Lord Mayor and the High Sheriff of Dublin. The drawing is to take place at the Mansion House in the presence of these functionaries, but although thus officially countenanced the lottery is none the less a breach of the law. The evidence given before the Select Committee on Lotteries showed that such gambles are really as illegal in Ireland as in England, and the non-enforcement of the law in the case of those organised for ecclesiastical purposes is a gross scandal.

From a letter received the other day I gather that there are certain cripples' homes on the beach at Southend immediately adjoining the gasworks. The writer had a strong opinion that this must be bad for the inmates of the homes, and I should think there can hardly be two opinions about this. One has heard of children afflicted with whooping cough being sent to inhale the atmosphere of gasworks as a remedy for their complaint, but nobody else could possibly derive any benefit from it, and I should think that inhaling it all the year round would counteract any benefit that children would get from the otherwise salubrious breezes of Southend. I don't know whom these homes belong to, but it would be interesting to learn from the managers for what reasons this site was selected.

Brigadier-General Robertson has been appointed commandant of the Staff College, and he will take up this post next Monday. He served in the ranks of the 16th Lancers for ten years, and in 1888 he obtained a commission in the 3rd Dragoon Guards. His remarkable abilities have caused him to be constantly employed on the Staff—both at home and in India—during the last eighteen years.

During the small hours of last Friday morning Mr. Haldane had a bad quarter of an hour with Lord Charles Beresford, who "went" in true quarter-deck fashion for the Committee of Imperial Defence over the Mediterranean command. Mr. Haldane had, and knew that he had, a bad case to defend. If an inspector is wanted to do abroad what Sir John French does at home, well and good; but to jumble up the duties of inspection and command as laid down in the Government Memorandum is to court friction. What makes matters worse is that Sir Archibald Hunter, the Gibraltar Commander-in-Chief, is senior to Sir Ian Hamilton, who is to be his commanding officer. To regularise this extraordinary position Mr. Haldane drags into use paragraph 218 of the King's Regulations, which was never intended to provide for the supersession of one serving Commander-in-Chief by another of junior rank, and won't help to oil the wheels of the Mediterranean coach.

There seems to be some mismanagement, if not hanky panky, about the promotion of R.G.A. non-commissioned officers in the Mediterranean. Take Gibraltar for instance. The Garrison Artillery companies on the Rock are divided into two sections—Northern and Southern. The headquarters and four companies are in the Northern Section, while the remaining three companies are in the Southern. Promotion of sergeants to staff-sergeants' rank goes on one list by seniority throughout the two sections; but below the rank of sergeant promotion goes by sections. When a draft arrives from England the practice is to post the senior sergeants to the Northern Section, which thus gets the benefit of the next steps for staff-sergeants with corresponding runs of promotion through all ranks. This is good for the Northern, but bad for the Southern Section. According to the latest returns seven corporals in the Southern Section have held their present rank since 1904, while they have seen Northern corporals two to three years junior to them pass over their heads.

---

This is wrong. Promotion in all ranks should either go on one list throughout the Artillery at Gibraltar or in all ranks by sections. The first procedure seems the better of the two, but either would be fairer than the present, which opens the door to gerrymandering. With promotion by sections there might be some inequality of service, but this would be due to luck, not tactics. Soldiers take bad luck in good part, but not crooked play.

A correspondent writes:—

The necessity of providing work for the numerous aspirants to the staff now employed at the War Office no doubt accounts for the monthly issue of numerous amendments to all Army Regulations. It seems hardly fair or politic to apply this practice to the Auxiliary Forces. The amendments to the new edition of the Territorial Force Regulations, published in June, already amount to five pages of small print. Can one conceive any business firm altering the regulations for its employees every month? With a little more red tape the Territorial Force will be effectively strangled.

While artillery subalterns are bewailing their poor prospect of rising to higher rank, the lower grade of master gunners are in much the same plight in regard to obtaining the warrant. Until the last few years a third class master gunner could reckon on reaching warrant rank in about six years, and the man who never reached warrant rank at all was quite the exception. Owing to various causes, reductions in armaments and depots, the handing over of foreign stations to colonial forces, etc., the six years have now become nine, and the chance of a man rising above the third class before he is permanently disqualified by the "too old at forty" rule is remote From every point of view this is an unsatisfactory state of things, considering that a master-gunner must have an exemplary character, a first class education certificate, and a high degree of professional efficiency.

---

The natural remedy for this grievance, like most others of the same kind, is to stop the retention of men in the Service when they have made their full pension. On the present establishment of warrant officers there are three with upwards of ten years' service in that rank, no less than nineteen with between eight and ten years, and twenty with from five to eight years—a total of forty-two with over five years' service. Under the King's Regulations applications for the continuance in the Service beyond twenty-one years of warrant officers who have completed five years' service are to be submitted in the first place to the officer in charge of records, which presumably implies that the effect of the retention of such men upon the prospects of their juniors is to be taken into consideration. At any rate, it certainly ought to be. The regulations clearly contemplate five years as the normal maximum to be allowed to a warrant officer, and this limit ought to be rigidly adhered to so long as the extension of it means the exclusion of qualified and deserving men from reaching warrant rank at all.

---

An Indian reader suggests that the Government might give valuable financial assistance to officers in that country at trifling cost to the taxpayer by obtaining for them the privilege of travelling by rail at reduced fares when on leave, and extending this privilege once a year to their wives and families when going to the hills. To English eyes this may look rather like throwing the duty of the Government on to railway companies; but as a matter of fact most of the Indian railways are now in the hands of the Government, and it might well use them for the purpose of giving special travelling facilities to its own servants. Even railway companies have to afford very wide facilities of this kind in all countries but England. The enormous distances of India and the periodical necessity for change of climate make travelling expenses a most serious tax upon officers, especially when they have wives and families.

---

This matter was discussed last year at a railway directors' conference at Simla. It was then proposed by one director, a civilian, that officers should always be allowed to use Form E, which gives the right to a first-class ticket at second-class fare. Another director, who happened to be a retired Service man, objected on the ground that Form E has been habitually abused. This is a trivial objection, for the railway and the military authorities between them can easily make the unauthorised use of the form impossible; and I am told that the abuses referred to have already been stopped by requiring every form to be officially stamped and authenticated.

With reference to what was said in Truth the other day about testimonials in connection with the Army Pageant, Major A. Tudor Craig, Hon. Secretary to the Pageant, writes:—

> I think it is only fair to inform you that, to my knowledge, the only testimonial which has been raised in connection with the Pageant amounted to a little over £5, which was collected by the performers, including the soldiers themselves, in very small amounts, in order to give Mr. Benson some small memento of their appreciation of the courteous way in which he treated them at the Pageant.

Of course no one would grudge Mr. Benson such a presentation. But the correspondent whose suggestion I noticed (and who was certainly not a soldier) spoke of testimonials in the plural, and seemed to labour under a sense of grievance, as though the offerings were given rather grudgingly and of necessity—as is not uncommon with testimonials.

Captain Evan-Thomas, commanding the battleship Bellerophon, has been selected for the command of the Royal Naval College, Dartmouth. Captain Napier, who has been in command of the college during the last three years, succeeds Captain Evan-Thomas in command of the Bellerophon, and he will take up his new appointment on Tuesday, August 16. The report that the Prince of Wales is to leave Dartmouth is incorrect, as it is settled that he will remain at the college until next Easter.

The appointments to the Medical Consultative Board and Examining Board at the Admiralty, on reconstitution, include several names of distinction in civil practice. The president of both boards is the Medical Director-General of the Navy, and the only naval members of the two are Inspector-General Howard Todd and Fleet-Surgeon J. L. Smith. The civil consultants include Sir W. Watson Cheyne, Sir Dyce Duckworth, and Professor W. J. R. Simpson. The civil examiners are Messrs. J. Galloway, M.P., H. D. Rolleston, M.D., G. L. Cheatle, C.B., and A. L. Dunn, M.S. It is to be hoped that the reorganisation of these important boards may lead to sundry necessary reforms.

Apropos of the foregoing, a correspondent calls attention to the continued shortage of naval medical officers. This matter has been more than once noticed in Truth, and would assume serious dimensions in time of war. The authorised establishment is at present short of between sixty and seventy doctors. The committee that sat as long ago as March, 1909, to inquire into the conditions under which medical officers serve, and to suggest means of making the service more attractive, reported more than a year ago. They recommended better pay, quicker promotion, and the redressing of sundry matters of grievance. But there the matter has rested. Such neglect is not at all calculated to simmer down that "seething of discontent" in the branch to which the British Medical Journal recently made reference. Nor is there much promise in the system of probationary service which the Admiralty has lately resorted to, and in regard to which a correspondent offers some observations in another column.

That hardy perennial, "Lessons of the Manœuvres," has flowered again, as usual. Amid much erudite discourse about "objectives," "units," "keeping touch," "crinoline tactics," and the like technicalities I confess that I have been wholly unable to gather what "lessons" the late operations have really taught. So I have sought enlightenment from an officer who took part in those exercises. His conclusions are as follows:—"The chief lessons we have learnt are: the least degree of sleep with which a man can do; the longest period he can stare around a blank horizon without inducing cataract; the average proportion of hairbreadth misses to one bump in the life of a destroyer; the wearisome penalty of wireless telegraphy; the amount of leisure which the Pay, the Padre, and the Doctor find during these strenuous times for the pursuit of bridge; the ingenuity of the mess caterer; the relation between cocktails, dice, and divisions; and the wondrous range of temperament of the average skipper."

A second writer of H.M.S. Cornwall has just been sentenced by court-martial to three months' hard labour for misappropriating cash under circumstances which entitle him to a good deal of sympathy. There seems, indeed, to be quite a little epidemic of money troubles in the Navy just now. I understand that a case has just occurred on board the battleship Hibernia. This time it is a discovery of petty frauds in connection with the payment—or non-payment—of special allowances, such as "double-bottom money." There appears to be need of a more uniform system in this direction, which would have the effect of minimising the chance of "cooking" pay accounts.

I have received several complaints lately of irregularities in the payment of special allowances. No suggestion of fraud has accompanied these complaints, but simply protests against the inconvenience caused by want of uniformity. In some destroyers they pay "hard-laying money" weekly, in others quarterly. A large proportion of the men in these coast-service craft are married. They are frequently transferred amongst the flotillas. To be suddenly docked of his weekly allowance of several shillings and have to wait three months for the back pay may make an uncomfortable difference in the financing of the bluejacket's home.

The Pluviôse catastrophe has excited such a profound impression in France that an elaborate code of regulations has been issued from the Naval Department entirely altering the arrangements for submarine training. These new rules will prevent all chance of collisions, and in drawing them up the safety of human life has been the paramount aim and object. Our own Admiralty had better follow this excellent example.

ROYAL SOCIETY FOR PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS. 6,557 cases in one year. Complaints marked "Private" absolutely confidential.—SECRETARY, 105, Jermyn Street, London.

The "unco' guid" are well represented on the Exmouth bench. Last week an application was to have been made for a licence to hold a sacred concert on a Sunday at the King's Hall in aid of the Provincial Police Orphanage. But before the application could be made the chairman announced that the bench were unanimous in their decision not to permit Sunday concerts, and that the licence would therefore be refused. At least these worthy magistrates might have had the decency to hear the application before coming to a decision.

I have received the following letter from Mr. R. M. Rowe, solicitor, and clerk to the Ilfracombe Urban District Council:—

> Will you be good enough to permit me to refer to the "astounding story" contained in the current issue of your journal relative to the Conference of Urban District Councils, recently held at Ilfracombe. Whilst the proposal came from a person outside the Conference Committee that a sum of £9 1s. 7d., which had been left at the bank since 1901 might be appropriated for the Conference Entertainment Fund, it has not been, nor will it be, acted on. The money remains at the bank, and will not be used by the Conference Committee. There is therefore no money to replace. Having regard to these facts you will, no doubt, see the justness of withdrawing the charge of an "impudent and disgraceful misapplication of trust money."

Mr. Rowe's letter is somewhat puzzling. The sum referred to is the balance of the Patriotic Fund raised at Ilfracombe at the time of the Boer war. Mr. Rowe admits that there was a proposal to appropriate this money for the conference entertainment fund, but says the proposal came from a person outside the committee. The report of the committee meeting in the Ilfracombe Gazette contains no indication that this was the case. It simply states that Mr. Rowe, the hon. secretary to the committee, mentioned that the money was lying in the bank, and that the manager was prepared to hand it over to three responsible persons on receiving an indemnity from them. One member remarked that the money was required for a public purpose; another offered to join in the indemnity; and "it was eventually decided to adopt the suggestion."

If Mr. Rowe—as his letter would seem to imply—only passed on to the committee somebody else's proposal, it is a pity that this was not made clear in the report. But, in any case, did Mr. Rowe express disapproval of the proposal? So far as the report shows, it was adopted without opposition from the hon. secretary or anybody else. I am glad to hear that, after all, the Patriotic Fund balance was not actually drawn upon for the conference entertainments, and to that extent, of course, I withdraw what I said. All the same, the epithets I used seem to be perfectly applicable to the conduct of the committee in having even adopted such a suggestion.

Whether or not my friend Mr. Crippen is ever caught, it is to be hoped that some explanation will be offered of how he ever got away. The Saturday Review seems to suggest that the police should have arrested him. This is unfair to the police. There is no power known to English law—and it is to be hoped there never will be—under which a man can be arrested on a charge of committing a crime before it is known that a crime has been committed. But when the police have grounds for strong suspicion they can keep a man under sufficiently close observation to preclude his slipping through their fingers. In this case Scotland Yard knew, long before Crippen bolted, that his wife had disappeared mysteriously, and they had very good reason to suspect that Crippen knew what had become of her.

The Wigan justices will do well to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest Mr. Churchill's speech on prison reform, for they have been loudly resenting the liberation by the visiting justices of certain of the youths committed by them to Preston Gaol in default of payment of fines. One of the youths so liberated was summoned again last week on a charge of using abusive and obscene language, but failed to put in an appearance, and a warrant was issued for his arrest. There seems to be no doubt that he is a bad lot, and deserving of little sympathy, but that is not the point. It is the futility of sending a youth to prison, the farce of imposing a fine which they very well know he cannot pay, that makes the action of the Wigan justices so short-sighted. Besides, if prison has now lost its terrors for him, who else can be responsible for the fact but the justices themselves?

One of the reasons why business men are so loath to come forward and prosecute swindlers who have defrauded them is demonstrated by the facts of a case which have been brought to my notice recently. One Augustav Krause, alias Arthur Rudolph Lunken, was tried at the London Sessions on June 22 on three charges, viz., for obtaining a van and barrow value £49 from one firm, 400 skins valued at £95 from another, and 24s. from a third by means of a stolen cheque. He was found guilty on the first and third counts, sentence being postponed until the July Sessions, he being admitted to bail. When he came up for sentence the police reported that he was one of a gang of long-firm swindlers, and that they had particulars of other firms who had suffered from his doings. Yet the learned chairman merely bound him over in the sum of £5 to be of good behaviour for twelve months. The firms who prosecuted him find they have to pay about £50 in costs, towards which the County Fund only contributes £4 19s. Such a result is neither likely to act as a deterrent to other swindlers nor as an incentive to business men to prosecute rogues in their own or the public interest.

---

On May 4 last I gave some details of a little passage at arms which had occurred between myself and a mail-order merchant named Highwater, who runs a Highwater Hygienic Institute in Southwark. This worthy, after telling me that my methods savoured "of libel and blackmail," demanded "a removal of the libel from Truth Cautionary List and compensation," failing which he gravely assured me that he "would know what to do." So far from withdrawing the very mild warning that had been given in Truth and the Cautionary List, I repeated it, and I have just learned what Mr. Highwater has done. He has changed the name of his institute to the Neu-Vita Hygienic Institute. This daring act on his part leaves me quite unmoved, and as the Neu-Vita Institute is engaged in selling the "gymnasium for the eye" which used to be the stock-in-trade of the Highwater business, I can only extend my warning to cover the newly named concern.

---

An ingenious little dodge for selling a proprietary preparation has been brought to my notice. A man dropped into a shop in the City and asked for a box of "Silverall." The proprietor did not stock the article, so the customer suggested that it should be procured for him, and he left 2s. deposit and the address of the makers, the Silverall Manufacturing Co., of Avenue Chambers, Bloomsbury Square. The shopkeeper sent to Avenue Chambers for a box of the stuff, for which he was charged 12s. He keeps Silverall now, anyhow, for the customer has not re-appeared, and the Silverall Company refuse to accept the packet back. Twelve shillings is a good price to pay for a packet of plate powder containing an ounce or two at the most, and the price charged is the more extraordinary, since at the Silverall Company's office are showcards announcing that the prices vary from 1s. to 10s. 6d. I can only warn shopkeepers to beware of customers who order packets of "Silverall" and leave cash deposits behind them.

There is always entertainment to be obtained by perusal of the literature of quackery, and the budget provided by John Rhycol Lindsay, otherwise the Rhycol Company, is no exception to the rule. He puffs his wares with such a disinterested air of benevolence that one is almost sorry that one has not catarrh in order that he may cure it. His first letter to the prospective patient begins, "I am glad you have written for particulars of the Rhycol Cure discovered by my doctor and myself," so that he is modest as well as benevolent, since he does not even claim for himself the whole credit of his marvellous discovery. Later he assures you that he has made the price of the treatment as low as possible, as his "doctor friend" and himself are earnestly desirous of benefiting as large a number of sufferers as possible. I should like to meet that doctor friend, in order to ask him how it is that the same treatment will cure hay fever and adenoids, emphysema and tubal deafness, polypus and bad breath. But I fear that the opportunity will never be afforded me. The quack's consulting-room is too often only tenanted by a medical Mrs. Harris.

Just to show what a lot of philanthropic capitalists are anxious to oblige young Army officers with cash, a subaltern forwards a bundle of the circulars which have reached him during the past three months or so. Most of them emanate from old acquaintances such as "J. Jackson," "L. Fortescue, Limited," "R. Coutts," "H. Burton, Limited," "J. King, Limited," "C. Stirling," "A. Brooks," "Mr. Harvey," "Fred Watts," and "H. Lewis;" but I observe two new names or aliases—"George Egerton," 41, Great Russell Street, W.C., and "H. Dawson," 10, Vigo Street, W. Dawson appears to be a particularly persistent pest, and I shall have much pleasure in providing a place for him and "Egerton" too in the next edition of the Truth Cautionary List.

Following the example of three of the above-mentioned touting moneylenders, Sydney Jack Samuel, of Inglewood, Chatsworth Road, Brondesbury, and Graham Samuel, 60, Aberdare Gardens, South Hampstead, have converted themselves into a company under the style of "Charles Stevens and Co.," Empire House, Piccadilly, W. These two Samuels belong to the family of bloodsuckers whose chief business has long been notorious as "Fieldings," and whose branch usury shops are carried on in a variety of different names.

Todd-Potts, Ltt.D. (No. 104, Truth Cautionary List), has recently issued a fresh batch of begging circulars which he sends out with a copy of his book of poems. I do not know which is the worse, Todd-Potts or his poetry, but I am quite sure that 2s. 6d. expended on either of them would be wasted.

Mr. Eustace Smith, of Hendre Hall, Llwyngwril, writes me a long letter of explanation in regard to the comments in Truth last week on the Wake Up England League and the Peace Promoting Society amalgamated with it. My comments were based on the apparent similarity between the methods Mr. Smith adopted in recruiting labourers in these two vineyards, for my attention had first been drawn to the Peace Promoting Society by advertisements offering £3 a week for branch managers who could provide security of £50, and later to Mr. Smith's desire to obtain a premium for a journalistic pupil in connection with a publication of the League. Mr. Smith tells me that when I first referred to the Peace Promoting Society he promptly discontinued the appointment of branch managers, and that in connection with the two societies he has spent a good deal of his own money. Further, he points out that the premium he asks for the proposed pupil is to defray the cost of housing and feeding him during his novitiate, and that it will be more than repaid in the shape of salary. This may be all quite true, and Mr. Smith may be fully convinced that he is able to give good value in return for the premium. But, all the same, to those who are not acquainted with his journalistic career—and I am one of them—this method of providing a staff for a newspaper is not likely to commend itself.

Apropos of what was said in Truth the other day about the advertisements in certain boys' papers, a correspondent expresses himself strongly about the way children are swindled by automatic sweetmeat machines. He has ascertained that a pennyworth of sweets sold in such machines in his neighbourhood represents less than what would be sold for a farthing at a shop. My impression is that children would be as quick as anybody else to discover this. The worst objection to the automatic machine is its occasional habit of taking the customer's money and refusing to deliver anything at all. Adults may find a remedy in such a case, but children can be robbed without protest.

The following communication received the other day by a gentleman who had advertised a house to let in the West End of London is highly instructive. A good deal has been said in Truth at different times respecting this method of disposing of furniture, and there is a paragraph on the subject (No. 708) in the current issue of Truth Cautionary List. It too often happens that the vendor at such sales is a dealer, and that the furniture is by no means precisely what the catalogue and the circumstances of the sale convey to the uninitiated. We must hope that this is not one of those cases, but it is somewhat strange that a private gentleman should hit upon this peculiar mode of disposing of his furniture:—

Sir,—We are requiring a house of this description in South Kensington for a client of ours who, having a large quantity of valuable furniture in store, wishes to rent a house for one month, furnish the premises throughout as a gentleman's residence, and sell it off by auction. We shall be glad if you will inform us at your earliest convenience if you will let this house for the term and purpose mentioned above, and at what rent. We may mention it will be a high-class sale, and our client will give an undertaking that no damage is done to the property, and will, at his own expense, advertise it to be let or sold in three of the leading daily papers, awaiting the favour of an early reply.—We are, yours respectfully,

Hall and May.

Here is another interesting communication, evoked by an advertisement of a house to let. Mr. Rawlins is a stranger to me. I should, therefore, be sorry to think evil of him. But he would do well to understand that by inditing such letters in answer to advertisements he may make himself the object of very unfavourable suspicions. There is quite a large class of artful dodgers who prey upon the unwary by extracting cash remittances on such pretexts as this:—

Tullibardine, Lansdowne Road, Sidcup, Kent.
July 19, 1910.

Dear Madam,—I am seeking for a friend of mine a House in Ramsgate for six weeks and have seen your advt. which seems to me to be what I am looking for. Any house taken by them must first be inspected by me on the following terms. No commission would be payable by you, as my friend would pay same, but I should look to you for my travelling expenses, 3rd Class return. These terms are quite reasonable and fair, and I should like to come down on Saturday, 23rd, and make inspection of same and make my report of same. Please quote rent asked. If you are agreeable to these terms, kindly write me by return, stating where I can meet you and where the house is situated. As I am not making any fee for inspection please send me 10s. 6d. for travelling expenses, which will cover same, and oblige.—Yours faithfully,

C. Rawlins.

My paragraph of June 15 on the Answers fairy tale of employment on the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway has brought me an interesting letter from Vancouver. In default of something better the writer took a job as a labourer on this line. He found the work vastly different from what I fancy the Carmelite scribe painted it. He had to toil ten hours a day, Sunday included, and though the wages were nominally good a big hole was made in them by deductions for food, medical attendance, etc. The free lodging was simply a bracken and hay bed in a tent with no further accommodation. The railway is being carried through the "wet belt," which means that work has been done in the rain nearly every day during the so-called summer. This is bad enough, but nothing to the sufferings of the men in the winter, with the temperature from 20 to 30 below zero, and six or eight feet of snow on the ground. All things considered, I should think that those readers of Answers who swallowed its story must now be precious glad that they were discouraged from going out to this work.

HIDDEN TREASURE.

(When a man of fashion walks down Bond Street, no one would suspect that, beneath the outer layer of black ugliness, there is a wealth of splendour.—Daily Graphic.)

The coat of black
Upon my back,
My "bags" of sombre hue,
With jealous care
Things rich and rare
Conceal from public view;
They give no hint
How bright a tint
Lies closer to my chest—
They quite conceal
My Eau de Nil
Silk pants and undervest.

They also hide
(This is "aside")
A garment—shall I say?
I'll take the blame,
Though 'tis a shame
To give my sex away.
They hide, I said,
A garment, red—
I need it nowadays;
It keeps me warm
And gives me form;
It is—a pair of stays!

MEN, WOMEN, AND POLITICS.

THE first time a proposal was made to give votes to women was either in 1866 or 1867, if I remember rightly. It was moved by John Stuart Mill. After listening to one of the speeches I went into the smoking-room, where I found Mr. John Bright. I asked him how he intended voting, and he said if the Bill contemplated giving votes to all, irrespective of sex, he should vote for it, but that if it only gave votes to a comparatively few women who had the municipal franchise, he thought that he would vote against it, and certainly not for it. We talked the matter over for some time, and Bright seemed to me doubtful of the wisdom of giving any suffrage to women, and much more influenced by his friendship with Mill and others than by any keen sympathy with women's political aspirations. He asked me to find out from Mr. Mill exactly what he proposed. This I did, and when I reported the result to Bright he voted for the motion, as I did myself. I do not remember what were the figures of the division, but I do remember that pretty well all who voted in the aye lobby looked upon the thing as a huge joke. Since then the attempt has been many times renewed. After the first occasion I always voted against woman suffrage myself; but generally each Bill or resolution was talked out. The reason was that a great many members, without having any love for the proposal, had given at their election a vague general pledge to support it, never supposing that any Bill would be passed, and they were all desirous that no vote should be taken. On one Wednesday in the nineties woman suffrage was the second order of the day. The first was the third reading of a Bill respecting the treatment of verminous persons. We spent the time up to close on the end of the sitting in solemnly discussing the latter measure. I think that I contributed about an hour to this interesting discussion.

The constituency which I then had the honour to represent was very advanced in its views. At one of the election meetings some one would move a resolution in favour of woman suffrage. This was usually carried, but I always said that I should stick to my guns and vote against the measure in Parliament. No one seemed to object, and I do not think that I ever lost a vote by the attitude I took up. The numerous members, Liberal and Conservative, who at each election make rash promises to support woman suffrage, in the hope of thereby securing a few votes, would do much better to follow my example. As a rule the working man, according to my experience, does not fancy his wife having a vote. He regards himself as the head of the family, and, as the head, prefers that he alone should vote for it. On one occasion some female suffrage association sent down a dozen skirmishers to Northampton. They took a committee-room, and went about canvassing against me as a hardened sinner. At my open-air meetings one of them would usually try to speak. But no one seemed to want to hear her. I never argued with them. Once or twice I asked the electors present whether they would like their wives to go about the country in this fashion, instead of looking after their babies and cooking their husbands' supper. The effect of this was that when these missionaries interposed, there would be a shout of "Go home and look after your babies!" So indignant were the missionaries that before the day of the election they had shaken the dust of Northampton off their feet and betaken themselves elsewhere.

In the last debate in Parliament Mr. Shackleton used the familiar argument that representation is based on taxation, and that if women are taxed they ought to have votes, and not to be excluded on account of physical disabilities. As a matter of fact, however, the existing franchise does not rest on taxation. If it did a man's votes would have to be proportional to the taxes he paid, much as the shareholders of a company have votes according to the number of their shares. A man has a vote at present as a property owner, householder, or lodger, not as a taxpayer. If he is not a householder and not liable to income tax he need not pay any taxes at all. He can escape the indirect taxes on tobacco, beer, spirits, tea, and other articles by not using these luxuries. Mr. Shackleton himself would abolish indirect taxes, in which case millions of voters would cease to be taxpayers. The seconder of Mr. Shackleton's Bill was a Unionist who is against any sex disqualification. The idea of women ever even wanting to sit in Parliament was, according to him, inconceivable. Why should it be? If women and men voted on the basis of universal suffrage women would be in a majority over men, and what possible ground is there for supposing that they would not wish to sit in Parliament? Give a woman an inch and she would be certain to take an ell, if she could; indeed, she would not be a woman, or would be an exceptionally silly woman, if she did not. Both Mr. Shackleton and his seconder, as well as all the representatives of the doctrine of no sex distinction in the matter of voting, admitted that they voted for the Bill, disapproving of its limitations, and regarding it as "the thin end of the wedge." Their opponents should regard it in the same way. Give a Parliamentary vote to one woman and it would obviously be a gross injustice not to give it to all, as well as utterly illogical to debar them from being elected to Parliament, if the majority in a constituency wished to be represented by a woman.

So far as I can see the great majority of women do not want votes, but if they did their wishes do not affect the masculine objection to granting them. We all know there are some women who seem to be born with the brain machinery of men, just as there are some men who are given the brain machinery of women. But in considering their fitness to share the government of the country with men we must look at the normal characteristics of both sexes. These characteristics have brought about their present relative position, not in politics alone but in all the practical business of life. It is open to women now to displace men in commerce, industry, law, religion, science, literature, and art. No law hinders them. Nevertheless, in all these fields the supremacy of men remains absolute and unchallenged. The woman who here and there excels in what has always hitherto been the province of men is regarded, and rightly so, as a curiosity. When women have shown that they are collectively able to fill the place now monopolised by men in the daily life of the community men will have neither reason nor power to exclude them from a corresponding share in the making of laws, the preservation of order, and all the other functions of government. But so long as the relative position of the sexes in all the affairs of life so clearly proves the limitations of women, men would be mad indeed to confer upon them in affairs of State powers and functions which they have never shown any aptitude for in other matters.

THE EXPORTS OF C. M. MALPASS.

Frequent references have been made in the columns of Truth to the artifices by which worthless advertisements at high prices are obtained from business men by the owners of obscure journals. The gullibility of the business man in this respect is indeed phenomenal. The notorious Jesse Fletcher, of Gentleman's Journal fame, has supplied many flagrant examples of one phase of the business, which is usually carried on well within the law, and not infrequently with the law's assistance. Fletcher, however, as the pages of Truth Cautionary List testify, has by no means a monopoly in this profession. When dealing generally with the question some months ago I especially called attention to the way in which certain "export journals" with a large (bogus) circulation all over the world flourished owing to the fact that their patrons never stopped to ask themselves whether there were any papers printed in foreign languages enjoying a large circulation in England or whether it is any more likely that an English journal should have a large circulation in countries where English is not understood. The name of the proprietor of one such journal, the Export Manufacturers' List, a Charles Septimus Malpass, already appears in Truth Cautionary List, and I have recently received a good deal of information about another member of the Malpass family against whom business men will also do well to be on their guard.

The gentleman in question is a Mr. Clifford Montrose Malpass, who lives at 14, Chantry Road, Sheffield, and from thence carries on business as the Trading Exports Company. The house is a small one of the working-class type in the suburbs of Sheffield, and by no means a likely headquarters for an export business of any magnitude. Mr. Malpass's exports are, however, not of a bulky nature. The goods he trades in are names—the names of manufacturers whom he can induce to pay him ten guineas for their insertion in a publication called the Trading Exports Catalogue. These names he obtains by means of a canvasser, an individual named Roberts, who is his son-in-law. In the ordinary course of procedure Mr. Roberts drops into a manufacturer's premises and in an affable manner explains that he represents a company which has been formed to bring manufacturers at home into direct touch with purchasers abroad, and he produces a book to show how it is done. The book has on its title-page and cover the somewhat cryptic announcement, "Representatives of Foreign Powers, the Trading Exports Company, London and Sheffield," and contains a list of about 1,200 names of firms in all parts of the world. These firms, Roberts explains, are supplied with a catalogue of bonâ-fide manufacturers, and he asks the man he is approaching whether he would not like to be included in the list; if so, perhaps he would not mind signing a document authorising the company to include it. The manufacturer does so, and in due course he receives a proof of the advertisement, and when that has been returned there follows in due course a little bill for £10 10s.

In this way it is brought home to the victim that he has signed a contract for the insertion of a page advertisement in the Trading Exports Catalogue. He naturally feels a doubt about the wisdom of spending ten guineas on an advertisement without having some practical proof that it is likely to produce any result. He delays payment of his account, and, finding that no business has resulted, he ultimately refuses to pay. Malpass takes his usual remedy, and the manufacturer finds himself in the county court. Practically he has no defence. The contract can only be set aside on the ground of fraud. The only possible fraud that he could prove would be that Malpass had not printed and sent out the catalogue to the list of foreign buyers. From the nature of the case such proof would be difficult to obtain, and besides Malpass provides himself with a declaration sworn before the Lord Mayor that the catalogue has been duly printed and posted to the foreign "buyers." Nor is there any reason why he should fail to fulfil his obligations in this particular, for the production of a catalogue of manufacturers for each page of which a sum of ten guineas has been received would show a sufficiently handsome profit after the printer's bill has been paid. There is really nothing for the advertiser to do but to pay up and look pleasant, as the records of the county courts will show. In this respect Clifford Montrose Malpass is more fortunate, or perhaps more clever, than his brother Charles Septimus, who last year failed in an action to recover the cost of an advertisement in the Export Manufacturers' List in the Birmingham County Court, the judge setting aside the contract on the ground of fraud. As I have already pointed out, such a plea stands little chance of being successful in the case of Clifford Montrose Malpass, but that does not alter the fact that an advertisement in the Trading Exports Catalogue is ridiculously over-priced at ten guineas. Business men appear to be very much in need of information and advice in regard to all publications of this class.

A LETTER FOR HAWTHORNE.

A month or so ago some thousands of people in this country were set a-wondering by the receipt of a little buff-coloured booklet amongst their morning correspondence, announcing on its cover its revelation of the "Secret of Solomon." The title was provocative. How could Solomon with so many wives have retained possession of any secret? But when you turned over the pages you soon found that they did not reveal to you any long hidden skeleton in Solomon's cupboard, but proposed to make clear to you the secret of Solomon's riches. You may have thought that it was due to wisdom, or individuality, or any of the natural endowments of brain or brawn which go to the making of the superman, but Mr. Julian Hawthorne knew otherwise. Solomon's success was due to the simple reason that he was a gambler. Perhaps the recipients of the booklet wondered why they had been selected to be the depository of the secret. They wondered still more when a week later Mr. Hawthorne presented them with another booklet, this time entitled "Solomon, Columbus, Rhodes, and Company." Like the first volume it seemed to lead to nowhere. It was packed with crude aphorisms couched in picturesque Yankee phraseology, and if it suggested anything at all it was that the man who neglected his opportunities was a fool. In due course the second was followed by a third booklet, and here at last Mr. Hawthorne gave an inkling of the purpose in his mind when he commenced his bombardment of the British public with his booklets. A fourth was to be added to the successful trio of gamblers, Solomon, Columbus, and Rhodes, in the person of Julian Hawthorne. Solomon had exploited the mines of Ophir. Columbus—Mr. Hawthorne somehow omits to state what special mining proposition Columbus was interested in. Rhodes exploited the Kimberley diamond mines, and Mr. Hawthorne, looking round for a means to join the ranks of the great gamblers, announces that he has found it in the neighbourhood of Welcome Lake and Shining Tree Lake in Northern Ontario. Lucky Mr. Hawthorne! But, unlike many of his countrymen, he does not intend to keep his discovery to himself. Noble-hearted Mr. Hawthorne! He will not even earmark his new mines of Ophir for the benefit of his own country. He has formed a company, modestly capitalised with £3,000,000. He has come to England, opened an office in the City of London, and to all those to whom he has presented his pamphlets he offers one-dollar shares at 2s. each, so that every one may have the opportunity of becoming a little Solomon on his own account. Philanthropic Mr. Hawthorne!

It was, I believe, a near relative of the latest addition to the company of Solomon, Columbus, and Rhodes who drew such a moving picture of the New England custom of enforcing the wearing of the scarlet letter on offenders against the moral laws of the primitive communities of settlers in his native land. The custom has fallen into desuetude. Yet it had certain points to recommend it. There are many persons among us in regard to whom the enforced adornment of a scarlet letter of some kind might have its use. There are the purveyors of that diet known as "flapdoodle," for instance. This is a pabulum specially manufactured in the States for the feeding of fools. If those who distribute this form of sustenance were compelled to wear a badge of their profession I am quite certain it would be for the benefit of the community at large. What particular letter in the alphabet should be chosen for the purpose is not a matter which would present any great difficulty, and I am sure Mr. Hawthorne should be wearing it.

THE VIRTUE OF BEING RICH.

I have spent a little time lately reading up Samuel Butler of "Erewhon" fame, and I was prompted to do so by hearing that there is now a society, or club, which meets yearly to dine in his honour and drink to his memory. I do not suppose many people are really well acquainted with Butler's cynical philosophy, but there is a world of shrewd wisdom and caustic satire in the two books in which he recorded his visits to Erewhon. One of the things that always interested me in these books was the attitude he took with regard to money. If you read the account of the Erewhonian trials you will find a judge, in his summing up, maintaining it as "an axiom of morality that luck is the only fit object of human veneration." Just as these curious people prosecuted as criminals those who were in bad health, so they sturdily maintained "that no man should be allowed to be unlucky to more than a very moderate extent." If you come to think of it, how very right this is. Just as nothing succeeds like success, so no habit is so clinging as ill-success, and therefore ill-luck should be sternly discouraged. The friend we most of us know who is always bemoaning his ill-luck would, had he lived in Erewhon, have been prosecuted and fined, and serve him right. Unluckiness is a dangerous habit which should be taken in hand at once. All that we do in this present illogical age is to express an insincere sympathy and sturdily avoid the sufferer.

With a people taking so strong an attitude about luck it is only natural to find a profound reverence for money. "Money," declared the Erewhonians, "is the symbol of duty; it is the sacrament of having done for mankind that which mankind wanted. Mankind may not be a very good judge, but there is no better." There is, of course, a profound truth here, and when I hear some comfortably-provided-for idiot saying sententiously "money does not make happiness" I always wish he could be forced to find out that lack of money certainly makes unhappiness. In any case, the Erewhonians convinced Samuel Butler that the want of money is the root of all evil—which, of course, is correct.

The Erewhonians indeed carried their principles to a logical length, which must have put curious problems before their Chancellors of the Exchequer. They indulged in no nonsense about taxing the rich for the benefit of the poor. They taxed the poor for their criminal folly in being poor, and to encourage them to be sensible and rich. So strongly did they feel the right of this attitude that we read "if a man has made a fortune of over £20,000 a year they exempt him from all taxation, considering him as a work of art, and too precious to be meddled with; they say, 'How very much he must have done for society before society could have been prevailed upon to give him so much money;' so magnificent an organisation overawes them; they regard it as a thing dropped from heaven." It needs no very clever brain to see how vastly superior this system is to ours, though at the first glance Mr. Lloyd George might turn pale. In Erewhon people would strive to show on their income-tax returns that they were making £20,000 a year instead of owning up to a mere £10,000 or £12,000; while think what a strong inducement it holds out to people to make money! There is something very fascinating about the idea of claiming abatement because of the size of your income, and not because of its puny dimensions.

In all the books where Butler touches on money you will find him equally sound. In his fascinating novel "The Way of all Flesh" he makes his hero learn book-keeping by double entry, and explains that it is "the most necessary branch of any young man's education after reading and writing," and the maudlin sentiment of a wealthy friend of mine who is always moaning over the trials of a large fortune would have got scant sympathy from him. I have known several people who have pathetically deplored their wealth, but I have never yet met one who elected to become "happy and poor." They tell you glibly enough that they were happier when they were poor, but they will not try poverty again as a cure for their present unhappiness. It is quite easy to rid yourself of the curse of too much gold. One of the reasons, therefore, why I admire Butler is for the rational attitude he took up on this all-important question. He saw quite clearly that to be good and happy you must have money and be lucky. Accordingly, as in a well-organised State it is eminently desirable that as many people as possible should be happy and lucky, he wanted severe penalties inflicted on those who were too foolish to acquire the first essential to happiness. How long, I wonder, will it be before our civilisation becomes as rational as that of Erewhon?

"WEARY WILLIES" AT WESTMINSTER.

THE more I see of the Speaker the more I admire him. The Old Hand, who carries his mind back to the days of Gully, and Peel, and even Brand, says that while each of these great and successful Speakers had his distinctive gifts, Mr. Lowther embodies a heart and humour beneath the official robe which render him the most human of autocrats. He administers rebukes with the severest impartiality, and cares nothing for the size of his game. Last Session he declared that "Cabinet Ministers are there to be shot at." Quite recently he rebuked Mr. Churchill for introducing provocative matter in a reply to a question. As lately as last Friday he read the two front benches a lesson for which we of the rank and file cannot be sufficiently grateful. At the introduction of public business Mr. Balfour took the unusual course of complaining that he had been misreported. He had been made to represent that a certain statement was applicable, whereas he had expressly said that it was inapplicable. Mr. Lowther paid grave attention to the grumble, and then observed that if right honourable gentlemen would only take the trouble to address the Chair their remarks would be more easily and correctly heard in the Press Gallery—which, as every visitor to the House knows, is situate just above the Chair. He might have added with equal truth that the convenience would be shared by many of us on the back benches. The general public will hardly credit it, but the style of oratory of the front bencher is often so slipshod that we can scarcely hear what is going on, and when you see "Loud cheers" recorded in the papers it simply means that some of the fellows in front have given tongue and we have followed in a pack. Distressed cries of "Speak up" are frequently addressed to Ministers, with but little result, and it really seems as though they are too languid to take the trouble to make themselves heard.

There were several conspicuous offenders last week besides Mr. Balfour. Tackled by Mr. Burgoyne about the national supply of cordite, Mr. Haldane plunged into an elaborately technical disquisition on the ingredients of high explosives; and how did he carry it out? He spoke in a thin, effortless voice at a prodigious rate, dancing from one involved calculation to another with an agility that would have baffled the ordinary understanding at the best, but which was rendered doubly difficult because many of his words wholly failed to reach us. Then the Prime Minister. Well, when he has an announcement of extra importance to make he plunges his hands into his trousers pockets and simply gabbles. Is this one of the signs of the decadence of the House of Commons? Mr. Gladstone, while most punctilious in addressing the Chair, had only one object of attack, and that was the man opposite. He did not turn his face down to the House, cajoling and reasoning with dubious friends or declared opponents below the gangway. The front bench on the opposite side of the table was his quarry, in accordance with the great traditions; and while his magnificent voice with its Italian style of chest production sent his eloquence ringing to every quarter of the House, he took pains to make his accents travel. Mr. Asquith, as I have said, mutters through half-opened lips, only too often. Mr. Balfour leans on the box and addresses the Serjeant-at-Arms. Mr. Churchill, unless he is specially wound up for the occasion, halts and stumbles, stepping to and fro and clenching his fists in the agony of verbal parturition, and he is physically handicapped by a lisp. As for Mr. Lloyd George, he is incorrigible. He habitually and deliberately turns his back on the Speaker, directing all his remarks to Mr. Barnes and the Labour men, and speaking through clenched teeth in a voice that is by no means naturally strong.

From my scant experience of the House of Lords I do not think things are much better there. Lord Lansdowne is always at pains to speak clearly and distinctly, and Lord Rosebery turns frankly and openly to the public galleries, leaving the Lord Chancellor to pick up as much as he may be able. The Old Hand tells me that the late Lord Salisbury used to adopt the same trick—when he chose. If, as Foreign Secretary, he was asked an inconvenient question, and did not wish his reply to reach the "Chancelleries," he would mumble it across the table for the edification of Lord Granville and to the mystification of the rest of the world, but when he wanted wide currency for his words no man knew better how to raise his head and shout his sentences at the galleries. This procedure involved a certain element of guile which may not have been wholly admirable, but, at any rate, Lord Salisbury, like Todgers, could do it when he chose. The trouble with our present leading men is that they hardly seem to appreciate the importance of the occasion, and that, with the admitted decay of Parliamentary oratory, they are sacrificing ordinary enunciation and the common arts of expression. I am inclined to make two exceptions in this somewhat comprehensive condemnation. Neither Mr. Ure, the Lord Advocate, nor Mr. Bonar Law ever takes a note of the debate, and yet each is able to make a complete reply in the ears of all. The only unfortunate point about it is that nobody except a Scot can understand what Mr. Ure is saying in his native tongue and that Mr. Bonar Law does not seem to count for much.

Characteristically indifferent was the manner in which the Prime Minister disposed of the Conference on Monday afternoon—for the time being. It was understood that he was going to make an announcement. Mr. Asquith's "announcements" are as prolific as General Trochu's "plans" for raising the siege of Paris. Everybody took him seriously, and there was quite a formidable muster of men eager to learn whether the Conference is doing as well as can be expected or whether it has suffered a violent end. By way of friendly encouragement that dauntless trio, Mr. Wedgwood, Mr. Byles, and Mr. King, had questions on the paper directly asking for all the information that the Prime Minister might be in a position to impart. Since the door first closed on the shrouded and mysterious eight negotiators we have been kept consistently in the dark as to what has been going on. Now that we are within a few days of the recess it was only reasonable that something should be revealed, if only to let us know whether we can spend the holidays like rational people or whether we ought to be stirring up the constituencies to a renewal of the conflict. Naturally enough, then, we expected Mr. Asquith to take us into his confidence on Monday, and members hung breathlessly on his words. I regret to have to record that our revered leader ruthlessly and deliberately "spoofed" us. Rising with the utmost gravity he undertook to answer the questions of Messrs. Wedgwood, Byles, and King together, and that looked like business. Imagine our consternation, then, when he casually observed that he hoped "to be able to make a statement on the subject referred to in these questions during the course of this week." I think it is a tribute to the good nature of the House that after the first astonished gasp it broke into a yell of laughter. It says a good deal for the reality of the truce that nobody made the least protest—not even Mr. Wedgwood or Mr. Byles, who are not usually slow in crying out when they are hurt, or even earlier. The Old Hand holds that Mr. Asquith has exactly gauged the instincts of the overwhelming majority. They are all thinking of the holidays, and don't want to be bothered with any wretched constitutional row until the autumn, when if it must come it must. To that extent I suppose we are all as slack as those Ministers and ex-Ministers whose methods in debate I have ventured to deplore.

THE NEW MEMBER.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

A VETERAN AMBASSADOR.

NOTHING is eternal, not even the office of Spanish Ambassador. Señor Leon y Castillo looks a man framed by Nature to get on. He has the kind of physique that carries weight with it and imposes by its magnetism. The robust body goes with mental qualities that easily become "robustious." With this he is, what is rare in Spain, always in action. He owed his great luck, part of which lay in a seat in the Senate, which all those years he cumulated with his embassy, to his quickness in seeing his opportunity. The occasion was a speech in the Cortes of Pi y Margall, who had been President of the Spanish Republic before Castelar. In its course the speaker alluded to the notorious friendships of Alfonso XII. with financists known to rig the Stock Exchange, and went so far as to say his late Majesty reaped golden harvests through their coups de Bourse. Nobody who was at all in the know of the Twelfth Alfonso's private life doubted the truth of the impeachment. Nevertheless it caused a furious uproar on the Conservative side, followed by a deal of talk in the cafés. The next speaker started from the Liberal side, and had been only known as a second or third-class Minister, to whom a portfolio had been given to qualify him, though a youngish politician, for a pension when out of office. He made a speech of the utmost violence, in which he flung to the winds all the courtesies the Dons observe to one another and that Parliamentary combats demand. To his frantic words and gestures, in which he hurled indignation and called for a retraction, Pi y Margall, in his gentlest tone, merely replied, "What is said, is said."

Though the Regent had hardly ever been on the most amiable terms with her late husband, the speech of Leon y Castillo recommended him to her, and she and the Tia Isabel became his firm patronesses. As he did not like to turn his coat, he as soon as he could obtained the Spanish Embassy to the French Republic—the most coveted post at the disposal of the Government—on the fall of the Liberals in 1890, in whose boat he had remained. If (to quote M. Briand in speaking of himself) he is a man of reality he has his principles, and he values in public life the Castilian point of honour. In 1893, when his friends were again in power, he came back a second time as Ambassador, and entrenched himself in the handsome house on the Boulevard de Courcelles that had been bought by the Spanish Government of M. Lambert Sainte Croix. He retained the military attaché, the late Count de Val Carlos, a first cousin of the late King, who was supposed to know "the military ropes" one might say; and with good reason. This nobleman had a secret service allowance of 300 frs. a month from the French War Office. He was on very intimate terms with Baron Fredericks, the Russian military attaché, now Grand Master of the Tsar's Household. The communications which the Count made to General Mercier as coming from the Baron brought about the Dreyfus scandal. It was noticed that the evening entertainments at the Spanish Embassy were limited to the severest months of winter. The reason was the plague of mosquitos in fine weather, due to the pond over the way in the Parc Monceau. These terrible night flies may also account for the anti-Anarchist fever from which the Ambassador chronically suffered at last. He never well understood that the Franco-Russian police combination that helped to bring about the alliance was the nursing mother of bomb-throwing and dynamiting organisations. Without them what would have become of a host of agents provocateurs and informers? It suited some French Cabinets to seem alarmed at these outrages. Without them they could not have given full satisfaction as preservers of order to the Court of Russia, and brought the Chambers to vote laws so bad that directly they were promulgated they became dead letters. This ardour in tracking out Anarchists—Spanish, of course—had one good effect for the Ambassador. It consolidated the favour in which he stood at the Palacio Real. To have filled that envied post for eighteen years is a "record" in the annals of the Spanish Foreign Office. Señor Leon y Castillo has in that post survived the loss of the Spanish colonies under the Christina Regency, but has not seen the motor fever of Alfonso XIII. run its course, inasmuch as H.C.M. intends to motor from Madrid to Vienna to offer congratulations to the Emperor of Austria on his next birthday. The retiring diplomat had a part in making the arrangements of 1904 that led to the Riff War. He received in France an officially converted Princess on her way to Madrid to become the Queen of Spain—another unique fact in Spanish history. With these landmarks in his career he has survived his chiefs, Sagasta, Silviela, Canovas, Villeverda, and escorted to the Escurial from Ormesson and the Palais de Castille, Avenue Kléber, the remains of the King-Grandfather, Don Francisco of Assisi, and of the Queen-Grandmother, Doña Isabella.

In his time also disappeared from the afternoon receptions at the Spanish Embassy the array of Cuban beauties which was one of their most taking features. The Rue de la Paix couturier, when the modes rather hid than showed the natural figure, could not conceal the harmonious flexibility of these creole great-grand-daughters of Spain. Our sculptors attributed in some degree their easy movement and graceful carriage to the lightness of their attire in their tropical homes and also that of their diet. A curious circumstance: the mosquitos of the pond over the way preferred the pure oval cheeks of French ladies to those of the fair Cubans, which resembled in colour and texture the creamy white camellia.

I expect that, so far as he is personally concerned, M. Clemenceau will give the Jaurès Committee a satisfactory account of the part he took in the Rochette affair. From the telegrams he has sent his brothers one can gather a craving desire on the part of the Prefect of Police to be quick about the arrest of Rochette. He could not get M. Monnier, the Procurator, to move otherwise than with cautious deliberation, as we can now gather from that high official's "confrontation" with M. Durand, the secretary of M. Lépine. It does not appear that the latter knew anything of the excellent report M. Monnier had received from a mining expert of considerable standing whom he had secretly sent to Spain to study the capabilities of certain enterprises of Rochette. A young juge d'instruction, M. Berr, without waiting for fresh instructions from his chief, answered to the Lépine whip in time for those Bourse operations which have produced a movement of public disgust. This Bourse side of the affair may have been but a coincidence so far as M. Berr and the Prefect are concerned, and that if so the deductions drawn by M. Jaurès are at fault. It may be also said that M. Lépine, under Article 10 of the Code for Criminal Investigations, has the power to order the arrest of a suspected evil-doer and to keep him as long as he pleases au secret. In defending himself before the Town Council of Paris, M. Lépine justified his action against Rochette precisely on the ground of this power. He now backs somewhat, and declares that the course he took in nowise related to that article of the Code just mentioned. M. Clemenceau in one of his telegrams declares that he told him to follow closely the parquet (Chamber for criminal investigations and prosecutions). Certainly he did not follow M. Monnier, but his secretary, Durand, appears to have drawn on M. Berr behind the back of the Procurator.

The situation of M. Clemenceau on landing at Buenos Ayres had discrepant features too marked not to have been vexatious. The triumphant guest of the Argentine Republic, he was the subject of telegrams from Paris in special editions (extraordinarios) of the papers, dealing only with the Rochette scandal. The less Lepine, Monnier, Berr, and the other actors in the affair were known in Buenos Ayres the more prominence was there given to Clemenceau. Pure Castilian is neither written nor printed there. The population is motley, in haste to make money, and likes journalism that is not too nice in its choice of epithets and is almost crudely sensationalist. The extraordinarios are always sure to answer to their taste. As a delegation of the Senate boarded the steamer that took the French statesman, littérateur, and lecturer from Genoa, the newsvendors followed them up the companion ladder and ran round the deck selling their printed wares. He had come to Argentina quite as much the honoured guest as Mr. Roosevelt had been in the European Courts and capitals that he visited. To a man of his nerves and quick temper the two contrasting features must have been bewildering, grotesque, and exasperating.

I do not see how the Jaurès investigation can come to anything. Parliamentarians have moral courage either in a hubbub in the Chamber or in the "wings," but none in Committee-rooms. For instance, a greater number than voted the confidence M. Briand required in the speech in which he covered the Prefect of Police had been dead against the latter. Nor did the Premier's speech in the least change their opinion. But they had not the courage to vote against him. Besides, they asked each other what the King of Bulgaria would think. He had been quietly lying by at Chantilly, motoring round the Dukeries of the Oise with the Queen, showing her Compiègne and the ancient cathedrals, and taking his meals at the Duc de Chartres'. Then the National Fête was at hand, and the King and Queen of the Belgians were expected to attend it. A Ministerial crisis at such a juncture was at all costs to be avoided, even at the cost of keeping down disgust. A very considerable number felt like breaking bounds; not so much on account of the Bourse bearings of the case, as because they thought the Prime Minister rather sacrificed Clemenceau to save Lépine, and only made believe he defended the former. Briand, I am assured, is afraid to fall out with a prefect of police who has been so long in office, and knows as well how to manipulate the secret police, and the outer scum that hangs on to it, as, say, a Paderewski does the keyboard of his piano. One of the terrible difficulties of the Thiers Administration, and in the eighties the Republican Ministers of the Interior, lay in the power of the Bonapartists in working this grade of policiers.

By his daughter's marriage M. Lépine is connected with a very reactionist Stock Exchange clan, wealthy, and in a narrow way highly respectable. They are Monarchists, and probably prefer Prince Napoleon to the Duc d'Orléans. Surgeon Labbé, the father-in-law of Mlle. Lépine that was, is a senator and member of the Academy of Medicine, and accepts the Republic as the de facto régime as long as it keeps order. The Labbé-Lépine wedding was a grand affair. It took place in the presence of a concourse, to quote the papers, gathered from the élite of the official, scientific, artistic, literary, and fashionable worlds in the Cathedral of Notre Dame. The Archbishop of Paris gave the benediction.

The continued wet and thunderstormy weather prevents any bloom of fashions at roof-restaurants, racecourses, or seaside promenades. The roof-restaurants are only to be found where they can command wide views. By-and-by we shall have them in the Boulevard de Montmorency, which skirts the Bois between Passy and the Point de Jour and the Boulevard de Madrid, uniting St. James and the Porte Maillot, and also looking down on the Bois. In the Belgian week one might see in those which skirt the Place de la Concorde and the Tuileries Gardens diners at little tables in pairs, fours, and sixes, but the latter few. Chili, which plumes itself on being an aristocratic and thickly gilded Republic, sent to this chic dining place a good contingent. A rising rubber king from the Amazon begged a grave maître d'hotel not to trouble himself to choose dishes within the moderate price limit. The lady with him had a pearl necklace which the other feminine diners eyed askance, some admiring and others not too kindly. These roof-restaurants are greatly beflowered. Flowering creepers mantle stacks of chimneys, and jardinières are placed on the chimneys, filled with blooming plants. Not far from the rubber king sat a millionaire son of a former President of Republic with his wife, who is a dramatic star of first magnitude, albeit an eccentric one. She seemed lost in admiration of a poet who sat at the same table as he expressively recited some couplets in a low voice. The poet's wife, still a beautiful person and endowed also with the poetic gift, seemed on thorns from a fear that over-excitement might be injurious to his precarious health. At other tables were stars of the Odéon and Réjane theatres, who stayed in town for the gratis performances of the National Fête, and Réjane herself, fresh from an interview with the manager of L'Ambigu, where she will act a leading part in a drama by H.

R

Bataille in co-operation with Guitry. She dresses quietly off the stage and is unassuming. Then there were (in a corner and half-screened by an orange bush) the Premier with three friends, he undecorated and in the evening suit in which he saw the King and Queen of the Belgians alight from their train at the Bois station and read in the Chamber the decree of prorogation. All the gentlemen were in evening dress, and most of the ladies in fanciful hats, whilst many of them wore over all mantles or long coats in some light and rich material, with frou-froutants collars.

Besides those I have mentioned there were M. Hervieux, Signor Annunzio, and the Cousin of Europe, who married a gambling-house heiress. We call him the Prince of Chios, because the Athenians complain that he has purchased an estate in the Isle of Chios on which he hopes to build a palace. The five-franc silver coin bearing his head and giving him the title of "Protector of Crete" makes him ten years younger.

It was whispered at our table that Annunzio is working at a play which pivots on the marriage of a noble Parisian clubman and a professional beauty no longer young, but immensely wealthy, and desirous of leading a quiet life. It will be realistic, but not a play with a key.

THE NEW PEPYS.

(Extracts from his Diary for 1910.)

July 20: To the meet of the Four-in-Hand Club in Hide Park, where was a good muster of coaches and many smart folks. I admiring most my Lord Ludlow's turn out, and after that my Lord Iveagh's. But for mere horseflesh Mr. Colston's dark browns were the best team, they stepping together with such a nice perfection as was pretty to observe.

Anon to the club and luncht with Admiral Topper, who have a pretty story to tell me of a little nephew of his, whose godfather is a well-known peer-banker, who rolleth in riches. My lord taking out the child to lunch at a publick hostelry, and, seeing his glass empty, askt him if he would chuse another bottle of lemonade. To whom the little fellow, thirsting for the lemonade, yet politely considerate for his entertainer's pocket, replied in his shrill childish voice (so as to be audible throughout the room): "Well, godpa, if you can afford it, I should like one very much."

This same afternoon there befell me a mighty disconcerting adventure. As I passed down the Strand I chanced to want a cigarette, and, seeing a well-favoured wench in a tobacconist's shop, did enter and order a box of the State Express brand. Methought the girl eyed me somewhat askance, but I spoke to her of this unseasonable weather, and, she nothing loath, we converst awhile, till of a sudden she dart from the shop and address a constable on his beat. With whom returning, lo! it appeared that she have mistaken me for this wanted man Crippen, whose picture is in all the papers. The which enraged me beyond endurance, and most of all that one should liken a Pepys to so ill-favoured a wretch. Whereupon I rate the baggage till breath fail me. Nor was I appeased when the constable, grinning like a jackass, take sides with the girl, and aver that I have in truth Crippen his nose. For the which slander I took his number, and promise that my friend the Commissioner shall put the minion his own nose out of joint for him.

I was diverted to see in this day's Sketch portraits of my friend Rostron of Beddington and his fiancée Mistress Dingwall, with the announcement beneath that they were married yesterday. And so they should have been; but the ceremony was deferred at the last moment by reason of the death of the lady's brother. Which did shew, methought, the snares and pitfalls that beset the path of the journalist-prophet.

July 21: We to Holy Trinity Church in Brompton, for the marriage of Beresford Peirse, the parson, with my Lady Lilian Campbell, who is a friend of my wife's. A pretty wedding, and five bridesmaids; which, it seems, is the modish number nowadays; albeit wherefore I know not. My wife in raptures over their dresses, but most of all over the pink roses tucked into their waistbands. And I will wager that one of these days I shall find the wretch herself trickt out in a like manner, she being, in these matters as full of mimicry as any monkey; which, in truth, may be said of all her sex, and do lend some countenance to the Darwinian doctrine.

Afterwards to the reception in Prince's Gate, where I saw my Lord Cawdor, the bride's father; and I likt the way he have his waistcoat cut, and shall order my tailor to build me one of the same pattern. A goodly company present, and among them my Lord Midleton, whom I did use to meet at the common-room of Merton College in Oxford, whereof his Uncle Brodrick was sometime Warden. And this do recall a pretty, true story of what once befell in that college on the occasion of a bump-supper. All the college tipsy and uproarious; so out came Brodrick to restore order. But at sight of the Warden all fled save one, a freshman named Wadsworth, and he, having fallen, was too much overcome of wine to rise. So Brodrick, who had been young himself, did considerately assist him to his feet and did support him, staggering, to his rooms; which was no easy matter; for the Warden was something of a cripple and the freshman mighty sprung. But 'twas at length achieved, and the youth, in the excess of his maudlin gratitude, did fall upon the Warden's neck and kiss him, murmuring the while: "Godblessyou-Brodrick."

July 22: Came my cozen Roger this morning and askt me to write him a letter by the post to-night, alluding to our game of golf at Mitcham, in Surrey, yesterday, when he was motoring through Hertfordshire with Bet. But his lady, he tell me, have become misdoubtful of him; so that is why I am to write this letter, that he may leave it about for her to read, and thereby her suspicions shall be allayed. I misliking the suggestion; for never an I can help it, do I put my pen to a falsehood. Nevertheless, upon the understanding that Roger shall play up to me in like manner if I do ever need his help, I wrote the letter, expatiating with nice circumstance of his sliced drive into the gravel-pitt at the 2nd, and the nine-yard putt he did fluke down for a half on the home-green.

To the club and talkt of Court affairs with Squillinger, who tell me that the King is gaining every day more golden opinions, and quote me the remark of a distinguished friend of his who is attached to a certain Embassy. "I guess," said the Attaché, "that this durned dark hoss of yours is going to turn out a holy flyer."

Anon came up General Wigg, whose lady have gone out of town, and he is for the while a grass-widower. So I am to dine with him at the Ritz, and afterwards to the Empire. Which I did; and the General in mighty high feather and wanted to teach me the Highland Fling on the pavement by Stagg and Mantle's. But, mercifully, albeit with difficulty, I did contrive to dissuade him.

July 23: Came a lad this day with a note awaiting an answer. And it is the bill for Bet's new sables, £156 15s. Which is such an indecent rushing of a man as I can hardly stomach. But as my wife is within, I cannot venture upon any dispute with the messenger, for fear she should overhear it. So I wrote the cheque. Anon come Pinch to me barking and wagging his tail; which in my present humour did exasperate me beyond bearing, and I beat the exuberance out of him with the heel of my slipper.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE All-French Englishwoman, dear Lady Betty, is called at eight by the French maid, who brings her a cup of French coffee and a French roll. Later, arrayed in French underclothing, a French costume, and a French hat, and with French powder upon the face, the lady steps into the French motor-car, drives her elder daughter to the French dancing-master, and the younger to the French singing-mistress, and visits the French dressmaker. At two she has luncheon at a restaurant, eating French dishes cooked by a French chef, and drinking French wine diluted with French aërated water. In the afternoon she attends a meeting to promote the adoption of a system of All-British trading, by which the price of the corn and cattle on her English estate will increase, enabling her to visit the French capital more frequently and to stay longer on the French Riviera.

. . . . . .

The following letter has been addressed to the present writer by "A Canadian":—

"Sir,—

"I hate the man who keeps his praise
For foreign policy and ways,
And shows his wit and lack of sense
At his own countrymen's expense.

"The English have two moods. In private they insist that their fellow-countrymen are 'conservative,' 'dull,' 'narrow-minded,' 'prejudiced,' and little less than impossible; in public it is 'England first and the rest nowhere'!

"In Canada we are not edified by the attitude assumed in England towards Germany. We Canadians are side by side with the most powerful, prosperous, and 'pushing' nation there is, but, confident in ourselves, there is no demand for special preparations or precautions to defend our interests.

"I have been in England three months, and have seen and heard much which is astonishing. The 'upper class' in the country controls most of the machinery of the State through the permanent officials at the great departments and the majority of the London newspapers. The two influences raise a storm whenever there is any attempt to improve the condition of the 'lower class.'

"We have experience of both classes in Canada. The English 'lower-class' emigrant comes to us ill-fed and idle, and our system, generally, develops him into a manly, resourceful, and muscular citizen. It is seldom that it succeeds in improving the 'upper-class' emigrant.

"'We love the Colonies' is a phrase I have heard continually since my arrival in England, but it is only the multitude here that loves the colonists! It is a distressing experience which almost every colonial complains of who visits the Mother Country, that any civility shown to him in the West End is extended obviously as a concession. He is entertained 'officially,' seldom 'socially.' American, French, German, and Russian statesmen or politicians or celebrities who arrive in England are at once welcomed by 'society;' we are only cultivated by the official world."

Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SEATS FOR WOMEN.

Dear Sir,—One of the most common objections to "Votes for Women" is that the enfranchisement of women means, sooner or later, their admission to Parliament and consequently to the Cabinet. I notice that this objection frequently appears in Truth. "Petticoat government" is really what the most strenuous male anti-Suffragists are afraid of.

Speaking as an "Anti" to "Antis," I venture to deprecate this line of argument. I cannot see what objection there is to women sitting in Parliament so long as they are sent there by men. Men return women to county councils and other representative bodies. We allow them to become mayors. We make use of them in all sorts of responsible posts under Government. If a constituency of men chooses to elect a woman to Parliament why should it not do so? A constituency can elect any fool or rogue of the male sex it pleases; so far as I know the only limitation on its freedom of choice in this direction is that the fool must not be a certified lunatic or the rogue a convicted felon. If a woman has sufficient enterprise, talent, and sense to persuade a male constituency to elect her, there is a strong probability that she will be the intellectual superior of many M.P.'s, and that she will prove a useful acquisition to the House of Commons. If she makes such a mark in the House that a Minister entrusted with the formation of a Cabinet desires to include her as a colleague, there is an equal probability that she will be a useful—possibly also an ornamental—member of the Government.

I think you will see my point. A woman who enters the House of Commons or the Cabinet on the present parliamentary franchise will do so as the representative of men and by their express desire. This is a totally different thing from the election of either women or men to Parliament by the votes of women. The latter may mean "petticoat government;" the former bears no relation to it. The fundamental objection to the enfranchisement of women does not apply to it at all. As I have said, I am an anti-Suffragist; but I know a good many women whom I would vote for, if one of them were contesting my constituency, in preference to the gentleman who represents me at present. I am also a democrat; and, as such, I see no reason why I and my fellow electors should not choose a woman to represent us in Parliament if we can find one whom we think fit and worthy to do so.

As conciliation and compromise on constitutional questions are now in the air, might I suggest that we have here a possible basis of accommodation between the political feminists and anti-feminists? Let us give women seats instead of votes. There must be plenty of anti-Suffragists besides myself who will feel the force of what I have said above. On the other side, it strikes me that there must be a good many women who would be better pleased to see a few of their own sex in Parliament—perhaps to go there themselves—than to see the sex generally allowed to vote, but only to vote for men.—Yours faithfully, Senex.

THE ARMY COUNCIL AND THE REGIMENTAL OFFICER.

Sir,—Truth may be unpalatable, but can never be unjust, and therefore I hope you will allow me to traverse the statement of "Acies," in your issue of July 13, that Major-General Ewart "knows nothing of regimental sentiment and usage." Why, Sir, if there is one staff officer in Whitehall who has never forgotten, and never wishes to forget, that he was once a regimental officer, and takes the deepest interest in his own and every other regiment, it is the new A.G. He was adjutant of the Cameron Highlanders, and has written their history. He also, probably, has a more extensive knowledge of the history of every other line regiment than any officer in the Army.

I do not know from what source "Acies" derives his information, but it can hardly be at first hand, for anyone who has had personal intercourse with the General must be aware that the latter is never happier than when recounting regimental stories—generally borne of personal experience, and all instinct with regimental sentiment and usage.

Also, why should "Acies" suppose General Ewart will not attend manœuvres and drills? True, he did not command his regiment, but how many of the War Office staff have done so? Let us be fair and not prejudge a man before he is tried, and who cannot defend himself. What General Ewart does possess is brains above his fellows, common sense, and extraordinary knowledge of men and of the world. If there is an officer more zealous of maintaining intact regimental traditions, I do not know where he is to be found.—I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

E. C.

NAVAL SERVICE ON PROBATION.

Sir,—With reference to your remarks about the elimination of naval cadets after they have been once accepted, I would draw your attention to the same process having lately been applied to the Navy Medical Service.

Under the April Regulations medical men are to be induced to enter for the competition by an easier examination than before, to be appointed only acting-surgeon liable to discharge till they have undergone courses of instruction at a naval hospital and passed a final examination.

This does not seem encouraging to would-be candidates and their parents to spend money and time in the necessary preparation and incur further expense for an outfit.—Your obedient servant, T. B. F.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER AND THE LAW SOCIETY.

Sir,—While solicitors may pardonably feel a little chagrined at the distressing tendency of recent legislation to simplify procedure and reduce costs, it was reserved for the Council of the Law Society, on its own initiative, to thwart these needful innovations, publicly proclaiming its opposition as undertaken with the disinterested object of protecting the client from the blighting encroachments of officialism. Protestations such as these deceived nobody and were taken seriously nowhere. So persistently, however, has it been dinned into members of the Society that its Council has been heroically engaged in stemming a flood of socialistic legislation that by sheer dint of reiteration some of them have now come half to believe the legend, and, among others, your correspondent "Newcastle" appears to be labouring under this amiable delusion. He triumphantly instances land registration "as a measure which the Council can justly take credit to itself for having opposed."

Now the object of the Land Registry Act is to assimilate land to inscribed stock as regards security of title and ease of transfer; to establish once and for all the title of the registered owner of land, and so obviate in every sale or mortgage reinvestigation at huge legal cost of all the prior dealings with the property. By this means the present costly and cumbersome conveyancing system—unexampled in any other civilised country of the world—would gradually be displaced, and it would become as easy to transfer a piece of land as it is now to transfer consols or railway stock, while a solicitor's assistance would rarely, if ever, be required in the transaction. Is it unfair to suppose that it is apprehension of this result which explains the Council's opposition to the Act and its affection for the dear old cumbersome system of conveyancing which the Act attacks? I, too, write as a solicitor of twenty years' standing who has carried through some hundreds of thousands of pounds worth of sales and mortgages; so possibly I am as well qualified to speak on the subject as "Newcastle," a name which leads me to doubt whether the writer has any very practical acquaintance with the working of the Act in the county of London, the area to which it is at present confined.

I doubt, too, whether the Council's opposition to the Budget was as touchingly "altruistic" as "Newcastle" imagines. That body probably succumbed to an unreasoning panic that the new taxes would ruin the licensing and landed interests, sources of large emolument to the legal profession it judged to be in jeopardy.

"Newcastle" must be singularly simple to read an apology in the Chancellor's ironical letter to the president of the Law Society. While courteously disclaiming any invidious personal reflections, he seems to me only to have utilised the occasion of his reply for substantiating his charge up to the hilt.—Your obedient servant, F. O. C.

BIRDS AND FRUIT.

Dear Sir,—On page 145 of yesterday's Truth I am invited to defend certain blackbirds against whom a charge of stealing cherries has been preferred. If my much-maligned clients did as alleged, the act was due to their exceeding courtesy. In the innocence of their hearts they entirely believed that "Complainant" had provided the cherries for them exclusively, as some consideration for service duly rendered in song. They did not like to hurt his feelings by refusing those cherries, although they would have greatly preferred meat diet—known to the vulgar as "grub." "Complainant" does not say that he provided animal food in order to test my clients' predilection in its favour; therefore it must be presumed that he omitted to do so—a most culpable omission; for was he not thereby tempting my guileless clients to take that which was in no sense a forbidden fruit, but one thrust ostentatiously before them? If, then, they did unwittingly take those cherries, I say that the onus rests wholly on "Complainant's" shoulders, inasmuch as the tempter and not the tempted has ever been deemed the actual wrongdoer. . . .

Were it necessary I could furnish a convincing alibi, supported by the strongest of all evidence—that of hostile witnesses. I could bring forward persons of blameless character and superior intelligence—save in the one respect that they harbour an unjust prejudice against my virtuous clients. These persons would testify that my clients could not have taken "Complainant's" cherries at the hour named by him, since they (my clients) were actually "fulfilling an engagement" at the time in an orchard quite 200 miles distant from "Complainant's" garden. But this evidence is superfluous. I submit that my clients are entitled to an acquittal.

As to my other clients, the thrushes, no evidence having been offered against them, they leave the court without a stain on their beaks.—I remain, Dear Sir, yours faithfully, E. G. E.

ROUND THE MARKETS.

Effect of the North-Eastern Strike—Continental Trouble Reappears—Home Railway Disappointment—American Rails and Canadians.

To say the least, the stock markets last week were very disappointing, for nearly all the favourable points were negatived almost as soon as they showed themselves. Principal in the events of the week must be placed the North-Eastern Railway strike and a renewal of liquidation from the Continent, but the Grand Trunk strike, unfavourable Canadian crop reports, and a fall in Americans and Canadian Pacifics all added their quotas to bring about the depression which prevailed. Home Rails were the greatest disappointment, because the hopes that the dividends would stimulate the market were dashed by the sudden development of the North-Eastern labour trouble. The North-Eastern Company has certainly been the bête noire of the Home Railway market, for within about an hour of the settlement of the labour dispute the company caused another set-back by declaring a disappointing dividend, and undid what good work had been accomplished by the strike settlement. The Continental trouble broke out afresh, this time in Vienna, and involved Canadian Pacifics and Americans, which already had quite enough to bear. Foreign Government stocks were not much affected, and a good feature in this department was the strength of copper shares, on the hopes entertained of a successful outcome of the negotiations for restricting output. The possibility of curtailment was certainly worked for all it was worth, and as an additional bait it was asserted that a large quantity of the metal has been sold for export. I should like to know, however, whether these exports are being made by speculators or on account of real consumers before placing too much reliance in them. The reduction in the National Lead Company's dividend and unfavourable reports regarding the steel industry in the States are not matters to restore confidence in the outlook for the metal trades on the other side, and shipments of copper abroad by speculators is not an unknown device for making the statistical position look better.

Gilt-edged stocks have suffered from neglect, although the monetary position gives no cause for uneasiness. In the foreign market, apart from heaviness created by the Continental trouble, Honduras bonds went back sharply on the calling of a meeting by the Council of Foreign Bondholders to consider a proposal of Messrs. Morgan's to extend the time for the proposed settlement of the debt for six months. As the negotiations are between the United States and Honduras Governments, and cannot be concluded by August 5, the original date fixed, the bondholders had better agree to the extension. Colombian bonds have also declined, owing to the coupon still being in default. This Government is in the ludicrous position of being unable to raise £10,000. In justice to Colombia, however, it must be said that she has tried hard to get the money to pay her bondholders, which is more than can be said of the other Central American defaulting States. American Rails finished the week in a depressed condition. On the face of it the monetary position in New York would appear satisfactory, the Bank statement showing surplus reserves of $40,317,500, but the position of the country banks, particularly out West, where there is a much over-extended loan account, is far from reassuring, and may lead to difficulties later on. A drop of about 7 points in Canadian Pacifics, in which the Continent is interested, was a nasty jar, while the actual occurrence of the threatened Grand Trunk strike naturally depressed Trunk stock. There appears reason to hope, however, that the strike will soon end, while as crop reports have been somewhat conflicting the troubles in that direction may possibly prove to have been over-estimated. But as the uncertainty still exists, the immediate outlook for Trunks continues obscure. A disappointing traffic return caused some weak holders of Mexican Rails to take fright, but Argentine Rails generally held up well against the surrounding depression.

RAILWAYS.

North-Eastern's Unsatisfactory Dividend—Good Great Eastern Results—Metropolitan's Long-distance Traffic.

That the North-Eastern strike should have come just as the Home Railway dividend declaration season was getting into full swing was particularly unfortunate, but that the North-Eastern dividend should be such a disappointment was doubly disastrous. The fact that the dividend was unaltered at 5 per cent., and that the carry-forward was only £5,000 higher, at £85,500, of course, gave rise to questions as to what had become of the company's published traffic increase of £122,000. The suggestion is that the directors have made provision for contingencies arising out of the strike, and it is to be hoped that this is a solution of the problem. Otherwise the Home Railway market will receive rather a blow. So far the Great Eastern have carried off the palm, although the other dividends and announcements have been satisfactory and up to expectations. The Great Eastern could have paid 2 per cent. instead of the 1¾ per cent. declared had not the directors decided to raise the appropriation for Contingency Fund from £7,000 to £30,000, and still carry forward £20,000, or slightly more than a year ago. Working expenses were kept well in hand and increased by only £28,600, although gross traffic expanded by £90,700. A satisfactory point is that the policy of reducing suburban fares and season ticket rates and improving the train service has resulted in the company regaining much of the traffic lost some time ago owing to tramway competition.

The surplus divisible between the South-Eastern and the Chatham companies works out at £686,400, as compared with £618,200. Gross receipts increased by £82,300, of which £66,600 was retained as extra net profit, working expenses having increased by only £15,700. Cost of locomotive fuel was practically unaltered, and there was a total reduction under the head of locomotive power of £10,500 owing to a decrease in the cost of repairs and renewals. The principal increases in expenses were in maintenance of way and in the carriage and wagon department. Outer suburban, long-distance, and seaside and Continental traffics advanced, but in the Metropolitan district competition of electric trains continued to exercise a bad effect. As a result of the improved balance South-Eastern Ordinary receives 1 per cent. as compared with ½ per cent., while the company carries forward £20,400 as against £9,200. The Chatham Company pays 1½ per cent. on the Arbitration Preference, as against 1 per cent., and carries forward £4,700, or £700 more than a year ago. Good progress is reported by the Metropolitan Railway in its longer-distance traffic. This traffic must play an important part in the company's future, for its purely London traffic is threatened by the proposals of tramway extensions from Cricklewood to the Marble Arch and Marylebone Road to Finchley, while exhibition traffics cannot always be relied upon. Gross traffic increased by £12,000, but working expenses advanced by only £800. The dividend is raised from ¾ per cent. to 1¼ per cent., while £10,000 is appropriated for the electrical renewal fund, as against £5,000, and £6,000 is carried forward, as compared with £3,900.

The Great Central, which pays the full rate on the 1881 Preference, as compared with full on the 1879 Preference a year ago, could have paid something on the 1889, the carry-forward being £16,600, as against £4,500. The Tilbury line pays 4 per cent., against 3 per cent., and carries £2,200 forward, as against £2,900. The Central London distribution remains at 3 per cent., and the carry-forward is £40,000, as against £39,100. The Brighton Company pays 3 per cent. on the Ordinary, as against 2¾ per cent., and the carry-forward is £25,500, as compared with £21,900; while the Lancashire and Yorkshire distribution is raised from 3½ per cent. to 3¾ per cent., and the carry-forward maintained at £23,000.

RUBBER.

The Reaction After the Boom—A Six Months' Comparison—Good Shares at Bargain Prices.

The satisfactory conclusion last week of special settlements in the shares of a further batch of twenty-two rubber companies nearly finishes the long array of heavy settlements which have steadily drawn money away from the old securities and given considerable anxiety to arrange. The technical position is now sound and healthy, and but for the weakness of the general position of the Stock Exchange the rubber market should be ready for a brisk and improving autumn campaign. The political sky is serene, money is cheap, and the trading outlook is remarkably promising. Investors have made a great deal of money out of rubber, and they are not likely to leave for very long a market in which they have done so well, and are likely to do even better. Let it be clearly understood that the splendid returns of the producing companies and the huge dividends paid this year were provided by sales of rubber averaging 4s. 8¼d. per lb. in 1908 and 6s. 8¾d. last year. As I stated last week, the average price for the first half of 1910 is 9s. 8¼d. per lb., and as none of the producing companies have gone back in their returns the profits divisible next year must be in proportion. These are facts which cannot be controverted or hidden, and with companies like Straits Bertam selling forward at 11s.

The Most Complete List of Rubber and Oil Share Quotations will be found in every Saturday's issue of "The Financial Times." 1d. daily. On sale everywhere.

per lb. for the whole of 1911, I cannot for the life of me understand the cowardly pessimistic feeling of home investors as to the immediate outlook of this industry.

Ignoring for the moment the highest prices which were achieved recently (and judging by the forward sales are likely to be again surpassed within the next six months), it will be seen from the short list which I give below that there are few investors who, having held their shares for the brief space of six months, are not at the present moment in the happy position of having at least doubled their capital; while those who acquired their holdings in 1908, even at the highest prices of that year, can now convert their shares into cash with a profit varying from about 200 per cent. in the case of Anglo-Malay and Bukit Rajah to over 1,000 per cent. in the case of Malacca.

We have had booms before in other markets, and those who tell us that the rubber boom has "collapsed," although the industry is doing better than ever and the price of the commodity itself is still 50 per cent. above the average of 1909, might well be asked whether they remember in any other market a case in which quotations after the cessation of exceptional activity could compare so well on a six months' comparison. Never before, indeed, has a boom been founded upon so solid a basis, and there are good and sufficient reasons for believing that, so far as the sounder shares are concerned, the boom merely anticipated prices by a few months, and raised them to a level which would have been steadily reached in the ordinary course of events, although at a slower rate of appreciation. The reaction which inevitably follows a boom has now reduced prices in many cases to a lower level than that at which they would have stood had there been no boom, and shares in some of the soundest and well-established companies are now obtainable at bargain prices of seven or eight years' purchase, taking rubber as falling to 2s. per lb. in three years' time.

The Limited Liability Acts, which have done so much in recent years to popularise investment in the home country, have, as many of us believe, had the effect of persuading investors in commercial and industrial concerns to accept in return for dividends of 5 and 6 per cent. those usual trade risks which were formerly run by members of private partnerships for much greater expectations of profit. There are held by investors to-day many industrial shares which I would not care to buy even at 20 to 30 per cent. below existing quotations. The rubber investor, as I showed by tables in the last issues of Truth, takes no more than ordinary commercial risk. He has an appreciating estate, with trees which increase in value as they become older; there are usually no loans or debentures to lessen the security of the ordinary shares; and there is no call for expensive plant and machinery subject to that heavy and never-ending depreciation which vexes and annoys the ordinary shareholder. And yet rubber shares of the best concerns, managed by clever, honourable, and experienced men, are obtainable on a seven years' purchase basis, while the shareholder in many other commercial ventures counts himself fortunate if he pays no more than fourteen years' purchase! Rubber companies, too, have a pleasing practice of promising 10 per cent. and paying 20; of producing also yields of 50 per cent. to 80 per cent. in excess of managerial estimates; while too frequently the shareholder in ordinary industrials finds his expected 6 or 7 per cent. reduced to 2 or 3 per cent.

Tea-cum-Rubber Companies—The Grand Central Combine—Firmness of Madagascars.

The attention of Eastern planters has of late been devoted so enthusiastically to rubber that little extension has been made of tea-bearing lands. Indeed, on not a few estates rubber is rapidly supplanting tea, and there is a possibility of a great rise in tea prices from this restriction of planting. The demand for tea at home and abroad is increasing, and the quiet rise in this commodity which has come to my notice of late may continue at a more rapid pace. Rubber investors who care to have two strings to their bow may at this time profitably invest in concerns which grow both tea and rubber in order to hedge against a fall in rubber by the almost certain rise in the price of tea. The immediate future of both is, in my opinion, very attractive from an investment point of view, and the present apathetic condition of affairs in the money market gives investors a favourable opportunity for picking up cheap stock. Ceylon Tea Plantations is one of the best of this group, having paid regular dividends of 15 per cent. for twenty-one years, 20 per cent. for 1908, and 30 per cent. last year. There are several other tea-cum-rubbers, such as Beverley, P.P.K., and General Ceylons, which have already been described in these columns, and a new concern, the Grand Central, will make its appearance this week with a capital of £1,500,000 to amalgamate some of the best estates in Ceylon. One of the cheapest of this group is the Northumberland Tea and Rubber, which owns 1,780 acres of tea and rubber lands in one of the best districts of Ceylon, of which 839 acres are under tea, from which a crop of at least 500 lbs. per acre was confidently estimated. A cable just published indicates that a larger yield is being secured; and the census of rubber trees made since the flotation of the company shows that there are 2,000 Para rubber trees in excess of the 50,000 given in the prospectus. Many of the trees are 54 ins. in girth, and should give substantial yields this year. The 2s. shares, which are quoted for special settlement at only 9d. premium, appear therefore more promising than any of the tea-rubber group; and if tea continues to rise the confidence which Ceylon planters possess in their own properties may be fully justified.

The firmness of Madagascars in the wild-vine group has been a feature of the week, but many readers who have written do not seem to understand that the preference, after their initial bonus of 100 per cent., will be entitled to a preference dividend of 20 per cent. before the ordinary participate. Then after the ordinary receive 5 per cent. in any year both classes of shares divide any remainder on equal terms.

There are no important special settlements now outstanding in this market, and there should therefore be no heavy sales. A substantial bear account has been built up in the leading shares, such as Vallambrosa, Linggi, Malacca, and Highlands. If investors demand immediate delivery of their purchases we should witness a smart recovery in these shares and the whole market, for a new batch of quarterly dividends falls to be declared during the next two months. As these will be paid from profits secured since January, when rubber reached its zenith, shareholders may expect some agreeable disbursements.

MINES.

Markets Still Unsettled—More Continental Liquidation and "Wreckage" Sales—Central Mining Results—Willoughby's.

A few weeks ago in my notes under this heading the opinion was expressed that a sustained recovery at an early date was doubtful, because of the likelihood of some of the "wreckage" coming out directly there was a moderate rally. Subsequent events have confirmed that view, a relapse having followed upon a partial recovery in prices. The mining markets are dependent in no small degree upon other sections just now. Operators who were interested in American rails and mines have had to sell the latter to finance the former.

and the rubber and oil special settlements have also led to some realising of mining scrip. As prices dwindled other bulls of mining shares have thought it advisable, or have been obliged, to reduce their commitments, and in the aggregate a large amount of stock has come on the market. Of course, the liquidation must come to an end some time, and although the immediate outlook does not appear bright, there is an idea that as the end of the holiday season draws near—at the end of August or the beginning of September—business conditions in the mining markets will improve, providing important fresh outside influences of an adverse character do not develop meanwhile.

The Central Mining and Investment Corporation, the big mining finance concern closely associated with Messrs. Wernher, Beit, is not able to present quite so satisfactory a profit statement for 1909-10 as for the previous financial period, but there is no falling off in the dividend rate. For 1908-9 a profit of £553,500 was realised; for 1909-10 the earnings were £418,100. The dividend of 10s. per share just declared brings the return for the last twelve months up to £1 per share, the same as for the preceding year. There is no allocation this time to reserve, but the carry-forward is increased from £93,300 to £159,000. The statement of assets on comparison with that issued twelve months ago shows that the corporation has increased its interest in gold shares, but its first-class securities and cash assets have shrunk by a million sterling. On the other hand, the corporation has strengthened its position by further repayments of debentures; the final balance of the bonds were due to be redeemed on the 1st inst. In future, therefore, the shares will rank for the whole of the profits, and unless the earnings shrink considerably there should be no difficulty in maintaining the annual dividend at £1 per share, which requires a sum of £300,000. This rate is equivalent to a yield of 6 per cent. on the current market price of £16 for the £12 share. As I commented a year ago when discussing the corporation's position, this is none too high a yield for shares of the class of Central Minings, "which, however, always tend to rise in a buoyant Kaffir market, owing to the liking for them displayed by French operators." The present quotation is practically the lowest of the year, and compares with the high level of nearly 18½ touched during 1909.

Hopes were entertained in some quarters that at the annual meeting, held last week, the directors of Willoughby's Consolidated would see their way to declare a dividend on account of the current financial year. The chairman, however, intimated that the shareholders must still exercise patience, because of the largely increased capital outlay required in connection with three of the company's properties. It is certainly about time the Willoughby's rewarded its shareholders for their patience, the concern having been in existence since 1894; but, of course, now that the company is in funds it is just as well to pursue a cautious policy. It is so far satisfactory to learn that during the last six months the company has made a profit of over £50,000—as compared with £26,000 for the whole of 1909—thanks no doubt to the Rhodesian boom; but the share capital of the concern is heavy, in addition to which there are debentures outstanding, and to pay anything like a substantial dividend would require a larger sum than this. The boom is no longer with us, and it remains, of course, to be seen whether the increased scale of earnings will be maintained under comparatively quiet market conditions. Willoughby's (which are 10s. shares) were up to nearly 25s. a few months ago during the Rhodesian activity, but are now back to 13s. 6d. On the strength of the profits made this year and of the recent developments in the company's three mines, the Queen's, Eiffel Blue, and Eileen Alannah, the shares are being talked up again in certain quarters. It is not unlikely that they may have some recovery when markets get over the effect of the heavy liquidation that has been going on of late, but a purchaser should regard the deal as an absolute speculation, and should not hold on too long.

Randfontein Directors' Discovery.

The directors of the Randfontein Estates Gold Mining Company, of which Sir Joseph Robinson is at the head, have discovered "a prearranged and determined 'bear' attack" on their properties, and have published a lengthy statement with the object of spoiling the game of the ursine fraternity. I recently read some correspondence in the financial Press on the subject of the Randfontein Estates, which indicated that some shareholders were getting tired of waiting for the cash dividend stage to be reached, but it never occurred to me that these letters constituted "a pre-arranged and determined 'bear' attack," and it would be interesting to learn how the directors found out all about it. "How is it possible," the directors ask in course of the lengthy statement they have just published, "that dividends can be expected from the Randfontein Estates before it has its subsidiaries fully developed and in working order?" Some companies, I believe, have reached the dividend stage before all their subsidiaries have been fully developed. Apparently this policy is one which does not find favour in the eyes of the Randfontein directors, but even to assist in scotching the alleged "bear" raid they do not condescend to make a definite statement as to when shareholders may expect the stage of regular dividends to be reached. However, shareholders are given a tip "from the inside," as they say in the market:—

> Within a few months the Randfontein Central Gold Mining Company, Limited's great battery will be at work, and it is well known that the shares in the parent company will then increase in value, and it must be patent to every right-minded person that the correspondence referred to is nothing less than a "bear" movement with a view to depress the value of the shareholdings belonging to the shareholders and the Randfontein Estates Gold Mining Company, Limited.

Although I cannot congratulate the Randfontein directors upon having taken criticism in a calm and dignified manner, and would venture to remind them of the saying "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick," I am inclined to agree with their suggestion that the shares are likely to appreciate in value in the not far distant future. Obviously the stage of regular dividends must be nearer than it was, and sooner or later shareholders should reap the reward of their patience, as the prospects of the subsidiaries appear promising.

Two Disappointing Westralians—The Associated and Golden Horseshoe Announcements.

It is not often nowadays that the Westralian market comes in for much attention, but announcements made by the directors of two of the well-known Kalgoorlie mines during the past week have caused something of a sensation. The Associated's manager has cabled withdrawing the estimate of the ore reserves given in his annual report just before its issue to the shareholders, and the Golden Horseshoe directors have decided to pass the dividend due to be declared this month.

When the Associated output fell last December to about £15,000, which compared with a previous average of nearly £21,000, the official explanation from the mine was that one of the important stopes was flooded and in another a fall of rock necessitated a temporary suspension of work. One of the directors visited the property in the early part of this year, and he formed the opinion that the difficulty was only temporary, but the expectation of a recovery in the returns has not yet been realised, the June output being £14,500, which is only about equal to working costs and development expenditure. In his annual report the manager gave his estimate of ore developed as 553,000 tons, of an extractable value of 27s. 4d. per ton. This was bad enough, the previous estimate having put the value of the ore reserves at nearly £2 per ton, but subsequently the manager by cable withdrew altogether his estimate. His cable contained the following:—

> The average assay this month (June) to date of ore sent to the mill is 6 dwts. (say 24s.) per ton of 2,000 lbs. In several places back of the stope assay results altogether unsatisfactory. The present condition of affairs is very discouraging. Judging from past experience improvement may be expected. Cannot form any reliable estimate as to ore in sight.

Twelve months ago it appeared from the manager's report that there was sufficient ore actually developed in the mine to keep the mill going for from three to four years at a moderate rate of profit. Already, however, profits have fallen almost to vanishing point, allowing for development expenditure, and the future is doubtful. The company's consulting engineer has been sent out to the mine to investigate the position, and shareholders are doubtless anxiously awaiting his report. Meanwhile they may be able to derive some comfort from the fact that the company has in first-class securities reserves of over £140,000. This sum is equal to nearly 6s. per share, so that the present market price (10s.) allows about 4s. per share for anything further that may be got out of the mine. "While there's life there's hope," and although the Associated is not the mine it was some years ago, I do not think it will be cleaned out just yet. At any rate, if I were a holder of the shares I should be inclined to cling on rather than sell now they have come down to half a sovereign. This time last year they were 25s., and it may be remembered that in my notes then I indicated that they were over rather than under valued.

Apparently the Golden Horseshoe has been suffering from trouble of a nature very similar to that of the Associated. Returns have fallen considerably in this case, and although the manager gave the assurance that the decrease would soon be made up, the June return actually showed a loss, and the directors have to pass the July dividend. For each of the past two years the company has distributed 16s. per share, and an interim dividend of 5s. per share was declared last March. This dividend, by the way, absorbed three times the amount of the net profit earned during the period on account of which the distribution was made. The announcement of the passing of the July dividend has been followed by a cable from the manager giving a fresh ore reserves estimate. At June 30 he calculated the ore developed at 903,592 tons, containing 466,363 fine ounces, or an average of 10.3 dwts. This estimate shows a drop of 168,000 tons in quantity and nearly 1 dwt. in value as compared with the end-December estimate, but the manager contends that the latest figures confirm his previous calculation, "after making reasonable allowance for some stopes, the grade of which was not up to my expectations, and slide zones." This is his way of saying that he made a mistake when he wrote in the last report that the December estimate was compiled on a conservative basis! In fairness to the manager it must be admitted that it is not as easy as falling off a log to form a reliable estimate of ore reserves, but in fairness to the shareholders, whose servant he is, he should have informed them earlier of the difficulties he was experiencing. Even now the big falling off in the returns is not adequately explained. A decline of a pennyweight in the average of the ore reserves does not account for monthly profits of over £20,000 gradually evaporating. It is to be hoped that the promised "special report by next mail" will be explicit, and clear up the position once and for all.

INDUSTRIALS.

Fall in Canadian Land Shares—An Egyptian Revival—Anglo-American Telegraph Receipts.

Canadian land shares developed decided weakness during the past week. The crop reports from Canada, although somewhat conflicting, have on the whole given the impression that all is not well in the Dominion, and that the high hopes held of good crops are likely to be dashed. The weakness of Canadian Pacifics was also reflected in the land shares. Hudson's Bays led the fall. Against the weakness of Canadian land shares there can be set a slight revival in Egyptian shares. Unfortunately, however, owing to the depression of other sections this market could not make much headway, but the position is certainly hopeful.

Oil shares as a whole have not shown much life, and the tone of the market has not been very satisfactory. Shells set a poor lead owing to Continental sales, and dropped below the £5 mark. Lobitos, however, showed resistance, buying in connection with recent discoveries of oil at depth sustaining the price. Mr. C. A. Moreing had something interesting to say at the Maikop Pipe Line meeting. He had found on his visit to the Maikop field that there was no difficulty in laying the pipe-line, which should be completed by the end of the rainy season. Mr. Tweedy cabled that the weather was favourable, and that the pipe-line from the oil fields to Enem would be completed by November. The Maikop group as a whole, however, did not derive much benefit from these statements.

Some consolation to the disappointed holders of Anglo-American Telegraph Company's deferred stock is to be found in the report. The reduction in the carry forward, it appears, was not due to a contraction in the ordinary business of the company. Traffic receipts increased by £7,000, while the working expenses advanced by only £3,300, so that from this source there was a net increase, but the receipts from chartering the company's repair vessel the "Minia" declined by £10,400. Whatever the cause of the decrease in the net balance, however, the fact remains that the carry forward, to which the deferred holders have to look for their dividend, is £6,100 less than a year ago.

THE PROGRESS OF COALITE.

The recent announcement of an issue of £300,000 of debentures by the British Coalite Company, Limited, has recalled attention to the disappointing history of that big undertaking—financially big, at any rate—and the parent Syndicate, Coalite, Limited. It is now over three years since the company was launched with a prospectus affirming that coalite was already being manufactured on a commercial scale and predicting a net profit of £500,000 per annum from sales of the fuel in London alone, to say nothing of sales in the provinces and the profits from by-products. Towards the end of 1908 a pamphlet entitled "The Progress of Coalite" proclaimed that the process was "at last . . . complete in every detail, standardised from the first step to the last, capable of definite results and regular output." Moreover, to obviate exasperating delays the company had erected and equipped at Wednesfield a foundry which could turn out two coalite plants a week. How many have actually been turned out and what has been done with them? A year later (December 21, 1909) Sir Wm. H. Preece, the chairman, informed the shareholders that they had plenty of cash in hand to complete their programme. It seemed reasonable to suppose that this was so, seeing that the issued capital was £977,000. Within six months, however, the shareholders hear that the company's lands and works, on which about £360,000 has been spent, and all its other assets, actual and potential, have had to be mortgaged for £300,000 in order that it may continue its operations. The directors now conjure up a rosy vision of "large and permanent dividends almost forthwith" as the outcome of arrangements under negotiation—only under negotiation—with some forty gas companies for the erection and working of coalite plants or batteries. The gas companies are to have the gas, leaving the coalite and by-products to the British Coalite Company, which will construct and own the batteries. A battery costs £5,000, and it is suggested that each battery will pay for itself within one year and produce subsequent annual profits of at least £5,000. This sounds well, but it might be more instructive to have particulars of the company's actual achievements at Wednesfield and Barking, at Plymouth and Hythe. In the two last-named places the company has had a working arrangement with the gas authorities. How has it turned out from the coalite point of view? As to the gas companies, the Journal of Gas Lighting recently stated that Plymouth is not sufficiently enamoured of the coalite plant to have extensions made to it, while at Hythe the plant has been shut down for the summer months owing to the nuisance it caused in the neighbourhood. It would be especially instructive to know whether the demand for coalite keeps pace with the supply when the plants are working full time at Wednesfield, Plymouth, and Hythe, for obviously the profits anticipated from the proposed further installations elsewhere must be dependent upon the practicability of finding a ready sale at the required price for all the fuel that will be produced.

These £300,000 of debentures which are to bear interest at 5 per cent. and to participate in profits to the extent of a further 5 per cent. have been purchased by the Investment Registry at a price undisclosed. In the first place, British Coalite shareholders will be given the option of buying them from the Registry at par, but no doubt if the shareholders are disinclined to exercise this privilege Mr. Henry Lowenfeld will use the ingenious machinery he has at his disposal to find other customers. As usual, Mr. Lowenfeld modestly remains in the background in this matter, but one of his fellow directors of the Registry, Lord Elcho, and one of the managers, Mr. G. P. Foaden, are to join the board of the British Coalite Company in the interests of the debenture-holders. These gentlemen are, I suppose, au fait with the financial methods of the Registry; but it is difficult to see how their experience in that direction can strengthen the position of the British Coalite Company as a commercial undertaking. Some further reorganisation of the board is said to be under consideration. It remains to be seen whether it will make up more effectively than the accession of Lord Elcho and Mr. Foaden does for the serious loss which the company sustained by the retirement of two of the original directors, who were experts in the purchase and sale of coal—Sir Arthur Cory Wright and Mr. H. Wynne Pugh. In one of his circulars to the shareholders a couple of years or so after the company had been floated Sir William H. Preece apologetically observed that "every new industry takes time to mature and to be evolved;" that "we are dealing with entirely new technical conditions, some of which have never been investigated scientifically;" and that "hence we have to advance with great care and caution." The truth of this is undeniable. The evolution of the coalite business into a commercial success seems, however, to be an unconscionably slow process; and the need of great care and caution does not appear to have been quite realised in connection with the statements put forward both in the original prospectus and in numerous subsequent advertisements. For the sake of the shareholders it is to be hoped that the latest promise of large dividends "almost forthwith" will prove less illusory than the others that have been made during the past three years.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

The Stampede of a Syndicate.

Until I received an inquiry the other day from a lady shareholder I had never previously heard of the World's Derby and Horse Stampede Syndicate, Limited. This may suggest a lack of vigilance on my part, for according to the statement by which the lady was induced to subscribe £50 "several eminent showmen and the leading men in the amusement world" expressed the opinion that "the World's Derby will undoubtedly be the greatest money winner of modern times." It was described as the invention of Mr. T. W. Potts, patentee of "water chutes," "aerial roundabouts," "water walking shoes," etc. Just a year ago the syndicate was formed with a nominal capital of £10,000 to acquire the invention for £1,000 in cash and £6,000 in shares. The directors were Messrs. Edward Alfred Tupper, 52, Queen's Road, Wimbledon, retired captain in the Indian Staff Corps; Henry Frederick Keen, Hayes Lodge, Grange Road, Ealing, newspaper proprietor; and the aforesaid T. W. Potts, amusements contractor, 624, Fulham Road. The vendors were T. W. Potts, Limited, 54, Gresham Street, that being also the address of the syndicate's solicitors, Messrs. Cooper and Co. In return for her £50 the lady was supplied with a certificate for fifty shares, and also a further certificate for sixteen bonus shares, Mr. Keen, writing to her from the registered office, 418-422, Strand, as "managing director and secretary." Being told that the syndicate had failed, she applied last March for the return of her money. The application is indicative of the innocence ladies often display in matters of this sort; but Mr. Keen, signing this time simply as secretary, blandly replied that within the month the position would be cleared up and the money of the investors returned. That promise was not kept, subsequent letters to the secretary came back from the Dead Letter Office, and inquiries that I have made show that the syndicate has stampeded from its office, leaving no address. It is obviously desirable that the retired captain, the newspaper proprietor, and the amusements contractor should give some explanation of this proceeding. Perhaps they will furthermore explain how it happened that the allotment of fifty shares to this lady was omitted from the return of allotments filed at a later date at Somerset House. That document gave particulars of the allotment of seven shares only. I wonder whether it similarly omitted the names of any other investors who like this lady backed a wrong 'un in the World's Derby?

By the way, since writing the above I have seen in Friday's London Gazette a notice of a receiving order against Edward Alfred Tupper, 52, Queen's Road, Wimbledon, who is therein described as a company promoter.

The Last of the London and Paris Exchange.

My remark a week or two ago that the failure of the London and Paris Exchange, Limited, had been buried in the oblivion of Carey Street was a trifle premature. I forgot that the Official Receiver had not pronounced his funeral oration. He has now done so. All the assets, as is well known, were seized on behalf of the debenture-holders, whose claim they were insufficient to satisfy. "Sale of waste paper, £3" is absolutely the only sum the Official Receiver has obtained as liquidator under the compulsory winding-up order; and against this upwards of £50 is owing to the Board of Trade for incidental outlay irrespective of fees. Not a penny is available for the creditors, numbering 9,000, whose debts are estimated at £424,437. No doubt much of the money was due to customers for deposits and profits on speculative transactions with the Exchange. Many creditors, however, were not speculators, but investors who entrusted the Exchange with cash or securities in connection with buying or selling orders. In the latter period of its existence money so received or realised was misapplied to meet the claims of threatening creditors, a disgraceful proceeding, which the directors, Messrs. A. M. and H. M. Mandeville, have sought to excuse by saying that they were daily expecting to overcome their financial difficulties. It is noteworthy that Messrs. A. M. and H. M. Mandeville resigned their directorships a few days before the winding-up order, and were succeeded by their brothers, Messrs. Walter and Edwin Mandeville. No accounts in the prescribed form have ever been lodged in reference to the failure of this company, the Court having relieved the directors of that obligation on their representation that they could not prepare the accounts themselves and lacked funds to procure technical assistance. Meanwhile they were busily engaged in running new businesses. The Official Receiver is asking the Court to release him from the liquidatorship, and this report must apparently be regarded as the final chapter in the history of this bucket-shop bankruptcy.

Two New Bucket-shops.

There has lately been a violent eruption of newspaper advertisements headed with the portrait of a gentleman whose chest is inscribed with the bold legend, "My advice in three years brought clients £600,000." The advertisers are the Industrial Development Corporation, 231, Strand, and in a treatise entitled "Scientific Investment," which they are generously giving away, the identity of the financial expert is revealed—at any rate, it is alleged that he is "John Macenerney, ——, West —— Avenue, New York City." His services, it is solemnly averred, have now been exclusively engaged by the Corporation. Does the Corporation selfishly propose to utilise them for its own benefit? Not at all. Its object is to enrich the British public. All that the public have to do is to send along their cash to the philanthropists at 231, Strand, for "scientific investment" on the 1 per cent. cover system in the American Railroad shares recommended by "our New York correspondent," the eminent Macenerney. "Our statistical department" has prepared a table showing what enormous profits may be made, and "we deduct no commission," but pile up these profits for all and sundry free, gratis, and for nothing. Really, the credulous noodles who fall into such a palpable flat-trap as this are undeserving of the least sympathy.

Another new name among the bucket-shops is that of Pearson and Co., 7, Leadenhall Street, E.C. Probably, though, the name simply veils the identity of some old acquaintance. Whoever he is, his circular suggesting that, in view of the Ferreira dividend of 30s. per share, big profits can be gained by purchasing on a narrow margin ("£12 10s. secures twenty-five shares," etc.), is a very stale, though I suppose still successful, device for extracting money from the pockets of innocents.

"The Investor."

Among the mushroom sheets which have lately sprung up in the City is one called The Investor. No complete copy of it has yet come my way, but a correspondent has sent me a portion of a recent issue which, under the heading of "The Editorial View," devotes a column and a-half to a fulsome puff of R. A. Smith and Co. These notorious bucket-shop keepers, whose unprincipled methods of business have been exposed in the courts as well as in Truth, are unblushingly recommended as a firm of repute and standing who can be relied upon to deal fairly and straightly by their clients! This fact is a sufficient indication of the character of the Investor. Like many similar publications, it offers its readers the privilege of "participation" in underwriting propositions, options, etc. I am continually being asked my opinion as to the advisability of entering into speculative transactions, or it may be doing investment business, through the agency of so-called financial periodicals. Obviously dealings with readers in stocks and shares are outside the province of legitimate journalism and indeed incompatible with it; and almost invariably the papers which engage in this sort of business are obscure and ephemeral publications which are either carrying on a bucket-shop or closely connected with one.

NEW ISSUES.

The prospectus is published of the Anglo East African Rubber Plantations, Limited, which has a capital of £100,000, divided into 1,000,000 two shilling shares, of which 600,000 are now offered for subscription. The company is formed to acquire and work the Kilimanyota and Kibongo rubber estates in British East Africa, the former being situated close to the Uganda railway, about 190 miles from the port of Mombasa, and the latter on the sea coast, near Malindi, about seventy-five miles from Mombasa. Kilimanyota has an area of about 4,000 acres, of which 170 are planted with Ceara rubber, and Kibongo comprises about 165 acres, of which 100 are planted. It is stated that tapping is in progress, the number of trees now tappable being approximately 40,000. The total number already planted is 151,000, and it is proposed to plant a further 3,500 acres. It is estimated that the profit on the capital paid up will be 7 per cent. for the year ending June 30, 1911, and will increase rapidly from year to year. The purchase price is £26,500, of which £9,500 is payable in cash.

The Manihot Rubber Plantations, Limited, has a capital of £50,000, divided into 500,000 2s. shares, of which 100,000 will be allotted to the vendors in part payment of the purchase price and 350,000 are now offered, 50,000 being already privately subscribed. The company is formed to acquire two rubber estates, one consisting of about 1,250 acres and the other of about 700 acres, in German East Africa. The former estate is planted with 100,000 Ceara rubber trees, all tappable within the year 1910-1911, and when fully developed will contain about 400,000 additional trees. The second estate is planted with 37,500 Ceara trees, of which 20,000 are now tappable, and when fully developed will contain about 250,000 additional trees. The prospectus estimates a net profit of 10 per cent. in the first year, increasing to 52½ per cent. in the fifth year.

Messrs. Wheater, Cornwallis-West, and Co., offer for subscription £125,000 first mortgage five per cent. debenture stock of Pinners Hall (Austin Friars), Limited. The company, whose share capital is £125,000, has been formed to acquire a block of buildings designed for first-class professional and mercantile offices, now in course of completion. The property is in close proximity to the Stock Exchange, and has frontages to Austin Friars, Great Winchester Street, and Pinners Court. The valuations and estimates of net rental set forth in the prospectus show that the debenture stock will be secured twice over as regards capital value, and almost three times as regards interest.

With a capital of £1,500,000, in £1 shares, the Grand Central (Ceylon) Rubber Estates, Limited, has been formed to purchase and carry on six well-known estates in Ceylon. The estates comprise about 19,034 acres, of which 12,491 acres are planted with Para rubber, 595 acres with tea, and 5,948 acres are reserve land. The rubber trees number 2,530,000, and the output is estimated at 140,000 lbs. for the second half of this year, at 400,000 lbs. for 1911, and at 900,000 lbs. for 1912. The vendors take 1,013,211 shares in satisfaction of the purchase price, and 211,789 shares are offered for subscription.

The Chembong Malay Rubber Company, Limited, has been formed to acquire estates in the neighbourhood of Seremban, Federated Malay States, comprising 1,158 acres, of which 947 acres are under cultivation with Para rubber. A crop of 10,400 lbs. is estimated for the year ending June 30, 1913, and 72,100 lbs. for the following year. The capital of the company is £75,000, in 2s. shares, of which 320,000 are now offered for subscription.

Metalite, Limited, a company of which some preliminary particulars were given last week, now publishes its prospectus inviting subscriptions for 380,000 shares of £1 each. The list will close on or before Friday for London, and Saturday for the country.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of Truth.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

Gaucho.—It does not materially alter the position.

Jonah.—It is fair, although rather speculative.

Milo.—1. 100 dols. 2. No. It is 190 dols. for 100 dols. 3. April and October. 4. Dollars. 5. No. 6. 7 per cent.

Silex.—Fair of their class.

Wilts.—Hold for the present.

Mines.

Anxious, Simla.—There seems to have been not a little muddling, and I am not yet inclined to be sanguine that success will be obtained.

Bass Rock.—1. Take your profit. 2 and 3. These might be retained for the present. Brookback.—You may get a rather better price by waiting. Berri.—Very speculative, but may have some recovery later on with the better class shares of the group. B. R. G.—1. See Note in last week's issue. 2. I have heard nothing since the company went into liquidation. Have you tried a letter to the liquidator?

Careful.—1. A hopeful long lock-up. Hold. 2 and 3. I do not recommend either.

Devonian.—I should prefer to put the money in something else. Duffs.—I cannot predict much early improvement, but would hold for an eventual recovery.

Ivanhoe.—I am not greatly attracted by any of the shares named.

Java.—Recent developments in the mine have not been quite so satisfactory, and there has also been some forced selling of the shares. As I stated in my Notes, however, I never considered the shares worth £10, and they are none too cheap even now. Jumbo.—You might retain your present interest in the hope of some recovery later on, but I do not think the prospects sufficiently bright to advise buying more.

KAMA.—It is always as well to secure a good profit on a mining share. KAFFIRS.—Hold for a better market.

MINER.—Unless there is soon a marked change for the better in the mining position the company may have to raise fresh capital. 2. I doubt whether they will have such a rise.

NATIONAL.—Randfontein Centrals are a promising long lock-up, but it is not advisable to put too much money into any one section of the markets.

OPTIMIST.—1 and 2. I have a poor opinion of the shares. 3. This company went into liquidation in May, 1906. ORTLER.—You will find the shares quoted in the list of making up prices published about every fortnight in the financial papers. Your money could be more hopefully employed elsewhere.

PERAK.—There is such a company, but I have no information as to its operations, and have not seen a price quoted for the shares. According to the reference books, the London office is at 1, Broad Street Place, E.C., and you might see if the secretary can give you any information as to the position and prospects. PSEUDONYM.—1. I have not seen a price quoted, nor have I heard of any dealings having taken place in them. 2. A hopeful long lock-up. P. MCG.—1 and 2. May have some recovery when business becomes more brisk. 3. Better left alone. PROC.—1. East Rand Proprietary are rather less speculative than those you name, and give a yield of nearly 8 per cent. at this price. 2. A very fair long lock-up speculation.

RAINDROP.—1. Hold for a better market. A dividend is some way off. 2. No. 3. They may go better with other shares of the group when business revives, but a purchase just now would be very speculative. REX.—I think there is a fair chance of a recovery this year to about the prices you paid; and would hold the shares. Put the additional money into something else, so as to spread your risk.

SALOPIAN.—No mining share can be regarded as a safe investment, but I consider Naragutas and Bauchis promising speculative holdings. SOLDIER.—The company went into liquidation in 1908. STAMFORD.—Too much in the nature of a blind pool to be attractive. SUCCESS.—A fair holding for dividends. Payments are made free of tax.

THELMA.—You might take any fully paid shares that are offered you, but do not subscribe any more money in connection with the concern. T. A. R., Crewe.—See reply to "Berri" above.

VULCAN.—Hold for some recovery.

WET.—1 and 2. See reply to "Berri" above. 3. Hold.

MIXED SECURITIES.

ALBERON.—1. See Rule 2. 2. Prospects of improvement depend largely upon how the company's various interests turn out, and holding the shares must be considered speculative. 3. Hold. ARNOLD.—1. I know nothing of this concern. 2. I have no recent information regarding these. 3. Dividend prospects poor. Sell.

BENE.—I am not attracted by 13 or 14, but the others are a very fair selection. Nos. 2, 7, and 11 are the most speculative. Five more coupons required.

DON.—1. They are 15s. paid. 2. See Rule 2. DUHALLOW.—Hold all.

EXAMINING.—1 Sell. 2 Hold.

HOMO.—Better sell all three.

MACTEER.—1. A fair security. 2. Hold. 3. Fairly promising.

PATERFAMILIAS.—(a) The financial position is a strong one. Hold. (b) It forms a reserve asset, and it is not likely the directors would entertain the idea of reduction. It is only to be called in the event of liquidation. P. R. (200).—I do not care for any of them for investment. You should have read my recent remarks regarding the concern which gives you the advice.

RUGGER.—Keep the mining shares for better markets. Separate letter required for Rubber queries; see Rule 2.

SANGLIER.—1. You could make a better selection. 2. The company went into liquidation about nine years ago. STAIR.—1. Hold. 2. Keep them for a recovery. 3. Sell. SINCLAIR.—1. I know nothing of these. 2. If these are the Dublin chemical manufacturers they appear fair. I have not heard a price. 3. Sell these. Last price 72. SIDMOUTH.—1. I cannot fix a limit, but the company has considerable possibilities as the country develops. 2. It is difficult to say. Some recovery later on is not unlikely. 3. It is practically impossible to calculate the intrinsic value of shares of companies whose profit-making possibilities are so ill-defined.

TEVIOT.—1-3. Rand Collieries, as a speculative lock-up. A separate letter is required for rubber inquiries. THURLES.—1. Too speculative to class as "safe." 2. I do not recommend these. 3. Would not buy now.

WALMER.—Sell all three. Central Uruguay Railway 5½ per cent. preference, City of Osaka, Mortgage Company of Egypt 5 per cent. preferred will give you 5 per cent. to a little over.

XERO.—All good securities.

OIL.

AJAX.—Keep them.

BANCO.—Sell.

CHANNEL.—1. Hold. 2. Sell. 3. Hold.

GALWAY.—A poor opinion. Sell

KAMNA.—Hold.

LONDONDERRY.—1 and 2. Hold. 3. Sell.

MYFANWY.—The prospectus read well.

OLD FIRM.—Hold.

PETE.—1. Authorised share capital £800,000; issued, £725,007; debentures, £415,540. 2. Prospects doubtful. 3. Sell.

THALASSE.—Hold. TABLOID.—Hold.

ZEA.—Hold.

RUBBER.

ABEON.—1. Not advised. 2. You may buy and hold for at least 4s. premium. ASMODEUS.—Buy some Crude Rubber Washing shares. ANGLO.—Try to work it out after the debentures are converted into ordinary shares and the latter are receiving 165 per cent. ATHENÆUM.—You have not done wrong in averaging, but I prefer Madagascars at the moment, as they are nearer to a good dividend. Thanks for your letter. ASHTON.—1 and 2. You had better hold these for recovery. 2. Retain for, say, 4s. premium. A. B. C.—1. If you carefully read the circular issued by the company you will not foolishly sacrifice your Kamna shares. 2. Retain by all means. See first reply to "Culverin." 3. Yes. 4. You will get the money at the special settlement. 5. Probably within the next few months. ACRE.—With regard to Jequie shares you had better hold until the meeting, which will be held in the course of two or three months, and in the meantime I understand that the company are issuing a circular, which may reach you before you see this. ACE (Leeds).—1 and 2. I should hesitate before advising a purchase at this price. As to whether these are "the best of low-priced shares" depends upon whether you are looking for a lock-up investment or a share for appreciation in capital value, and as you give me no clue to this I do not care to answer your inquiry dogmatically. 3 The experts seem to think that the price of the raw material will advance still further before it settles down to a normal figure. The remainder of your query is of such a hypothetical, speculative nature that I have no room here properly to discuss it. AMPLITUDE.—1. This is a share that I do not care to recommend. It is just possible that a dividend may be paid next year. 2. Towards the end of the year, when the price should improve. AICHBEE.—1. Nyassas should improve before the end of the year, when the results from the working of the Guiguet machines will be known. 2. See first reply to "A. B. C." 3. This share is all right. You are certain to get at least 10 per cent. the first year. ANXIOUS (Hereford).—The capital is small and the area is an extensive one. I should average. ABEL.—Cannot advise. Not a share that I should care to hold. ASKWITH.—1. See reply to "Acre." 2. Regard prospects as fairly encouraging, but think you could do better in the present condition of markets. I should prefer Malaccas or Lanadron. 3. I should not buy this share. ABWONG.—You had better hold the shares named for a revival in markets generally. ALTO.—1. If necessary to sell anything I should sell these. 2. See first reply to "Aichbee." 3. These should do well eventually. 4. See first reply to "A. B. C." 5. Keep these until markets improve, but sell when you see your money back. ABDULLA.—Have you not delayed asking for advice a long time? I am under the impression that the whole of this business has been completed. ADELAIDE.—Thanks for appreciative remarks. See reply to "Acre" and average should the price fall below the present quotation. APEX.—You need not have any anxiety regarding the shares you hold. You may look upon them all as good industrial investments. ADSUM.—See first reply to "Aichbee." I should certainly average at present price. ANXIOUS (Herne Hill).—The answer to your query is "about six years." Your letter is distinctly funny. Please give me the name of your reference book. AMOS.—1 and 2. Quite satisfactory. Hold for a profit or investment. 3. May possibly have a spurt with a renewal of market activity, when I should sell. A. C.—An irresponsible mushroom publication; which will probably receive attention in an early issue. Meanwhile, ignore its statements, and do not be unduly anxious about your shares, all of which should be held for a revival of market activity. ACCOUNTS.—May go to 30s. in the future. As you have bought for permanent investment you can afford to wait for this. A. R. M.—1. The estate is a good one and the management is excellent, but the points against the share are its unmarketability and the fact that when you bought the price fully discounted future profits. However, you had better hold this as well as 2 until you can sell without loss. No doubt you will be able to exchange them for more promising shares when markets become more active. ACADIA.—All three will probably stand higher by the end of the year, but I do not care to fix a selling limit for that period. I should keep all three for investment. AMELIOR.—You are quite right. Apart from the two shares, your list is a fairly good one. Your supplementary list is also good, but you ought to take your profit on 2 soon. As regards the other matter the fault seems to be yours. Apparently you did not give your address fully on the application form, in which event you have no case. AALBORG.—1. This is an unsatisfactory concern. I fear you will have to hold for a time, as there is no market for the shares. 2. Eastern planters expect a rise to 15s. per lb. within the next six months. 3. See first part of reply to "A. C." and hold your shares. ANXIOUS (Tufnell Park).—Both concerns have excellent boards of directors. Do not sell until a rise in the price of rubber has brought about stronger markets. AARON.—All these are leading men in the rubber world and of the highest reputation. You may safely hold your shares for a considerable rise in value. ANTONIO.—1. See reply to "Acre." 2. I still consider this an unsatisfactory share. 3. Madagascar preference or Northumberland Tea and Rubber. AJAX.—You had better keep both your rubber shares until there is a general revival, as the companies are under excellent management A. J. F.—I have always contended that this was a wild cat, but you really require a solicitor's opinion on the question of taking action against the promoters.

BUCKINGHAM.—Sell them if you can. BIRCHWEST.—You gave a high price, but possibly you may see your money back before the special settlement. Do not expect to make a big profit. BAX.—I have constantly warned readers not to touch these shares, but as you hold them you had better wait for firmer markets before attempting to sell. BURLINGTON.—See reply to "Acre." BOSQUET.—See first reply to "A. B. C." BELGAUM.—You are lucky in being left with such a good lot of shares after gambling in the way you mention. BUMBER.—1. This is in good hands, but there is never likely to be a free market in the shares, and I cannot advise a purchase. 2. Next year. BAYSWATER.—I should not advise the shares mentioned for a quick rise. You would do better to buy Northumberland Tea and Rubber or Madagascar Ordinary. BELFRY.—See first reply to "A. B. C." BRIP.—With regard to Kamnas, see first reply to "A. B. C." The other shares I should sell at the first opportunity. BUXTON.—1. I think you should average these. 2. and 3. I am afraid that you will have to wait a long while before you can sell without loss, but it is useless to try to throw them away now. Wait for better markets. BROCHTY.—1. You ought to see a profit of at least 4s. on these. 2. These were never a favourite of mine, but I think you ought to see your money back before the end of the year. 3. I should retain these for a small profit. BRAE.—1 and 2. I should not advise a purchase, as I think you could do better. 3. A good company, but the premium is getting high enough. BEVERLEY.—You should hold them all for investment, averaging 1. BRIDON.—The company was brought out under respectable auspices. Five per cent. is guaranteed for six years on the shares, for which, however, there is no price obtainable at present.

CUMBERLAND.—All three are satisfactory companies with good estates. Of course, you realise that you will have to wait for some time before the trees are in full bearing. I should not dissuade you from buying now. CAMERON.—Sell when you can do so at par. CULVERIN.—1. The outputs are expected to increase in a greater ratio as from the end of next month. The meeting will be held immediately after the holiday season. Do not be over-anxious. 2 and 3. The price of these will ultimately rise; in the meantime you enjoy your guaranteed dividend. CLONMEH.—Hold for recovery and a good profit. CLONTURK.—Will not tap until next year, when they should commence to earn dividends. COTTAGE.—1. I still think well of these. 2. These may have a spurt with a revival of markets, but they are quite unsuitable for permanent investment. 3. I have consistently advised sales of these shares. CRAVEN.—The calculation is based on the production when the present area is in full bearing. This is clearly stated in the article. CHAMAN.—My selling limit is 12s. 6d., which should be reached during the next twelve months. CHOB.—Hold for 4s. premium. CAP.—I advise you to hold all your shares, with the exception of 8, until next March. It is an excellent list, but No. 8 is doubtful. CALICUT.—1 and 2. See reply to "Acre." 3. I have never recommended this share, and I do not consider it suitable for a permanent investment. COUPON.—See first reply to "Culverin." CASCARA.—Both shares are unsaleable now, so that it will be useless to press them on the market. I have always had an unfavourable opinion of them, and advise you to get rid of them when markets improve. CONFIDENCE.—See reply to "Acre." CARRON.—All your shares should ultimately prove remunerative investments. 1 and 2. See reply to "Acre." 3. A dividend expected in a few months. 4. One of the most promising estates in the East. A dividend expected next year. CHANNEL.—Hold 2 and 3 for investment, and sell 1 when you can do so without loss. CARALD.—1 You had better hold for the present. 2 and 3. See reply to "Acre." CECILIA.—The firm are of too excellent standing to have been guilty of dishonesty, but they appear to have been careless in giving the full price of your limit to a jobber without discovering the then quotation. There was no such mistake with regard to the purchase of Nyassas. See first reply to "A. B. C." CAUTIOUS (Northampton).—Yes. See first reply to "Aichbee." CAVAN.—1. See first reply to "A. B. C." 2. See reply to "Acre." COCO.—You had better buy Malacca Debenture or Madagascar Preference. CISSIE.—Hold your Beverleys for investment. 2. I cannot advise you to wait. Sell, and buy Northumberland Tea and Rubber.

D. G. B. (Boldre).—Any of the four shares you name should suit your purpose and turn out well. DOUBLE INN.—1. See first reply to "Culverin." 2. £10. 3. 30s. 4. £20. D. P. H.—See reply to "Cascara." DEVON SEAGULL.—1-3. See reply to "Acre." Plantation is in Bahia, South America. DAKAR.—1. The shares are fully paid. I have not seen the reference, but probably it meant that the 4 per cent. dividend yielded 6¼ per cent. on the then price. 2. Yes. 3. Impossible to say, but you ought to see a good profit. DUPLEAZE.—1. Hold your Kinta Kellas for a dividend. 2. Yes. A purchase of Madagascar Preference at present price should prove a very good investment. 3. See the tables given in recent issues. DESPONDENT.—You have no reason to assume such a pseudonym. See first reply to "A. B. C." and the third reply to "Aichbee." DORSET.—It is possible that the shares, although they came out of the name of your broker, did not belong to him, but it was exceedingly unbusinesslike for him to send you the transfer without any explanation. You will probably see your money back in time. Your broker, in advising you to sell Vallambrosas at 15s., was only pursuing a course adopted by the majority of members of the Stock Exchange. For a long time they tried to ignore the rubber market, and then induced clients, who had bought the very best shares, to sell at a small profit. This was owing to a lack of knowledge which they are gradually acquiring. DAHABIAH (Cairo).—1-3. I cannot predict that quotations will rise this year to the prices you gave, but all your shares should participate, on their merits, in an improvement of markets. 4. See Rule 2. DISGUSTED.—The company is doing an excellent business, but in common with all others the shares have fallen in value. The dividend outlook for the current year is better than that at the corresponding period last year. DUCK.—1. Your figures are very conservative, and I feel confident that the price of the shares will soon rise to £2. There is now only the question of the selling price in Mincing Lane, and this should be settled shortly. 2. I think that I should wait for the flotation of the subsidiaries; I understand that there are at least half-a-dozen coming along. 3. The United company you name is a fair proposition, but the shares are almost unmarketable; the others are not dear, but I prefer those mentioned in reply to "Antonio," or those referred to in the article last week. For the practical rubber handbook you had better write to the book department of the "India Rubber Journal," 37-38, Shoe Lane, London, E.C.

E. H. M. L.—Retain both as an investment unless you see the opportunity of taking a good profit on 1, in which case I should advise an exchange into a share with a free market. EDACIOR.—I should retain these. The company is a very fair one, although the market in the shares is limited. E. M. M.—For the purchase you require you could not do better than buy Lanadrons and Malaccas as good producers, Northumberland Tea and Rubber as a tea-cum-rubber share, and Madagascar ordinary. EROS.—See first reply to "A. B. C." and average. EIRON.—Thanks for your letter. See first part of reply to "A. C." You have a good list, all of which should turn out well. I should average 1, 4, 7, and 9 now. EPHEMERA.—1. I should not buy more. As a lock-up this share may be all right, but the size of the capital precludes any marked advance in the price in the immediate future. 2. Brought out under excellent auspices, but it is a "long waiting proposition." Hold your shares for a small profit. 3. As an investment the market opinion is favourable. No appreciable increase in the price expected for some time. ELASTICUS.—You have a mixed lot. 1, 5, 7, and 8. Good concerns which may be regarded as investments. 2. A speculative share which may spurt at any time. 3. Unsatisfactory. 4 and 6. Exchange these when you can do so without loss. 9. A fair proposition, but I should take a small profit. E. C.—In future please number your questions correctly. 1. I should not advise you to make the change you suggest. Hold the shares you have, as they may advance at any time, but do not look upon them as a permanent investment. 2. A good share, but high enough for the present. 3. I should not hold these.

F. C. N. (Southampton).—I hope that I have read your initials correctly. You are holding three shares which are unsaleable at present. See reply to "Cascara." FROGNAL.—1. I do not think it is probable that the price will rise to your figure during the "next four weeks." 2. General depression in the market is the only reason for the decline. If you bought the shares for investment you need not worry. FAIRFAX.—A fair concern owning a large area which it is intended to cut up into subsidiaries. You had better hold for the present. FRED.—The preference are certain to rise in the next twelve months, and perhaps the others will not advance so rapidly. FLICK.—1. See first reply to "Culverin." 2. Yes. FRISCO.—1. See first reply to "Culverin." 2. The estate is developing well, and I advise you to retain your shares. FORD.—1. See first reply to "A. B. C." 2. See reply to "Acre." 3. No. See first reply to "Culverin."

GEORGIUS.—You need not be nervous. This is one of the best concerns on the market, and cannot fail to turn out well during the first year. GATEMAR.—See first reply to "Aichbee." A purchase of Vine and General Trust Preference at present price should prove profitable within a year. GARRY OWEN.—See first reply to "Culverin." GREEN COTTON.—You need not become anxious. All your shares will recover with harder markets. GOLLANFIELD.—1. The following are the estimated dividends, approximately, for the next six years: 42 per cent., 72 per cent., and the following four years about 85 per cent. 2. Quite in the front rank. 3. This is a fair estate. 4. You have made an excellent selection.

HAYRICK.—1. Yes, one of the best of its class. 2. This is in good hands, but there is no market for the shares, and I do not care to recommend them. HERMIT.—See third reply to "Aichbee." The company will probably publish some very satisfactory news within the next few days—perhaps before you see this. HEVEA.—I should retain all three and average 1. HAMILTON.—You have an excellent list. You may safely postpone making any change until after your holiday, but when you return watch for an opportunity to get rid of 4 and 7. You may be able to do this then without loss. HALEBID.—1. See first reply to "A. B. C." 2. See first reply to "Aichbee." HINDOOSTAN.—See first reply to "A. B. C." HOLMESDALE.—See first reply to "A. B. C." H. A. ROLD.—1. You should average. 2. See first reply to "Nelmes." HAVERSTOCK.—Thanks for your two letters. I think you will find it all right ultimately. HAWK.—You should keep 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, and 7 for recovery and a good profit, but it might be well to sell 4 and 8 when markets improve. Do not sell immediately.

INTERESTED.—From your letter I gather that you hold the shares named, but you do not say what they cost. I advise you to hold 1 and 3 for investment, and sell 2 when you can do so without loss. IRELAND.—1. I should hold these as a permanent investment. 2. Retain for recovery. See reply to "Anxious (Hereford)." 3. This was not a satisfactory promotion. You had better sell your shares when markets revive. ISLANDER.—See reply to "E. M. M." IGNOTA.—1-2 Madagascar Preference. 3. No dividend until next year, at all events. IMLOST.—Hold 1 and 3 for investment, and sell 2 on a market recovery. ITMAAD-UD-DAULAT.—1. The vine rubber is cut down, and treated by machinery. 2. True of non-machine using companies. 3. As a counsel of perfection your figure is a very conservative one, but the market does not depend upon academic valuations.

JAVA (Glasgow).—Sell all at the first opportunity. JAVA (Murrayfield).—1-3. See first reply to "Culverin." Meeting will probably be held in September. Hold your Sungei Kapar for improvement. JEAN.—1-2. My "careful opinion" is that you should wait for an advance of about 2s. per share, and then sell. J. D. A.—London Asiatics. J. H. H.—I have no knowledge regarding possible calls. You should write to the secretary. The shares are said to be going better in the near future.

KIT.—1. Very good. Dividend for last completed year 35 per cent. 2. Until recently was considered to be in the front rank. Should not now be bought. 3. I should not buy this share, as the price is fully high, and there is very little market in London. KAJANG.—1. This should depend upon your complete list of investments. You ought not to put all your eggs in one basket. 2. See first reply to "Culverin." 3. I think you could not do better. 4. A good share, but not much market. LAKAND.—1. £7 per share. 2. In good hands, and should do well, but I do not care to fix selling limit just now. 3. Madagascar Ordinary. KAMP (Dublin).—A good list, with the exception of 5, which I should sell on a market recovery. With regard to 3, see third reply to "Aichbee." KAMNA (Peckham).—1 Keep them for a good profit. 2. See first reply to "A. B. C." KIKI.—You may keep 2 and 3 for investment, but you should take your profit on half of 1. K. K.—1. Retain for recovery and improvement. 2 and 3. Not particularly attractive. I should take a small profit when obtainable. You do not say what you gave for them. KAMNA.—1. See first reply to "A. B. C." 2. Hold for a profit. The prospects are good. KOWLOON.—1. (a) A good speculative investment. Results depend upon the flotation of companies. (b) 11s. 2. I cannot trace these companies. Can you send me a prospectus or balance-sheet? 3. Merlimaus for choice. You may buy these now and hold for a profit, or keep as an investment for several years.

L. R. W. (Dulwich).—Highlands figures were given in the issue of April 13, and those of Labu on May 4. Both are in the front rank, and some of my Eastern correspondents think that the former will show a greater increase next year than any other company. LA FRANCE.—Only number 4 on your list is worth buying at present price. See shares mentioned to "Antonio" and those in last week's issue. LA VERDAD.—1. A sound rubber investment. 2 and 3. I have not yet seen the prospectus, and cannot give an opinion. LLIT.—1 and 3 are fair concerns, but I could not advise you to add to your holding. 2. I do not regard this as a satisfactory company. The circular issued in place of a prospectus was not sufficiently informative to inspire confidence. I should sell all three as soon as I could do so without loss. LLENS.—I cannot "thoroughly recommend" any of them either for a rise or for investment, although I think that possibly 1, 2, and 3 may turn out satisfactory concerns eventually. I prefer the shares recommended to "E. M. M." LOCOS.—1-3. I would hold these for permanent investment. 4-6. You had better keep these also for a time, but if you see your price again, sell. LA MASCOTTE.—See first reply to "A. B. C." LEIRE.—Next week, perhaps, I may enlighten you as to its unimportance. My opinion of the shares will be justified by results.

MOULMEIN.—All decidedly good. Keep them. MORO.—1. You know my opinion of them, but I advise you not to sell yet. 2. No. You will find that this company will be a profitable investment. 3. Have nothing to do with them or any outside brokers. They would deal with your shares. MANDALAY.—I advise you not to buy these. Buy the shares recommended to "E. M. M." MURREE.—Of your list I would buy only 1, 3, and 7. These you may safely purchase and hold for a good profit or investment. MICK.—Madagascar Ordinary and Northumberland Tea and Rubber. MEDWAY.—The address of 1 is Winchester House, E.C., while 2 is to be found at 3, Budge Row, E.C. The latter company is likely to be taken in hand by one of the South African groups. You had better await developments. MILITANS.—This company has nothing but trouble before it. You had, however, better wait for the revival which is expected before selling your shares. M. D.—1. See first reply to "Culverin." 2. See reply to "Acre." MIT.—1 and 2. It is impossible to sell these just now, but you will get a chance later. When you can sell, get rid of them at any price. 3. If the price declines further you had better average. 4. I regard them as an investment. M. S. W.—Thanks for letter and enclosure. I am gathering data for a general article on the subject.

NEDLOG.—Three of the best. Certainly hold. NIGERIA.—1. It is quite likely that a rise may take place in September, and if your price is reached you had better make an exchange. 2. Of the two I prefer Madagascar Preference. NATIONAL.—See first reply to "Culverin" and average. NON-SKID.—1. Probably a dividend towards the end of next year, when you may expect a substantial increase in the price. 2. Yes. Madagascar Ordinary. NYASSA.—1. See first reply to "Aichbee." 2. Retain these. You ought to see a profit on them in the near future. NIKKO.—Keep them all for at least the next six months, at the end of which the prices should be higher. Number 4 is all right. Five per cent. is guaranteed for another three years, when the company should be earning a dividend. NELMES.—1 The expected autumn revival may put these very much better, but no dividend can be expected before 1912. If you can wait you will get a higher price than the one you expect. 2. See reply to "Acre." 3. Both Mincing Lane and the Stock Exchange are represented on the board, and you may safely hold your shares for double figures. Thanks for your enclosure. See reply to "A. C." I am pleased to say that the great majority of my correspondents are men of substance and sportsmen, not "weak bulls screaming at a paper loss."

ORTLER.—1. A sound flotation, with a good board, but the shares are scarcely marketable. You had better wait for a revival, and then sell. 2 This was over-capitalised from the start, and the lucky vendors stipulated for £30,000 in cash. I advise you to buy no more. OVERSEER.—1-5. You may safely average any or all of these now. 6. Do not convert your Malacca Debentures yet Thanks for interesting letter. OAKLEAF.—1-2. Both excellent companies. 3. Should be sold now.

PETER SIMPLE.—1. See reply to "Acre," and average on any decline below the present price. 2. Buy either Kinta Kellas or Madagascar Ordinary. POOR MAN.—The only course open is to await a market recovery. PROC.—As regards your rubber queries, 3 is expected to get an 8s. dividend at least, and this would justify a rise to £5. 4 Wait for the meeting to be held after the holidays, and you will find that the company is doing remarkably well. 5. In addition to your Preference holding, which is about the cheapest share in the market, I advise you to buy the shares recommended in Rubber Notes this and last week. You need not be afraid of the recent set-back. 6. The present level of prices seems tempting; I should not delay purchases beyond August. PARA.—Do not buy any more of them. 1. Is said to be a fair concern, but I have never recommended the shares. 2-3. I regard these as unsatisfactory companies, and I advise you to get rid of the shares as soon as you can do so without loss. You had better buy the shares recommended to "E. M. M." PLAINSPEAKER.—You should number your queries. I would not buy any of the shares you name, with the exception of Mabiras and United Sumatras. If you have already bought, and would like to have a further opinion, please write again, mentioning the price given.

QUANDOS.—1-3. See first reply to "Culverin." The meeting will be held immediately after the holiday season. QUERY.—1-2. Retain for market recovery. There is nothing wrong with the company. 3. This is a very good company, but I do not advise a purchase at the present premium. QUADRANT.—1. No. 2. You ought easily to double your money in course of time.

RADIUM.—1. See first reply to "A. B. C." 2. In good hands, but a long wait. I should not hold. 3. Probably, but if they do, sell. 4. Good to hold for a profit and ultimately for dividends. 5. You will probably see 1s. premium before long. RUBBER GRUBBER.—a. Hold for a good profit, as you bought at a very reasonable price. b. See reply to "Acre." RESI.—1. Your broker is wrong, as you will find during the autumn, when both these shares will recover rapidly. 2. The chairman has just returned, and the meeting to be held after the holidays should be more than satisfactory. RODDY.—1. There is always a market in these shares. Wait for the next meeting, and do not be nervous. 2-3. The two Bukit shares should be kept for a few months, when I will fix selling limits. REGENT.—1. This is one of the best shares in the market. Next year's dividend should be at the rate of 200 per cent., and full details of the future should be forthcoming at the October meeting. 2. Hold these for 30s.

TRUTH will be sent weekly to any address in the British Islands for 7s. for 3 months; 14s. for 6 months; or £1 9s. 1d. for 12 months (including Christmas Number). The subscription to Canada (Thin Edition) is: 7s. 7d. for 3 months; 15s. 2d. for 6 months; £1 11s. 6d. for 12 months (including Christmas Number). To the Colonies and Foreign Countries (Thick Edition): 3 months, 8s. 8d.; 6 months, 17s. 4d.; 12 months, £1 15s. 10d. (including Christmas Number). All cheques and P.O.O.s should be made payable to THE MANAGER OF TRUTH, and addressed to Truth Buildings, Carteret Street, London, S.W.

Eastern brokers prophesy a large output after October. 3. Keep for at least £9. REIHA.—You ought to have mentioned the purchase price. 1. I should sell this share on a market recovery. 2. Ought eventually to go to £7 3. See first reply to "Aichbee." ROTSEVNI.—1 and 2. Keep your shares and see first reply to "Culverin." 3. Your broker will get you the price. RUSSELL.—You need not be in the least worried about the recent set-back in prices, as you hold some of the best shares in the rubber market. Hold them all for improvement. RAJAH.—Quite desirable to hold. ROOKE.—Hold all for market revival and eventual profit. RUBY.—1-2. Both purchases would prove excellent investments ultimately, but no dividend can be expected on either for a year or two. RETIRO.—It is a pity that you did not ask first. You will find that you have purchased shares in three unsatisfactory companies.

SIMON.—Stick to the shares you have now. SOMERSET.—a, b, and d will prove remunerative, but c is a doubtful proposition. SHANGHAI.—1. Belongs to a good group, but is perhaps the least satisfactory of that group. 2 and 3. I regret that I have no knowledge of these companies, as there is no market for them in London. SUCHARD.—I have never recommended a purchase of these. As you can afford to wait you had better do so until markets recover from their present apathy, and then sell. SIRRON.—I should retain all three for recovery. With regard to 3 see first reply to "A. B. C." SUNNY FOLKESTONE.—You need not feel worried. Both your shares will prove remunerative even during the first twelve months. SUNSHINE.—1. A good speculative investment, likely to improve in value in the near future. 2. No dividend yet. See first reply to "Non-Skid." SHELBOURNE.—1. Will one day pay good dividends, but not yet. You can do better. 2. Your broker who tells you to sell Anglo-Malays, Patalings, and Cicelys because they are not investment shares belongs to the old school who have not taken the trouble to learn anything about rubber. The shares of the best companies will always be good industrial investments. SLAINTE.—See first reply to "Aichbee." STONEBOW.—1. Both replies referred to Crudes. 2. Within twelve months from the present time. SNOSRAP.—I do not like any of the shares you hold, but I should not attempt to sell them now. Wait until the market recovers, and then be prepared to cut a small loss. SHARES.—The chairman's speech gave full details justifying an estimate of £300,000 profit, which is greater than the amount of the existing capital. The balance-sheet next year will show the wisdom of the suggested selling limit.

THANKFUL.—1 and 2. I should wait for a small profit on these. I do not regard them as permanent investments. 3. It is quite likely that you may see a sharp rise in these before the end of the year, but you must look upon them as a speculation, and take a shilling or so profit. T. G.—1 See first reply to "Culverin." 2. As long as you want to clear out you had better accept 1s. 3d. premium when you can get it. TROQUEER.—Do not sell now, as there is a very limited market for the shares, and you would have to accept a low price, even if you could deal. Wait for a partial recovery, then sell and write again with reference to reinvestment. T. S. K.—Of the shares mentioned 2 is, of course, a proved good investment share. 1 and 3 are more speculative, but should turn out well eventually. With regard to 3, see first reply to "Aichbee." TALMA (Swansea).—1. I still think well of them. See first reply to "A. B. C." 2 You had better look on these as an investment. You are getting 6 per cent. on your investment, and one day you will be able to get much more than the limit you name. If you did not read the report of the chairman's speech at the statutory meeting, you had better ask the secretary for a copy. Both Allagars and Beverleys should prove good investments. TRAH.—You should have mentioned the cost in each case. 1. I should take 1s. premium. Hold for 4s. premium. 3. Sell when you can. T. J. K.—See reply to "A. B. C."

UNEASY.—1. The firm is a respectable one, and if you write, pointing out the abnormal delay in sending you the certificate, they will either get it for you or give you an explanation. When did you sign the transfer? The question of receiving the dividend direct from the company depends upon this. 2. Hold all these for recovery. UNEX.—Your rule for the selection of a share is not an ideal one. It is often more advantageous to buy a good share at a premium than a second-rate one at a discount. See shares recommended in reply to "E. M. M."

VENDOR.—This is not one of my recommendations. The board of directors is composed of able men, but the vendors took too much. You had better hold for better times, and then sell. VULCANITE.—The twelve shares you name would, of course, make an excellent trust, but it would not be wise to split up the sum you have to invest into such small amounts, as when you came to sell you would have to do so at a sacrifice. Buy any four of them. VIGORNIAN.—You may rely upon not losing your capital in these shares, which you should lock up for a year or two. VAT.—A good investment. VINTAGE.—2, 5, and 6. Are good purchases at present prices, but I should not buy 3 or 4. 1. Is said to be a good concern, but I have never recommended it. VESTRO.—You may buy any of the shares named, but do not look on 5 as a permanent investment. VERITAS.—1-3. You had better sell, as quite recent advices are unfavourable, notwithstanding that this has been considered a first-rate investment. If you have signed the transfer you need not worry; you can sell without the certificate having been sent to you.

WEST COUNTRY.—You hold four good investment shares, and you need not be alarmed at the small paper loss. Retain for recovery and excellent dividends in the future. WATERLOO.—Brokerage depends upon the actual value of the shares bought or sold. There is no standard scale, but charges by different brokers are very much alike, except for shares of small value, when the rate may vary from ¼d. to 2d. per share, according to the number of shares bought and the idiosyncrasy of the broker. If you care to write again, giving the price of the shares dealt in, I shall be pleased to tell you whether you have been overcharged. WOODWORK.—You may safely buy 3 and 1, in this order. 2. Is getting too high to buy now. W. D.—1. Should eventually come right. 2. I should wait a little, and then average. 3. A good investment share. WEARY WILLIE.—1 and 2. I should not hold these very long. Take a small profit when you can. 3. When the certificates are ready the company will send you a notice. It may take three months after allotment to get the certificates ready. WASP.—Do not buy the shares of the rubber company you name. You will find that you cannot do better than to take the shares mentioned in reply to "E. M. M." WARREN.—I advise you to have nothing to do with the company you mention. W. S. S.—1. Certainly hold. There is no special reason for the fall. 2. A very good company. Shares talked much higher.

X. Y. B.—1. I should not buy any more. 2. Yes. 3. I should not hold these. XOLI.—1. Yes. 2. A small profit. My selling limit was £10. 3. £6. 4-5. They have paid dividends for several years. May pay 8s. per share. 6. 14s. 7. About 20 per cent. 8. 10s. 9-10. Dividend, perhaps, next year. 11. 12s. 6d. 12. Next year. As to your other queries, please see Rule 2. XERXES.—1. I should be content to sell at £2. 2. Take a small profit. XERO.—Not a popular share, but if you wish to buy I should not dissuade you, as about six years hence the output will be enormous. The debentures are a good investment, but quite unmarketable.

YROHAN.—1-2. I should certainly not buy these. YENDAHCEA.—1. My selling limit is 2s. premium. 2 Best left alone. YORKSHIRE.—1. Hold them all for recovery. 2. Madagascar ordinary 3 No.

ZERO.—1. Vine and General Pref. 2. Fix the limit at 4s. premium. This limit and that given for 3 should be practicable within the next twelve months. ZED Tapping will begin next year, when a dividend should be earned. ZED (Portmadoc).—1. The prospects are good. You will get at least 10 per cent. the first year. 2. Yes. See first reply to "A. B. C." 3. I do not care to recommend a purchase.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A JEWISH.—Your Consols should realise about £1,600, and through the Post Office Savings Bank you can buy an annuity which will give you about £200 per annum. The postmaster at any post office will give you full particulars. A. T.—1. I have no recent particulars of the company. 2. Sell them. A VICTIM.—I have not heard that it has any such connection. Can you give any information?

BACHELOR.—1 Too speculative. 2. Of the two sell the engineering shares. B. W.—1. No; it should be avoided. 2. Evidently a bucket-shop; and I shall be obliged if you will send me any circulars, etc. Do not believe any advertising firms who promise to make money for you by dealings in stocks and shares. They are in business to make money for themselves, which they do at the expense of inexperienced customers BACHELOR.—1. Have nothing to do with this so-called bank. 2-3. Bucket-shop firms; see reply to "B. W." 4. Not advised. Write again for a reply under "Insurance," as to a combined life policy and house purchase scheme. BRUFF.—On your statement of the facts I do not think you are liable. Whether they will be likely to sue it is, of course, impossible for me to say. Wait and see, and if they take action, consult a solicitor. BRUSH.—Your information as to the bucket-shop connection is correct, and I regard the shares as quite worthless, but I am afraid you are liable for the further call.

CORNUBIENSIS.—1. There is a possibility. 2. Better sell. See the report just issued. CHEMIST.—Hold both CLEVELAND.—Thanks; I had already arranged to deal with the tea-producing companies

D. P. H. LOND.—I would not recommend them. The company withholds particulars of its accounts.

E. C.—I referred last week to the Julian Hawthorne circularising campaign. Of course, the shares of the Hawthorne Silver and Mines, Limited, should be left alone. E. H. G. M.—No; Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. sell such bonds at prices vastly in excess of their actual market value.

FRANK.—I maintain a good opinion of them. FELIX.—Apply for information to Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 31, Threadneedle Street, E.C. FERGUS.—See reply to "E. C." FRANCO.—Have nothing to do with them or any firm offering to deal on that system. You will only burn your fingers.

GEORGE.—You would not be prejudiced by standing aloof, but I should think it would be worth while to join in the attempt to secure a favourable settlement. The matter was dealt with in a recent issue.

JINKEE.—Fairly well. J. G.—See reply to "E. C." J. K. (Curragh Camp).—Several references have been made in TRUTH to Mr. Joseph A. Chown and his St. Cecile Casino Company. My opinion of the share-pusher and the shares is distinctly unfavourable.

MOTT.—1. Has good features, but should, of course, be regarded as speculative. 2. See Rule 2. 3. Sell when the market is a little more active.

PLYMPTONIAN.—Somewhat speculative but fair. PUCK.—I cannot trace the concern. P. T. D.—I advise you not to deal with any outside firms, but to do your business through a member of the Stock Exchange.

QUESTION.—1. Nothing specially attractive in the offer. It is only at about the market price. 2. I know nothing of them. QUORN.—1. Millar's Karri and Jarrah Ordinary. 2 and 3. Both fair concerns.

RAGA.—I have not sufficient information to advise. Why not select an English company? R. F. C.—Thanks; but numerous warnings against the Duncan Forbes and Co. bucket shop have already been published in TRUTH.

S. P. STEWARD.—I do not recommend the concern you name. You ought to make absolute safety your first consideration and keep your money in the P.O. Savings Bank.

VAT.—A fair purchase.

W. C.—My candid opinion of the shares is that they are worthless.

VIGILANT.

INSURANCE.

OWING to pressure upon my space this week I am obliged to hold over my Insurance article; but I give below replies to a number of inquiries which have reached me:—

Economic.—You would only lose by changing. I may refer to the matter in my article next week. Hesper.—(1) Results would be in the same proportion, but the effect of income tax is less on smaller incomes. (2) Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York. (3) There is no insurable interest in the life of a child, and with profit endowment assurance is more profitable than a child's endowment. Sero.—The Corporation is respectable, but unless it can find a purchaser for your certificate I do not know how you can dispose of it. I do not think you would be well advised to pay up the premiums in arrear. It is a quite unsatisfactory kind of contract. Sirron.—Scottish Life or Norwich Union Life. Kitoto.—(1) Probably North British and Mercantile. (2) Commercial Union or Norwich Union. (3) Good for fire and accident, but you can probably do better elsewhere for life assurance. Lux.—For your purpose the Scottish Provident is best. In regard to the point you raise, the extra would very likely not be charged at all, or if it were it would be infinitesimal. Werrobda.—Commercial Union, Norwich Union Life, or Eagle. G. J. O.—Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York. Walford.—The company is over one hundred years old. It is quite sound, and has improving prospects. House (Cork).—Scottish Temperance Life Insurance Company. Jubilee (Edinburgh).—Either Clerical, Medical and General, or double endowment assurance in Atlas or Eagle. G. G.—Section 66, Finance Act, 1910.

THE RITZ HOTEL AND RESTAURANT, PICCADILLY. Gerrard 8000. Overlooking the Green Park. Magnificent Ball and Banqueting Suites. Same Management and Tariff as the Carlton.

WHY PAY RENT? Take an Immediate Mortgage, free in event of death, from the SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE LIFE OFFICE. Repayments usually less than rent. Mortgage expenses paid by the Company. Prospectus from London Office, 3, Cheapside, E.C.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

BATU TIGA RUBBER.

The fourth annual general meeting of the Batu Tiga (Selangor) Rubber Company, Limited, was held on the 19th inst. at Winchester House, E.C., Mr. L. T. Boustead presiding.

The Chairman, in the course of his speech, said: This is our fourth annual meeting. It is not always pleasant to have to eat one's words; but when the operation is rendered necessary owing to one's estimates of crop, and the price realised by that crop being ridiculously below the mark, it is wonderful how readily the digestive organs come to the rescue. Our manager's estimate of the crop for the year with which we are dealing—i.e., 1909—amounted to only 18,000 lbs. of rubber, and his estimates at that time for this year and next were only 36,000 lbs. and 82,000 lbs. respectively. Against these estimates we secured a crop last year of 35,733 lbs., or nearly as much as he had estimated for the current year, and he has since had occasion to raise his estimates for this year twice—first to 70,000 lbs. and ultimately to 95,000 lbs. Again, this time last year we did not dare reckon on realising more than 6s. per lb. gross for the 1909 and 1910 crops, whereas we actually realised 7s. 7d. per lb. net for the 1909 crop, and up to date our sales of 1910 crop have netted an average of 8s. 2d. per lb. I do not propose to-day to touch on our next year's estimate, as I consider that in six months' time our manager will be in a very much better position to form a correct idea; and as soon as we know it ourselves you will be notified, as usual, through the columns of the press; but I do propose to-day to deal with our estimate of profit for the current year, and to give you some idea of how we consider it had best be dealt with, as it has always been our policy to take you fully into our confidence. . . . With regard to the present year, I think we may now safely count on a profit in the region of £30,000, and that, after making provision for depreciation and the repayment to the vendors of the small balance due to them in respect of their guarantee, writing off the underwriting commission, brokerage, and debenture expense account, we ought to have a balance of about £25,000 to deal with. Until quite recently it was impossible for us to frame any definite line of policy with regard to either the further development of the estate or to the disposal of the profits, as, under our agreement with the guarantors of the debenture issue, we were prohibited from issuing further capital, except in the form of convertible debentures at par, and that we were very naturally unwilling to do. I am glad to be able to tell you, however, at this meeting that we are now no longer hampered in that respect, having purchased our freedom by the issue, since the date of this balance-sheet, of £750 worth of debentures. We can now issue shares at a premium, and as we have a heavy capital outlay to meet this year, it is just as well that we should be able to do so. In all, I calculate we shall require about £7,000, irrespective of any outlay on extensions. We could, of course, meet it all out of revenue; but as, independently of this, we propose to entrench on that revenue, as I have already explained to you, to the extent of about £5,000, I do not suppose you would wish to see it depleted by a further £7,000; and, considering our very moderate capitalisation—only about £45 per acre—I do not think it would be sound policy. It is our intention, therefore, without loss of time, to make a fresh issue of shares, say one share for every twenty shares held. These will, of course, be offered pro rata to the shareholders. I may say that no resolution has, as yet, been passed by the board, but we are of the opinion that these shares should be offered at a premium to our shareholders of £3 per share. I now have pleasure in moving the adoption of the report and accounts.

The motion was seconded by Mr. J. C. Tate, and carried unanimously.

STANDARD OIL OF CANADA.

Mr. George Macdonald, presiding at the statutory meeting of the Standard Oil Co. of Canada, Ltd., said that the Company was formed to take over the assets of what was known in Canada as the Crown Gas and Oil Co. They had taken over from that Company two farms known as the Vince and Halliday, on which there were certain oil-producing wells, and in addition they had taken over some 10,000 acres of undeveloped land which was reported to be petroliferous. With regard to what they had taken over there were the two farms upon which oil had been proved to exist, and upon each of which there were three wells giving an average production of ten barrels of oil per day. Since the negotiations were entered into for the acquisition of these territories a fourth well had been sunk which was giving oil at the rate of twenty-five barrels a day. Therefore they now had seven producing wells—four on the Halliday Farm and three on the Vince Farm—which were producing in all 100 barrels of oil per day. Assuming that they were able to continue this production for 300 working days in the year, they would be producing 30,000 barrels of oil, which at the present price of oil ruling in Canada, in addition to the 52½ cents bounty paid by the Government upon oil produced in the Dominion of Canada, would mean an income of about £10,000 for the year. They had gone into the question of the sinking of further wells, and it was estimated that during the next eight months they would be able to drill a further fourteen wells—seven upon each farm—and assuming that those wells yielded the same amount of oil, namely, ten barrels per well per day, they would then be in the position of having a further gross income at the end of their first working year of £21,240. On the two farms mentioned there was room for a further twelve wells in addition to the fourteen alluded to. He did not say that they would get those wells sunk during the present year, but if they could do so they might look for a further production of some £10,800, and allowing the same rate of $3,000 per well for the sinking they would, if they could carry out all these operations, have a gross profit of £34,140. From this had to be deducted some £4,000 for administration expenses. In that case the Company should have available at the end of its first working twelve months a sum equal to about £30,000 to be distributed among the shareholders.

GOLD COAST RUBBER AND MAHOGANY ESTATES, LIMITED.

The first general (statutory) meeting of the Gold Coast Rubber and Mahogany Estates, Limited, was held at the Institute of Chartered Accountants, Moorgate Place, E.C., on the 20th inst., Sir Brodrick C. D. A. Hartwell, Bart. (chairman of the company) presiding.

The Chairman said, inter alia: This is, as you are doubtless aware, merely a formal meeting held to comply with the requirements of the Companies Act. One of your directors, Mr. W. H. Tinney, has gone out to the Coast. He is very well known on the Coast, and he knows the Coast well. He has taken with him two gentlemen, Mr. Campbell and Mr. Koens, who both have considerable experience of the West Coast of Africa. When Mr. Tinney returns they will take charge of the property, and continue the policy laid down by him. Mr. Tinney will also examine thoroughly the gold reefs on your properties. From verbal information given to us by an expert, a mining engineer, who is not connected with the company in any way, but who has been over the properties, on one of the leases known as the Essikame, he has reported a banket reef there. He says that this is equal to anything he has seen on the West Coast of Africa, and the appearance is very promising. We shall no doubt consider later on the question of the formation of a subsidiary gold mining company to work this part of the property. A letter has just been received from Mr. Tinney, from which I will read a few extracts. The letter was dated from Axim, and refers to the march from Axim to the property. He goes on to say that on his way he came across several very healthy Funtumia trees near the Fort, and on kicking one of these trees it yielded a cupful of latex, which coagulated readily on their perspiring hands, and that in thirty seconds they were able to draw a few threads from their fingers. Most of the rest deals with his march onwards, and his interviews with the King of Benin, who, he tells us, is well disposed towards this country. He says that there can be no doubt that the company's land is well placed, but that one question he will have to consider before leaving the country is that of transport. He understood that the King was quite willing to grant them any more land if they required it. The titles of the properties are now in order; all rents have been paid up to date, possession has been taken, and before now work has doubtless been commenced. Your directors have undertaken on your behalf the control of another property. Having a strong working capital and a large cash balance at our bankers which was not required for the present for the development of your property, your directors deemed it advisable to look around and endeavour to find some use for that money. Recently we secured on very favourable terms what we believe to be one of the most valuable rubber plantation properties which has yet been offered to the public. The estate is situated in the Kamerun Colony, West Africa, and comprises three-quarters of a million of planted rubber trees. The trees range up to six years old. Tapping will commence immediately, and the property will shortly rank as one of the largest producers of plantation rubber. The underwriting arrangements are now in hand, and a company will shortly be brought out with a capital of £150,000 to acquire the property from the Gold Coast Rubber and Mahogany Estates, which will be the parent company. You will make a satisfactory profit in cash, and at the same time acquire a very valuable interest in a large plantation company which will be immediately producing. Your directors have obtained a report on the property from a very well-known man of high standing, and his report is very satisfactory.

COVERDEN RUBBER AND PRODUCE.

The statutory general meeting of the Coverden Rubber and Produce Company, Limited, was held at the London Commercial Sale Rooms, Mincing Lane, E.C., the Right Hon. Lord Teynham presiding.

The Chairman said: This is the statutory meeting of the company, and there are no resolutions to pass. But I will take this opportunity of saying something as to the position and prospects of the company. Its property consists of 1,625 acres of freehold land in the colony of British Guiana. The estate has been taken over as a going concern, a considerable area being now under cultivation, and some of the crops ready to be reaped. 300 acres are planted with cocoa trees, nearly all bearing, 21 acres with coffee trees in full bearing, and there are, in addition, 2,000 nutmeg trees in full bearing, and lastly, besides other produce, 1,000 rubber trees about two years old. The company will therefore be in a position to earn a considerable income from the start. It will be able to take advantage of the large amount of money which has been spent on the property by its late owners, and with the working capital at its command will be able to further develop the production of the present crops. One of the principal objects which the directors have in view is to justify the title of the company by proceeding with a more extensive cultivation of rubber. Rubber from British Guiana is as good, or nearly as good, as that from any other part of the world. Climate and soil are alike favourable, and, as regards this particular estate, we have been informed by a high official of the colony that three-fourths of it are suitable for the growth of rubber. It is, therefore, the intention of the directors to plant as soon as possible a further 800 acres with rubber, both the well-known Hevea and also Sapium Jenmani. The latter is a species indigenous to the colony, and has the advantage of coming to maturity in three years. Without entering into the controversy as to the respective merits of plantation and wild rubber, it is safe to say that the product of this company's plantations will be able to be sold at a handsome profit with rubber at a third of its present price. We should be able to plant 145,000 rubber trees, and if we only make 1s. per lb. profit on the produce of these trees when they come into full bearing, our annual profit would be more than £21,000, in addition to the profits to be derived from the sale of cocoa and coffee. Fears have been entertained with regard to some plantations as to labour difficulties. We need have none on that score. There are 100 labourers now on the estate, and we are informed that others can be obtained from a neighbouring village. That is all I have to say, except that the directors are informed that the property is ready to be transferred, and that the purchase money has been deposited with the Colonial Bank, London. Mr. Kidman, a gentleman in whom the directors have every confidence, and who has had twenty years' experience as a planter in the colony, has left England for the purpose of taking up his duties as manager. We will all hope that the future of the company will bear out the opinion conveyed to the directors by those who ought to know—viz., that the Coverden Estate is the finest in the whole of British Guiana.

JAVA PARA RUBBER ESTATES.

The Statutory General Meeting of the Java Para Rubber Estates, Limited, was held on the 25th inst. at Salisbury House, London Wall, E.C., Major Frank Johnson presiding.

The Chairman said that in connection with the transfer of the property, the directors had arranged that the managing director, the Hon. Edward Coke, should proceed to Java at once to check the assets and to see to the transfer. They were singularly fortunate in having secured the services of Mr. Coke as managing director, for he had had many years' experience in working his own plantations in the East with his own capital. The board were now in possession of Mr. Coke's report and were able to inform the shareholders of its purport. In the first place, it showed that the estate was there, and with one small exception, that every single asset stated by the vendors to be there had been found and more. Mr. Coke expressed satisfaction with the estates themselves and with the capability of the management. He had been informed that Wonokojo Estate was the best in Java, and, he added, having visited practically every acre of the large area owned by the company, that he had not seen a single blade of a particular grass which was often a cause of great trouble and expense on estates of this kind. In the prospectus it was stated that there were 26,500 Castilloa trees. Mr. Coke had found 26,510. Of Ficus elastica, the number given was 15,000 trees. Mr. Coke had found only 10,000 trees, a shortage of 5,000; but with regard to Hevea—the Para rubber which, it need hardly be said, was the most valuable of all the varieties of rubber—instead of the 125,000 trees which were supposed to be on the estate, the manager had found an additional 468 acres of planted healthy Para, which gave 73,000 trees more than had been mentioned by the vendors and included in their schedule. The company, therefore, started not only with the number of trees mentioned in the prospectus, but with 73,000 Hevea trees in addition, less 5,000 Ficus trees, or a net balance of 68,000 trees to the good. When these trees reached maturity in a few years, they would produce at least 2 lbs. of rubber per tree. Let them estimate that the price of rubber fell to 3s. per lb., that the profit was 2s. per lb., or 4s. per tree per annum. He thought they might safely take the value on the basis of five years' purchase, which would give a value of £1 per tree, or (say) nearly £70,000, from which might be deducted £5,000 or £6,000 as the cost of keeping the area clear of weed pending its arrival at maturity. Another point of view was that these trees should yield a profit of £15,000 per annum, or a little over 10 per cent. on the entire capital of the company from an asset which did not figure at all in the prospectus. (Hear, hear.) A considerable asset referred to in the prospectus was the Coffee Plantation. Wonokojo had the reputation of producing some of the best, if not the best coffee in Java, and they were informed that it commanded a very high price in the market. According to the vendors' statement in the prospectus, there were 1,000,000 Java coffee trees and 500,000 of the more prolific and more profitable Robusta coffee trees, but Mr. Coke had found that not only were the 1,000,000 Java trees present, but there were over 200,000 Robusta coffee trees over and above the number mentioned in the prospectus. They had thus 1,700,000 coffee trees on one of the best coffee estates in that part of Java. On the subject of the yield of coffee, laymen, reading the reports of experts, must be struck by the great margin of difference which existed in estimates of yields and profits. He (the chairman) had made a point of studying every estimate he had seen for some time past. They varied largely, but the lowest he had seen was that given by the vendors and incorporated in this company's prospectus, upon which the estimate of profits was based. Among the estimates he had seen was one by Mr. Malcolm Cumming, the well known manager of the Linggi Company, who, in reporting on an estate within 1,000 miles of Wonokojo, had laid down a certain formula. He stated that in the third and fourth year Robusta should yield 3 kattis, or 4 lbs. of coffee per tree, and that the value of the coffee was £3, or 36 guilders per picul (102 kattis); and that, as far as he could ascertain, the gross cost of production, preparation, and delivery to the market should not exceed 15 guilders, or £1 5s. per picul, leaving a profit of £1 15s. per picul. If that formula were applied to this company's coffee trees the result would be that the 700,000 Robusta trees actually planted, many of which would come into bearing in a few months, would yield 20,000 piculs, or a profit of £35,000; and when the whole 1,700,000 coffee trees came into bearing they would have 50,000 piculs, yielding £80,500. Reference to the prospectus would show that the estimated profits there given were not £35,000 or £80,000, but, based on the lowest figure he had seen, a profit of £23,000 was shown. Mr. Coke described the appearance of the coffee as magnificent, and he (the chairman) thought they had nothing to fear in facing the future with regard to coffee. Mr. Coke also reported the existence on the estate of 10,000 manilla hemp plants. He did not state their value or the estimated profits to be derived therefrom, but as a material portion of the capital asked for by Mr. Coke was for special machinery for treating the hemp plants, it must be assumed that they had a substantial commercial value. In the prospectus it was anticipated that with the capital provided they would plant a further 1,000 acres under Hevea in the next two years, so that by 1917 there would be 1,925 of rubber trees in bearing. This had to be modified in view of the fact that, of those 1,000 acres, 468 acres were found to be already planted without expense to the company. Instead of the planting being spread over the next two years, therefore, a further 542 acres would be planted during the current year, which meant that, by the end of this year, they would have 1,935 acres of rubber planted—10 acres more than the prospectus anticipated—and the whole of it would be in bearing in 1915 instead of 1917. ("Hear, hear.") The management left nothing to be desired. Four things were required for success in the growth of rubber. The first was the right soil, and that Mr. Coke asserted they had got. The second was the right climate and rainfall, which they were told they had got. The third was good management, and that also they enjoyed. The last, and he believed the greatest, factor was a constant supply of cheap and economical labour. If there was one cloud on the horizon of the East which was likely to grow in intensity with time it was the difficulty of finding the skilled labour that would be required for the enormous extensions of plantations that were being made. In Java, however, the island had a population of between 30,000,000 and 35,000,000 industrious people, the great majority of whom were only too glad to work.

BRITISH NORTH BORNEO RUBBER TRUST.

The statutory meeting of the British North Borneo Rubber Trust, Limited, was held yesterday at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C., Colonel Ivor Philipps, chairman of the Company, presiding.

The Secretary (Mr. W. Bellamy) having read the notice convening the meeting,

The Chairman said: Gentlemen, I presume you will take the report as read. I am in the chair here to-day taking the place of Lord Verulam, who is abroad. As you know, it is the statutory meeting called in compliance with the Companies Act. You have really all the information in the report before you, and there is no other business to be done. There are no resolutions to be passed, and there is no vote of any kind to be taken. It may interest you, however, to know that at the public issue there were 780,668 shares applied for, and the shares were allotted to 2,142 applicants—of course, the options in addition. A special settlement has already been granted on July 20 for shares and on July 21 for the options. The board got to work at once, and I think I may say with confidence that we have done good work already on your behalf. We have had various opportunities of doing good business, and I think we have done good business. There are other proposals now before us, which we hope will lead to still further useful business. Mr. Turner, one of our directors, who is an experienced planter, is visiting Borneo, Java, and the Malay Peninsula in the autumn and winter, and he is going to look after plantations and others where we have special interest, and I feel sure we shall benefit much by the reports that he will give us. We have been able to make good use of the capital with which you have entrusted us, and the investments, as you see, amount to a considerable sum. A matter of some interest to the shareholders is the question whether we are going to make a call or not. That subject has been before the board, but they have not yet decided to make a call, but, as soon as we find useful opportunities for issuing further capital, we shall make a further call, giving you, of course, the proper notice before we make that call. To reduce the expenses of management, we have got other companies in our office, as those shareholders who have been upstairs will have seen, and that, of course, will be beneficial in reducing the expenses. We have been interested in several recent issues, and we were glad to be able to secure for our shareholders preferential treatment in the last of these. We are not only taking an interest in Borneo, where we are on good terms with the Chartered Company which governs that country, but we are extending our operations and also the main land. Several shareholders have asked me why our shares are at a discount, and I can say at once I know of no reason for that. Our investments are worth more than we gave for them. I think it possible that the selling of some of the options which accompanied the shares by some of the shareholders may have tended to reduce the price on the market. However, that is really not a matter for the board, but I think if you take the present price of options and shares you will find the decrease in price is very small indeed.

Mr. Porter asked if the chairman would give any idea of the investments that had been made.

The Chairman: I think it would not be advisable. I know there are some trust companies which do it. Some good trust companies give lists of investments, but there are others that do not, and personally I am inclined to think it would not be beneficial to us, and I hope the shareholders will not ask for it. I know there are some who think the other way, and I think some who do give lists rather wish they did not—I mean in the interests of the company entirely.

Mr. Douglas Jones: I may say I have just attended a meeting of a very fine trust company, in which the same question was brought up, and the chairman did not hesitate to say that if they insisted upon it they would have to find another chairman and another board, so the question was not revived.

The Chairman: That is my view entirely.

The proceedings then terminated.

QUEER STORY.

THE HAND.

THERE was a time when Claude Soveral Murdock, M.D., had been wont to tabulate emotions and pigeonhole experiences, and to tell you the exact "ism" to which each was due. There was a time when Claude Soveral Murdock, M.D., had paradoxed Hamlet, and in effect had said, "There is not more in heaven and earth than is dreamed of in our philosophy." But that time has passed. The manner of its passing constitutes a curious story. Here it is.

Originally, Claude Soveral Murdock's horizon was bounded by three things—his Profession (this first, please, with a very capital P, for he was a student before everything), a "grand passion" possible sometimes even to students, and that indispensable set-off to a grand passion—a rival.

The object of the grand passion was his ward, a quite young girl with hair the colour of good rich chocolate, and eyes as full of changing shades as a trout-pool. She lived in Murdock's house under the chaperonage of his mother, and he meant (though he had not told her so) to marry her when he should have completed his book on Operable Aneurisms. The rival was a young genius who taught her music. He was the Cathedral organist, and the only music-master of repute in the city. He would one day, if fate had not interfered with his affairs, have been a very eminent person indeed.

Execution was his strong point, and the pianoforte his instrument. Those who sit musically in the seats of the mighty had begun to prophesy extremely smooth things on his behalf. Now, Murdock's ward, Vanda Giltrow by name, adored music—adored it with all the heart and soul of her; and her trout-pool eyes were so eloquent when her music-master, lost to everything but his art and her, performed on the Bechstein Dr. Murdock had given her, that Dr. Murdock gnashed with his teeth and consumed away.

But the music-master was an unsuspecting young soul. He knew nothing of the tempests which shake terribly such very self-contained men as Murdock. Pathetic to relate, he, the highly strung, warm-hearted genius, admired his pupil's guardian immensely, though from the standpoint of twenty-four he looked upon forty as decidedly middle-aged; and when he damaged his right arm just above the wrist with a rusty nail, and a good deal of pain and swelling ensued, he went and consulted the one person in the world whom his guardian angel should have warned him not to consult.

Referring to that consultation, I am quite unable to tell you at what psychological moment the devil entered into Murdock. He was not a deliberate villain by any means. It must have been a case of "how oft the sight of means to do ill deeds make deeds ill done." He perceived at once (for in his department he was a genius too) that the damaged arm was a simple, uncomplicated affair. Pathologically there was absolutely no reason why a rapid and thorough cure should not result. But he also saw (prompted thereto by the aforesaid devil) that one shade of neglect—just the least overdoing of some measure innocuous in itself—the introduction into the wound of a single drop of—but why go on? Man born of woman has descended into his abyss at one time or another; sometimes by the grace of God he has climbed out quickly. Occasionally he has sunk to the nethermost bottom and stayed there. Murdock did.

He held the musician's arm by the wrist—it was bare to the elbow. He held it in a steady grip, and noticed contemptuously how white and soft and shapely, and like a woman's, it was. He loathed the well-made hand, with its tapering fingers, because he had seen it once, when he had unexpectedly interrupted a music lesson, rest for a moment on the hand of his chocolate-haired ward. So he poked it and prodded it in the tender, suppurative spot, and he looked graver and graver.

The musician grew frightened; the dreams fell from his big eyes, and they became dark with fear.

"I say," he stammered, "it—it isn't anything much—anything that matters, is it?"

But Murdock did not reply. For five seconds, during which time he was absolutely silent, he halted, like Baal's prophets, between two opinions. His better and worse natures, coming to grips, fought wildly. A feather blowing one way or the other would have decided him. And alas! the feather came; only it took the form of Vanda, the chocolate-haired ward. She was slim and irresponsible, and much given to rushing in at crucial moments when she wasn't wanted, and begging pardon so prettily that one forgave her at once.

Now she appeared with a pleading smile and a damaged stylographic pen, persuasively upheld. "Oh, I beg your pardon—I didn't know that any one was——"

The doctor looked up sharply, and saw that the sight of the musician had brought that sanctified something to her eyes which he would have given his own soul to surprise. The musician's eyes returned the something with interest. Murdock's better nature crumpled up like a frost-bitten leaf. More devils capered to the aid of the first. Devils of jealousy are redder, I always fancy, and their tails are longer than the tails of the rest of their species.

They beset Murdock so furiously that he ordered Vanda sharply away, and the dressing he laid upon the wounded arm a few minutes later contained one drop more than was really necessary for his purpose.

The musician, cheering up (the sight of his pupil had helped to cheer him), thanked Murdock and said the pain felt easier already.

"You should have come to me before," Murdock told him; "I've done my best, but I'm afraid we are going to have trouble. Yes, I am very much afraid we are going to have trouble."

And therein he spoke the thing of which he knew!

The trouble came so swiftly that a specialist, whom Mr. Murdock unctuously called into a consultation, could only shake his grey head, play with the bunch of keys concealed in his trousers pocket, and blast the musician's future with many strange technicalities.

The musician, understanding that his future was being blasted, leant upon his sound elbow (he had been consigned to bed), and insisted on a translation.

"Rendered in the common tongue this all means?" the musician asked.

"Um—ah!—yes——" (the specialist rattled his keys furiously and looked away)

"Amputation, I'm sadly afraid, my dear fellow"

"Amputation?"

"Yes, below the elbow, and at once, or we'll be having the axilla involved. and——"

"You needn't go on," said the musician, from lips which had suddenly gone quite dry, and he looked at Dr. Murdock with affectionate and pleading eyes, as who should say, "I've believed in you; can't you save me?"

Dr. Murdock walked to the window.

"Below the elbow," murmured the specialist, tapping his toe on the carpet, and wishing himself a hundred miles away.

The venetian blind, rendered restless by a gale outside, rustled into silence.

"Below the——" he was beginning again, but the musician cried out suddenly:

"Damn localities!" It was the very first time he had ever sworn. "I wish it was my neck. I'd a great deal rather it was my neck—only I've got a sister who would be all alone. Oh! I beg your pardon, sir—you can't help it. Mayn't we go ahead now and get it over?"

They did get it over, but not quite at once—two days later, as a matter of fact. As it chanced, a sharp attack of (I think he called it neuritis) necessitating care kept Murdock from being present at the operation after all. Thereafter events moved swiftly on in their appointed order. The musician took the ashes of his ambition, the scarcely healed stump which was soon to be artificially completed, and his sister abroad. He meant to write harmless part songs for schools and choral societies and pretty little ballads. He could make a living more or less by such means, but he had not the true creative gift—only, where others had created, the gift of amazing interpretation. He meant also to forget his slim pupil with chocolate hair, because he, like Claude Murdock, had hesitated to offer her himself till he could offer her a position. She was one of the kind of girls whose faces demand that of a man.

Before he left he went with earnest eyes to thank Dr. Murdock for "the fight you made for it. I know," he added, "if it had been, humanly speaking, possible you would have saved it for me."

Then he held out his left hand, and the coals of fire which it contained must have seared Claude Murdock to the very marrow of his bones.

* * * * * *

"This book's playing havoc with my nerves," said Murdock a month later to his mother. "Could you give Vanda a hint (wrap it up very gently—and don't upset her) not to practise so perpetually treble parts alone. Unhappily I've got an ear, and when I'm working it worries me. I'm wanting all the time to put a bass to 'em."

Mrs. Murdock, who adored her son, conveyed this message to the best of her ability. The girl looked very surprised indeed.

"Oh, Mrs. Murdock, I don't," she protested. "I never practise treble parts alone—perhaps I ought to, but it's such a bore. Besides, I haven't touched the piano for ages—I haven't had the heart to." She turned rather pale—she had been prone to paleness of late—and her lips quivered.

Mrs. Murdock retailed this information to her son. "It must be one of the servants strumming, then," she said, quickly. "See that they don't."

So Mrs. Murdock harangued a surprised and resentful household, and that same evening, long after the household had retired to rest, Murdock, sitting up over his "Operable Aneurisms," was again conscious of a complicated treble part being exquisitely played on the Bechstein in the room above him in syncopated time, or what would have been syncopated time if a bass had assisted its syncopation. He ran upstairs at once, and the words he said to himself were not choice. He stole softly into the half-boudoir, half-study, which belonged to Vanda, and, though he groped and searched, and switched on light and searched again, he discovered nothing.

"Strain," he diagnosed—"strain, strain, strain!" He felt his pulse, examined his reflexes, and made up his mind to take a holiday when the last chapter of the book was complete. He did so. The recuperative powers of a seaside golf links are not capable of exaggeration. In a fortnight Claude Murdock was a new man.

It seemed good to him—a decent interval having elapsed since the musician's departure—to write to his ward and declare the consuming love he bore her. It was better that this knowledge—which he knew would take her immensely by surprise—should come in his absence. He begged her not to answer at random, but to let him know by word of mouth when he returned. It was a beautiful, self-restrained letter. Murdock was proud of it. He believed passionately in his own chances now that his path was clear.

A week later he returned home at dusk, and let himself in with his latchkey. He was full of blissful anticipations—so blissful that they were almost an agony.

Vanda was not in the hall nor yet on the stairs. He glanced up, half-expecting to see her peeping over the baluster. Then he ran up into her room. She was not there either. He stood for a moment or two by the mantelpiece, his right elbow resting upon it. The room was in deep shadow, but just then it suited him. He was shaking from head to foot, for the moment was so poignant, so utterly full of roseate possibilities. Of course, the girl was shy of meeting him before officious servants. She would come now.

And, as he stood, all at once someone seemed to start up from the piano, and a hand with long, tapering fingers crept into his and pressed it softly, and, with the low, deep, inarticulate cry of a reserved man's utter satisfaction, he drew it to him, and threw out his other arm to enfold the slender form of the woman who he believed had brought him his answer.

And then he shouted out—at least, he thought he was shouting, but the hoarse quack of the nightmare stricken was all that came.

"Oh, my God—oh, my just God!" For there was no form to clasp, only a smooth, naked arm severed below the elbow-joint, and a hand which clung to him as some small, soft octopus of the nethermost sea might have clung to a drowning mariner.

There are climaxes with which the mere pen wrestles in vain. This is one of them. Murdock fought the loathsome thing, trying to shake it off—to tear it off, if need be, finger by finger—and that his punishment might not be mitigated one jot or tittle he did not lose consciousness—no, not though he abandoned philosophy and prayed aloud that he might do so.

In due season his moans brought a frightened maid, who switched on the electric bulbs and made deferentially surprised inquiries.

With the advent of light the thing was over, and Murdock emerged from the pit, dry-lipped and ashen, and faked a lie about stumbling in the dark over a footstool and spraining his wrist.

"Where is Mrs. Murdock?" he asked, and the maid looked uncomfortable.

"Miss Vanda, sir—hadn't you heard?—left home sudden, sir, last night unbeknown to us. The mistress have gone to try and find her."

Then the pit engulfed him once more, and he made a realisation—and that realisation was the very bitterest the human soul can ever make, because it was realisation that he had sinned in vain.

* * * * * *

Murdock, having sacrificed his peace of mind for a mortal, and having wooed that mortal fruitlessly, set himself next, with the dogged obstinacy which belongs to natures such as his, to woo an immortal. He paid court to Fame for fifteen interminable years, and at last she smiled on him, and laid laurels on the brow that was far too lined for the fifty-five summers and winters which had passed over it.

There had been moments since we last met him such as do not bear dwelling upon. One had occurred at his mother's deathbed. The drug which would have restored her, at any rate for a time, reposed in a cupboard downstairs. Realising that she must die then and there if he did not fetch it, he raced down; but a slim, white, strong young hand, with long, clinging fingers and a length of naked arm which ceased at the elbow, seized his as he lifted it to the cupboard door, and would not be shaken off. His mother died whilst he fought it, and for the rest of that night and periodically afterwards were performed brilliantly on Vanda's piano movements perfect in execution save that they lacked a bass.

Murdock sold the Bechstein. He had clung to it because it had belonged to the woman he loved; and his hair, which was iron grey, became white. Still he worked harder than ever. Later on he astonished the surgical world by a series of discoveries relative to major surgery, and achieved a baronetcy and several big appointments. For two years peace fell.

Then a Royal Princess fell sick—sick unto death; and the telephones which were set in motion brought two surgeons of repute to the sick-room—the household physician and Murdock.

Murdock was Sir Claude now, and, with his pet anæsthetist, he came tiptoeing to the bedside, a thin, sunken, prematurely old man with bright, defiant eyes.

An hour's steady consultation, and the expedient was plain. Just the crucial, delicate, but permanently successful operation which Murdock could perform more skilfully than any man on earth—an operation indeed of his very own invention, requiring a steadiness and an understanding which brought it very nigh to a miracle.

So a couple of hours later, equipped for their office, the doctors trooped back, and Murdock's pet anæsthetist was dispensing his mercy to the already inert patient, when Murdock staggered and began to drag frantically at his right hand with his left, as if he sought to draw off a glove. A little foam bubbled on to his lips—his eyes grew glassy.

There was a stunned pause. Then some one led him from the room. He told one of the surgeons—a little time having elapsed—that angina was his family curse. He said it between gasps.

The surgeon immediately sounded his heart, and finding it healthy was duly puzzled. The operation itself was eventually performed by this same surgeon, and badly performed, so that the patient's recovery was slow and painful. Murdock was packed off home. His fair reputation was blasted. A whisper of drink, as such whispers will, had gone around, and a couple of voracious reporters nosing around the palace like pariah dogs lapped it up in spite of all precautions.

* * * * * * *

Murdock threw himself back in the first class carriage which was to carry him from the scene of his egregious failure. His mind, which had quivered often on the borderland of a Desperate Remedy, was grimly made up. He did not pause to reason any longer, but directly the train had started he dived into a small surgical bag which always accompanied him on such occasions as the present, and brought out a small well-kept revolver.

It was loaded, and he passed it from one hand to the other, and pointed it here and there, trying the sight as if he were about to practise at a target. The fact that a smallish bearded clergyman with an Inverness coat and a newspaper had come in from the next carriage of the corridor and sat down, did not altogether disturb Murdock, though it made him instinctively conceal his weapon.

The clergyman's face was kind—a face to trust. Murdock stared at him, and a great human longing to ease his tortured soul overmastered the many emotions which tore him. The longing increased.

At last he rose and pulled the door to, and without further resistance he succumbed to his desire.

"It's a priest's duty to hear confessions, isn't it?" he asked, suddenly.

"It is," the little clergyman said, very kindly.

"Will your hear one at an unconventional time from a desperate man?" Murdock spoke in jerks, scarcely listening to the answers.

The clergyman looked at the prosperous fur coat and raised his eyebrows slightly. "If I can be of the smallest use," he hesitated, and his voice conveyed the impression that he meant to soothe.

And thereupon the whole tragedy poured out. Murdock, like most self-contained people, was when he chose an eloquent man, and he told it well—sparing himself no ugly detail. He leant forward gesticulating—pouring the whole horrid story into his companion almost by main force.

The clergyman sat very still; but something flashed into his quiet eyes that was more than interest. He seemed to be grappling with a problem which was too strong for him. Murdock stood up as he drew near the end of his narrative, tramped the carriage from end to end, leaving, though he did not realise it, the revolver exposed to the gaze of his companion.

"Nerves," he cried out, "nerves, you'll say—all nerves. But I believe it's God's justice, though I never used to believe in such a thing."

The clergyman leant across, and with his left hand captured the revolver.

"And this was to be the solution?" he said, and held it up accusingly.

"This is to be the solution," Murdock corrected him—"if not now, at least presently. Have you a better one?"

Then the clergyman stood up, too, his eyes dilated. He flung back his long Inverness coat. He lifted the wrist of his right arm with his left hand, and placed that right hand in the right hand of Murdock. It was an awkward jerky movement, and Murdock instinctively clasping the fingers found them not flesh and blood, but unyielding wood. His white face turned a shade whiter.

"What does this mean?" he gasped, retaining his hold.

"It means," said the little clergyman, solemnly, "that time and circumstances have altered two men past mutual recognition. It means that one man found balm for a wounded spirit, whilst the other in seeking balm for a wounded conscience found——"

"Hell!" Murdock cried—"Hell at its worst."

The little clergyman nodded. "I don't pretend to understand it," he said; "such matters as you have shown me are beyond my ken. But I understand this: to your 'peccavi' I answer, 'I forgive'—I who have the best right to say it. My hand on it."

Murdock shook the poor senseless thing of wood—clasping it till he was almost fain to break it; and a great and an indescribable peace descended upon them.

"And Vanda?" Murdock gasped—the light which broke over his thin face quite transfiguring it.

"Vanda came straight to me, God bless her! She is my wife."

"WHAT'S Wrong With the World?" (1) Everything. But you cannot curse the spite that Mr. Chesterton was born to set it right. He comes bouncing upon the stage of the tragedy like one of Shakespeare's clowns, turning himself (and all else) head over heels. You are walking with Alice through the Looking Glass Land, where everything is reversed. You are looking at everything as Emerson suggests that you should look at some too familiar view—with your back to it, your face upside down and peering from between your knees. When someone thus began a conversation with Sydney Smith, "I venture to say, sir, without any fear of contradiction——," the wit interrupted with, "I beg your pardon, sir, but do you know Mr. Hallam?" For Hallam was so contradictory that, according to the same authority, he would jump out of bed in the coldest night of winter to correct the watchman when he shouted, "Half-past three o'clock," to roar back, "It's nothing of the sort. It's twenty-five minutes to four o'clock!" Mr. Chesterton would shout back not only that the watchman's watch was wrong, but that all watches were wrong, that only sundials could be depended upon, and that since the infernal invention of clocks and watches the art of constructing sun-dials was lost. For that matter, he would add, sun-dials themselves lied in their day, since the sun was eight minutes slow. But Mr. Chesterton's incessant contradictions are not of men, but of man; not of individual opinions, but of the commonplaces, platitudes and truisms of all men and all time. You might almost imagine that Mr. Chesterton had preserved all his school copy-books in order not merely to contradict their maxims, but to prove them the reverse of the truth. After a time, however, Mr. Chesterton's readers come to regard this "Hey, Presto!" conversion of self-evident truths into no less self-evident falsehoods as a kind of conjurer's trick, solely designed to exhibit the artist's legerdemain skill, with the unfortunate result that he is never taken seriously. Unfortunate, I say, because again and again Mr. Chesterton through these paradoxes suggests many new and true points of view and many sane reconsiderations of prejudices which have hardened in time into principles. Things or maxims long taken for granted, even if they are rightly taken for granted, lose their edge from use or rust, and are all the better for the grinding process to which Mr. Chesterton subjects them. We may say a thing or see a thing so often that we cease to think it or notice it at all. "To be born among pine trees," says Mr. Chesterton, "might mean loving pine trees, or might mean loathing pine trees, or might quite seriously mean never having seen a pine tree." Some time since a King's College professor of botany asked his class to what tree a branch, which he passed round it, belonged. Not one of them could tell, though, or rather because, it was a tree they were most of all familiar with, since it surrounded their college. Even, then, if all the "truisms" Mr. Chesterton denies or rather reverses were absolutely true, his reversal of them helps us to realise their truth; but as nearly all of them are but half-truths or three-quarter truths, it is well for us to be forced to recognise their partial invalidity. Again, Mr. Chesterton is often as wise as he is witty in his comments upon the great political parties and questions of the hour. He is delightful on Hudge and Gudge, representatives of the two political parties, who know so much better than the working-man, not only what is good for him, but what he thinks good for him, than he does himself. Of the party system itself Mr. Chesterton, in speaking of the lack of a love of truth (not, remember, truthfulness) in English public schoolmen, says, "England is the country of the Party System, and it has always been chiefly run by public schoolmen. Is there any one out of Hanwell who will maintain that the Party System, whatever its conveniences or inconveniences, could have been created by people particularly fond of truth?" Apropos public schools, Mr. Chesterton, speaking of the crusade against the teaching in them of Greek, says, "I quite understand why Mr. Carnegie has a hatred of Greek. It is obscurely founded on the firm and sound impression that in any self-governing Greek city he would have been killed." As he certainly would. It is, however, in his chapters on women, on the suffragette craze and crusade and on the education of our girls as boys, that Mr. Chesterton is at his wittiest and wisest. His very reverence for the individual dignity of women —always certain to be lost in a crowd—makes Mr. Chesterton a vehement anti-suffragette:—

"Almost every despotic or oligarchic state has admitted women to its privileges; scarcely one democratic state has ever admitted them to its rights. The reason is very simple—that something female is endangered by violence; but endangered much more by the violence of a crowd. In short, one Pankhurst is an exception, but a thousand Pankhursts are a nightmare; a Bacchic orgy; a Witches' Sabbath. For in all legends men have thought of women as sublime separately, but horrible in a herd."

The second volume of the "Memoirs of the Duchesse De Dino" (2), in the interesting glimpses it gives of the early years of the reign of Queen Victoria, suggests that there is much truth in another of Mr. Chesterton's paradoxes. "There are," he says, "only two ways of governing: by a rule and by a ruler. And it is seriously true to say of a woman in education and domesticity that the freedom of the autocrat appears to be necessary to her. She is never responsible till she is irresponsible." The Duchesse as the niece of Talleyrand lived with him when he was Ambassador in London, and, after her return with her uncle to France, was kept au courant with English affairs by such correspondents as Mme. de Lieven. In one of madame's letters to her she writes:—

"Queen Victoria is astounding! Most astounding! With so much power at eighteen what will she be at forty? The Duchess of Kent is a complete nonentity, and even put somewhat on one side by her daughter. Conroy dare not appear before the Queen. . . . Her self-possession is incredible; people are quite afraid of her. She keeps everyone in order."

Indeed, her mother dare not appear in her presence till she was sent for, while her mother's favourite Conroy was at once banished from the Court. The most interesting pages in the volume, however, are those which have to do with the Duchesse's famous uncle, Talleyrand, and especially her edifying account of his exemplary conversion! Truly besides the three Johns of "The Autocrat of the Breakfast-table" there is a fourth —John as he seems to his worshipping women-folk? Talleyrand's niece assures you not only that "he was a good man, a very good man indeed," but also that he was, chiefly through her own ministrations, an exemplary Catholic!

One of Mr. Chesterton's pet horrors is the preacher of eugenics, and especially such preachers as Maurice Maeterlinck, who suggests that we might have something to learn from the bees. But surely such a book as Dr. Angelo Rappoport's "Mad Majesties" (3) suggests that something of the care the bees give to the breeding of their queen might be exercised in the breeding of monarchs. What should we say if the captains of our great liners were an hereditary caste forced to breed in and in to idiocy or insanity? But captains of the ship of state, who have in their charge the lives, not of hundreds, but of millions, are bred so, and so educated that their bringing up tends to intensify their hereditary tendencies. Take one of Dr. Rappoport's specimens of degeneracy, the original of Schiller's "Don Carlos." This "extraordinarily pious prince" amused himself by roasting animals alive—having got a taste for this enjoyment by being taken as a child to see a ghastly auto-da-fe. Having had a pail of water thrown over him at night in the street by a justly infuriated husband, he gave orders for the house to be pulled down and all its inhabitants to be executed. "A shoemaker having sent the Prince a pair of boots with narrow instead of high, wide legs, Don Carlos rang violently for an attendant, whom, not answering quickly enough, the Prince threw out of the window into the moat below. He ordered the boots to be cut up into small pieces, cooked, and sent over to the shoemaker for him to eat." Dr. Rappoport's "Mad Majesties" is rather gruesome, but extremely interesting and instructive reading.

Messrs. Longmans will certainly increase indefinitely "the public stock of harmless pleasure," to quote Johnson on Garrick, by their cheap edition of that uproariously entertaining book, "Some Experiences of an Irish R.M." (4). I recommend this exhilarating book especially to any one who has been depressed, as I have been by two such novels as Miss Willcocks' sombre "The Way Up" (5) and Miss Shakespeare's "Uncle Hilary" (6). If "The Way Up" was as interesting as it is able it would be the novel of the season. It is an extraordinarily able presentation of some of the problems of the day and of their solution as conceived by Miss Willcocks; but though the characters are all drawn by the masterly hand of the author of "The Wingless Victory," the purpose of the novel seems to show through to your disillusionment. Besides, as Miss Tracy says, "I like a book that makes me feel comfortable." "Uncle Hilary" also fails here in spite of its cleverness, and it is very clever. It disillusions you, and is meant to disillusion you, with love—which is high treason in a novel—and it disillusions you through the rather unpleasant plot which makes the heroine marry unconsciously her own stepfather, and, upon the discovery of the horror, accept as a second husband her

Mr. A. G. Bradley, a prolific but always delightful and interesting topographical writer, is at his best in "The Avon and Shakespeare's Country" (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net). Starting from Tewkesbury, where the Avon ends in the Severn, Mr. Bradley makes a pilgrimage up the stream through the pleasant Vale of Evesham on to Stratford and thence to Warwick, Kenilworth, and Rugby. The Avon flows through a land of rare rural beauty, rich, too, in historical associations and memorials of the past, and Mr. Bradley blends description, history, and anecdote in the most entertaining way. The volume has thirty charming illustrations in colour from drawings by Mr. A. R. Quinton.

In the uniform edition of the works of "Fiona Macleod" (William Sharp) Mr. Heinemann has issued the fourth volume (price 5s. net), containing "The Divine Adventure," "Iona," and "Studies in Spiritual History." Mrs. William Sharp, who is responsible for the arrangement of the edition, has included detached fragments from "Green Fire," a romance dealing with Brittany and the Hebrid Isles, which was published in 1896.

A new annual styled "The Green Book of London Society" (price 5s. net) has just been issued from the office of "Whitaker's Almanac." Edited by Messrs. Douglas Sladen and W. Wigmore, "The Green Book" contains comprehensive directories of titled and official personages and sections filled with a great deal of personal and other information classified under such headings as "Court, Society, and Politics," "Clubs, Places of Interest and Amusement," "Arts, Science, and Literature," and "Sport." For many purposes of reference the volume will be extremely useful.

Messrs. Jack, whose popular art books include a handsomely illustrated work on the National Gallery are now producing a similar publication on "The Louvre." It will be issued in eight half-crown parts, the first of which has just appeared. Messrs. Maurice W. Brockwell and Paul G. Konody are responsible for the letterpress, in which the artists will be dealt with "by the countries, schools, and periods to which they belong;" and there will be fifty-four reproductions in colour of representative pictures. Seven of the plates, admirably printed, adorn the first number. To the "Masterpieces in Colour" series the same firm have added "Watteau," by Mr. C. Lewis Hind, and "Millet," by Mr. Percy M. Turner. Each volume (price 1s. 6d.) has eight illustrations in colour.

Miss Helen Mathers, the popular novelist, is writing her autobiography, which, under the title "Phil and I," will be published in the autumn.

Mr. Anthony Hamilton has a new story entitled "A Fool's Errand" appearing through Messrs. Greening. Like his previous book, "The Palm Oil Ruffian," it deals with life on the Gold Coast. Messrs. Greening are also bringing out shilling editions of Mr. George R. Sims's well-known book, "London by Night," and of Miss Marjorie Bowen's historical romance, "The Sword Decides." "Jim Blackwood, Jockey," which is being issued in the same shilling series, is not a reprint, but the first appearance in an English form of a thrilling tale of French Turf life, which was orginally published some years ago.

"Golden Days in Many Lands" is the title of a travel book by Miss Winifred H. Leys which Messrs. Methuen will publish. It embodies notes written by Miss Leys during five years' wanderings in Italy, Switzerland, Germany, Holland, and Great Britain, Egypt, India, Ceylon, America, and the South Sea Islands.

The popularity of the reprints of Queer Stories from Truth has been once again demonstrated by the fact that a first large edition of the sixteenth series has been exhausted within a fortnight of publication. The Bystander declares that these stories are "one of the wonders of the world," but without going quite so far in their praise there can be no doubt that this volume makes a special appeal to the holiday-maker's taste. Accordingly a second large edition is now in the press, and will be available immediately.

ART.

MOODS AND TENSES.

As though really to prove its independence, British art seems to make a point of countering the usual canons of independence by successive dependence on Italy, Holland, and at the present time on France and Japan. To the first can be traced the grand manner, to the second our school of portrait painters, to the third and fourth the impressionism which finds its English exponents in Mr. William Nicholson, Mr. Wilson Steer, Sisley, and others. It is indeed due only to the ostrich-like digestive capacity of the Briton that French impressionism has found such a place in this country. For the British painter in his native purity turns as naturally to narrative as the Frenchman turns to moods and tenses. When Burne-Jones deplored impressionism, fearing that it might end in mere picture manufacture, he was giving vent to a sentiment that, with the passing of a fashion, may yet find an echo in posterity. For although the best British painters of to-day belong undoubtedly to the mood-and-tense school their appeal to the greater public is less that of their own individuality than the fact that they turn to an essentially British side of art—landscape painting.

Impressionism at its best is generally to be found at the Goupil Gallery. The Summer Exhibition is no exception to the rule. Here you can see both the French prototype, and, in less degree, the English following. Style is everywhere, narrative—and I do not only mean the subject picture—nowhere. Here are the clear bright landscapes of Sisley, the dignified blues and greens of Harpignies, the silvery freshness of Boudin, who even now has not yet reached that pinnacle of appreciation which is his due. Both Monet and Le Sidaner stand foremost among realistic romanticists. The exhibition demands very nearly as much from its public as is demanded of it by its public.

For the art of to-day turns upon the individuality of the painter and not upon the subject of his work. A Sisley picture painted by Burne-Jones could have no possible meaning; a Rembrandt picture, on the other hand, painted by another would lose not a jot of its artistic appeal. It is perhaps this necessity for knowing the exact place of the painter in art—and there are so many little places to-day—which is one of the weaknesses of impressionism. Van Dyck and Rubens produce an all-time effect; Monet and Sisley, depending, it may be, upon the conceptions of decades rather than centuries, may become out of date, even incomprehensible. It is even possible that in an age of no telegraphs and no newspapers they might never have been heard of but as the vague forerunners of some great painter yet unborn.

From the point of view of to-day, however, the exhibits at the Goupil Gallery show the delicacy and reserve which is the great merit of the best impressionism. Its style is so distinctive as to make it an instant victim to the imitator who sees in Monet, Pissaro, and Le Sidaner an "untidiness" and "unfinishedness" which he takes for an end in itself, and just the thing for his own personal incapacity. Perhaps no one more than M. Le Sidaner has suffered from the admirer and imitator who would like to turn a dishonest penny by the rainbow-painting which an ignorant public may be foolish enough to admire. It is here that discrimination comes in such as that exercised by the Goupil Gallery. The selected pictures form such a harmony as to enable the visitor to see at a glance the modern "tendenz." They range from the neutral tints of Jongkind and Corot to the colour of Sisley and Le Sidaner, Mr. Bertram Priestman, and others. I noticed also some exquisite still-life by Mr. Peploe—these some of the best things in the exhibition—some of the finest work I have seen of Mr. Bruckmann, some pastels by Mr. Duff, "On the Cliff" by Mr. Orpen, and "Tangiers," a notable painting by Mr. Lavery.

* * * * * *

Sir William Eden possesses that quality, invaluable in creative work, of knowing just when to stop. The result is a refreshing crispness in the exhibition of his water-colours, now to be seen at Carfax Gallery. They suggest, in turn, the influence of Turner, Brabazon, and Harpignies—this last particularly in the treatment of the trees. In "Bénéjacq, near Pau," the trees are almost Japanese. One of the best of the landscapes is the tinted "Pau from the Hotel Gassion"; here are combined in just proportion freedom and restraint, suggestion and fact. I was, perhaps, most struck with the still-life pictures, of which "Honesty at Home" and "Japanese Lacquer" are two of the best. Within his own sphere, Sir William has mastered to a nicety the art of leaving-out; he justifies—again within certain limits—the mood-and-tense school, and this partly from the respect he pays to the world of hard fact.

* * * * * *

Dozens of painters, I suppose, go every year to Algeria in an optimistic search for the originality they could not find at home. Very nearly as many come back, having painted white buildings, blue skies, and shrouded figures, and still fail to rouse to enthusiasm an unwilling public. Mr. Bishop, however, is one of the rare exceptions to a melancholy rule. In the heat and brilliancy of the Moorish climate he has seen more than mere heat and mere brilliancy; discarding the violent and superficial contrasts, he has caught the subtlety of atmosphere which looks so easy, and from its very obviousness is so difficult to record. I have never been to Tangier, but I am convinced that Mr. Bishop's presentment of it is entirely faithful. I feel this the more that even in subjects otherwise uninteresting he has caught the evasive shimmer, the shrouded brilliancy which belong to the land of the sun. "A White Street" is not white, but opalescent; "Within the Gateway" is the quintessence of sunlight. In his own sphere Mr. Bishop is a notable painter.

MUSIC.

THE LATEST OPERA SCHEME.

WITH talk of opera schemes on all hands, it was hardly to be expected that Mr. Manners, who has worked so hard at the national opera problem, would not be heard from. His latest scheme is as interesting as any of its forerunners. What is always so engaging about Mr. Manners is his cheery optimism—and it is perfectly genuine in his case. "I don't need financial support," he says in effect. "On the contrary, I have made a fortune out of the business myself and am now quite independent. Also, I can run my companies as long as I like at a good profit on their present lines. But I want to extend the popularity of grand opera for the benefit of the nation." Hence, therefore, his latest scheme of a United Empire Grand Opera Company, Limited, to be floated for the sum of £12,500 in one hundred thousand 2s. 6d. shares; no shareholder to be allowed to hold more than eight shares, and preferably only one; and the shares to be not negotiable. Mr. and Mrs. Manners themselves will take one half-crown share each, and will give their services as managers, together with the use of all their scenery, costumes, band parts, etc.

Further, Mr. Manners guarantees a steady annual profit and also that it would not be necessary to spend more than £200 of the capital named before starting out, since the company is already fully equipped. "Why, therefore, ask the public to subscribe at all?" one naturally asks. To which Mr. Manners replies:—

(1) To find out if there are enough people interested in national opera before I give my work and property to the scheme.

(2) To have as much capital in the bank as I can at the end of the three years to further help national opera.

(3) Because the more shareholders we have the more interest the progress of the company will obtain throughout the Empire.

It is not proposed to devote the profits to paying dividends. The annual surpluses will be carried forward, and at the end of the three years it will be for the shareholders to decide whether the profits made shall be devoted to the continuance and development of the scheme or whether the capital shall be returned and the profits divided.

It is a scheme quite worth thinking of, but what is not quite so clear is how the cause would be very greatly advanced by it. Mr. Manners says he does not propose to draw on the capital subscribed at all, since the company is already well equipped and paying its way comfortably. Presumably, therefore, the performances would continue just the same as hitherto, and presumably also they would make just about the same appeal to the public as heretofore. Where, then, is the gain? Mr. Manners would reply, no doubt, "The difference would be that many thousands of shareholders up and down the country would then have an individual interest in the undertaking, which would induce them to patronise the performances more largely." But would it? If a man is not sufficiently interested in opera to go to performances already, will the fact that he has invested half-a-crown in a scheme of this sort have the effect of suddenly converting him into an ardent supporter of the art? I am rather inclined to doubt it.

It would be more to the point surely to provide that the capital raised was not to be banked for redistribution at the end of the three years, but to be devoted forthwith to bettering in every possible way the company's performances. Those performances are excellent, taking into consideration all the conditions of the case, but Mr. Manners has always been the first to agree that they might be greatly improved. Better performances are, indeed, an essential condition of increased prosperity. In the matter of the orchestra alone, for instance, there is room for enormous improvement. It is useless giving such works as "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger" unless the band is beyond reproach. If capital is to be raised, therefore, in the manner suggested it seems absurd that it should not be spent, seeing that by this means more than by any other the whole cause would be advanced.

The summer opera season ends on Saturday, when both Covent Garden and His Majesty's put their shutters up. Good work has been done at both houses, though more of novelty has naturally attached to Mr. Beecham's enterprise. Of course he has lost money, as he doubtless expected to, for the venture was admittedly an experiment, and a hazardous one at that, but artistically the season has been an unqualified success. The production of "Feuersnot" alone was enough to make it memorable; while the Mozart performances were hardly less notable in another way. Various other unfamiliar works obtained admirable performances also, not the least remarkable being Mr. G. H. Clutsam's "A Summer Night," heard last Saturday. Above all the season has been notable for the splendid work done by native artists; while Mr. Beecham himself has proved his powers once again not only as a fine conductor but also as a splendid organiser. To project such a season at all implied rare courage. To carry it through argued nothing less than genius.

Covent Garden contented itself with more familiar fare than Mr. Beecham, but produced at least one novelty of note in Laparra's "Habanera," a really remarkable work, while reviving also "Louise" and "Pelléas et Melisande." It may be counted unto it also for righteousness that it stayed its hand in the case of "Linda di Chamounix," which was seriously threatened at one time, though "Lakmé" was not escaped. To be fair, however, the latter proved much more endurable than some had anticipated. Turning from works to performances, the high quality of the latter has been well maintained. Among the newcomers MM. Franz, Martin, Rostowsky, Zerola, Baklanoff, and Burke all made their mark; while Mlle. Destinn, Mme. Edvina, and Mme. Kousnietzoff did particularly well among the older members of the company.

Max Reger has long been noted for the astonishing facility with which he turns out his music, and if some statements which have recently been made on the subject by an admirer may be relied on, his reputation would seem to be well founded. Thus we are told that the prodigious fugue which concludes his Orchestral Variations and Fugue on a theme by Adolf Hiller (op. 100) was composed and completely scored by him between six o'clock in the morning and eleven o'clock at night (seventeen hours), the work occupying fifty-seven pages of the full score, while the Introduction, Passacaglia and Fugue for two pianos (op. 96), a work of vast scope and complexity, occupying twenty-five minutes in performance, he composed in the course of a week. Richard Strauss is also credited with remarkable powers in the same direction. To him the writing of a full score comes as easy as the proverbial falling off a log, and an amusing story is told in this connection of how, some years ago, during a visit to London, he offered to orchestrate a work for a well-known English composer if the latter would take a day off and accompany him to the Derby!

Quis custodiet? What is one to say of the critic—and a well known one, too—who tells his readers that Brahms's violin concerto is a "comparative novelty," and applies the same expression also to Saint-Saëns' equally familiar work in B minor. If there are two concertos which have been played nigh unto death during recent years I should say they are these.

A South London correspondent writes to call attention to a remarkable local enterprise. A chapel in Norwood, he says, is giving a concert "in aid of the funds"—tickets (including refreshments) twopence! Somehow or other I am reminded of Dickens's remark about the Monument to the effect that it cost threepence to go up, but that it was worth twice that sum to stay down.

THE THEATRES.

"A White Man," at the Lyceum.

In spite of a rather puerile first act, Mr. Edwin Milton Royle's romance of the West is a capital melodrama, and the present revival should do very well at the Lyceum. Mr. Herbert Sleath now plays Mr. Waller's old part of the self-sacrificing Jim Carston, and though he is not quite robust enough in his methods his sincerity carries conviction. The saloon scene in the second act is the part of the play that I like, and I fancy that it is what pleases the audience most, too. There is something very fascinating about the crowd of cowboys and cow-punchers, whatever these may be, who play cards, drink, and let off their "shooting irons" in quite the most approved Bret Hartian manner. I dare say in real life it would be a little disconcerting if when you were quietly drinking in a bar a desperado were to appear at the door firing a revolver promiscuously just to call attention to himself, and were then to insist on every one drinking with him under pain of instant death—but here it seems quite a good joke. The Indians, too, are very picturesque, especially the little squaw who marries the white man and presents him with an heir. I always wonder though how this heir gets on subsequently at Maudsley Towers when Jim comes into his own again and marries the white woman of his heart after the death of poor little Nat-u-rich. It is rather hard on the real heroine that her lover should come back to her with a dusky descendant for her to mother! As is often the case with American plays, even when played by English actors, the men's parts are very much better played than the women's, and the exponent of the heroine is very conventionally melodramatic. With hardly an exception, however, all the rough Westerners are capitally studied.

"Progress," at the Coronet.

T. W. Robertson's "Progress" is a poor play adapted from an inferior work by Sardou, but it is quite an interesting piece to see, partly because it is so archaic with its long soliloquies and conventional types, and partly because, on the other hand, the conflict of ideas in it is intensely modern. The pushing young engineer who wants to push his railway through a feudalistic peer's park and plant a station on the site of an historical old abbey could be paralleled in these days by any progressive iconoclast, and you would not have to look far to find the equivalents of the Mompessons and their old-fashioned friends. The arguments for and against the modern spirit are really well set forth, but the sentimental heroine is more than a little trying. She comes straight out of an early Victorian novel. She is the type of maiden who if she went out for a walk would be sure to meet a mad bull and have to be rescued from its murderous onrush by some noble creature (mad bulls were a great feature in early Victorian novels, though they are almost extinct now). She lounges round suffering from some vague complaint—probably a "decline"—and when she thinks that her lover is unkind she opens the windows and rushes out into the night air because she has been told that cold will kill her. In early Victorian times the "night air" was always considered a peculiarly deadly atmosphere. The play is given in the picturesque costume of the period, and with a really strong cast. Mr. James Carew is very forcible as the sturdy engineer. Mr. Edward Sass is excellent as the old doctor. Mr. Arthur Wontner plays the middle-aged lover who, though bitterly resenting innovations, finds when he does make a desperate excursion to London that travelling by rail is really more comfortable than travelling in a stuffy coach, and a capital little study of an old man is given by that clever actor Mr. O. B. Clarence. Full of faults though the play is, it yet makes you realise what a power Robertson was. He had not quite found himself in "Progress," that is all. This week the Coronet company are playing "Home," another adaptation from the French.

"The Scarlet Pimpernel" concludes its present run at the New Theatre on Saturday, after eleven hundred and forty performances. As an instance of the danger of making forecasts, I recall that some sage, after the first night, wrote that the pimpernel was a little flower that bloomed one day and died the next, and that this would probably be the fate of its namesake, the play! Mr. Fred Terry and Miss Julia Neilson will shortly sail for New York, where they will have an eight weeks' season at the New Amsterdam Theatre.

* * * * * *

Mr. Galsworthy's "prison" plays seem likely to have something the same effect on prison law reform as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" on slavery, and this is a great feather in the cap of the dramatist. His exceedingly interesting letter in the Times showed how deeply he had studied the conditions of prison life before writing "Justice."

* * * * * *

The death of my old friend Mr. Moy Thomas removes the last of the old school of critics. It is a good many years now since he retired from active work, and times have changed since Clement Scott, Joseph Knight, and Moy Thomas were three of the best-known figures at every first night. It was in the Daily News that Moy Thomas's criticisms were a great feature until the change of management. Then, for a very short time, when his son edited the paper, he was succeeded by the late Mr. St. John Hankin, whose sudden death robbed us of a brilliant dramatist. Mr. Moy Thomas also for many years wrote a theatrical article for the Graphic, and I remember that an entirely innocent remark in his criticism of the original production of "The Importance of Being Earnest" roused the wrath of the author to such an extent that he demanded that the whole issue of that number should be withdrawn. The dramatist had more important matters to think of immediately after this, for the crash came, and the notice was forgotten, but I remember talking to both men about it, and I hardly know which was the more indignant—Wilde at what he thought Moy Thomas insinuated, or Moy Thomas at Wilde imagining that he would stoop to making unfair comment. Until his illness he had a remarkable knowledge of the modern French drama, and in his earlier days he did a great variety of literary work. He was, I believe, the first editor of Cassell's Magazine, and it was in that paper that his story, "A Fight for Life" appeared. While he was writing this he was taken suddenly ill, and there was grave doubt each month whether he would be able to supply the requisite instalment. In order to ensure against such an accident, another writer was asked if he would hold himself in readiness to continue the tale if necessary. This other writer was the late Mr. Manville Fenn, one of Moy Thomas's oldest friends, and the man who succeeded him as editor of Cassell's.

The Russian dancers at the Palace finish their season at the end of next week, and I made an opportunity the other night of seeing them once more. Without any exception Anna Pavlova is the finest dancer I have ever seen, and it is easy to understand why these Russians have revolutionised dancing in London. We have had so many dancers who do everything but dance that it is an absolute delight to see the real thing and to see it so genuinely appreciated. The Valse Caprice and the Bacchanale, which come last, are so exquisite that one might almost be excused for using that hackneyed phrase about the poetry of motion. M. Mordkin is a wonderful artist, too, and when you come to the rank and file of the company the men are nearly all better than the women. Anna Pavlova herself, though, stands out like a bright star in a nebula. I should not be surprised if this dancing does not foretell the end of conventional ballet, with its hordes of well-drilled ballet-girls going through manœuvres with beautiful precision. One soon wearies of kaleidoscopic colour pictures, but the perfect art of a genius never palls.

SPORT.

RACING NOTES.

THE St. Leger appears to be a very open race, and it is probable that there would be a considerable amount of betting if anything within measurable distance of reasonable odds were offered by the bookmakers. The prices recorded are altogether preposterous, and the backers who are content to accept such odds must be pure-bred mooncalves. There are good reasons for regarding Lemberg as a non-stayer, and Neil Gow's stamina must be taken upon trust. I predicted that Rosedrop would win the Oaks, but it is difficult to understand why this mare should now be proclaimed to be a good stayer, and it seems chimerical to anticipate that she will defeat Greenback and Charles O'Malley at Doncaster. These and Ulster King are the only three-year-olds which have discovered the degree of stamina which is an essential element at Doncaster. Greenback won the Prince of Wales Stakes at Ascot, the distance being a severe mile and five furlongs, and he then gave 5 lb. and a beating to Ulster King, who a fortnight later at Newmarket won the Princess of Wales Stakes over the Suffolk Stakes course, which is a really testing one, the finish being especially severe. Charles O'Malley did better still, for he won the Ascot Vase very easily, the course being two miles, and I fancy this colt is a really genuine stayer. Lemberg had very little indeed in hand when he won the Derby, and if there had been another fifty yards to go he would have been beaten by Greenback, and in another hundred yards Charles O'Malley would probably have finished in front of him. Winkipop will no doubt be prepared for the St. Leger, and Maid of Corinth was very backward both at Newmarket and at Epsom. The field may include Tressady, San Antonio, Swynford, Rochester, Cardinal Beaufort, Admiral Hawke, Sunbright, Sanctuary, Montreal, Bronzino, and other outsiders. It is very lucky for the English horses that Nuage is not engaged in the St. Leger, for he stays well, and he is really a much better horse than most people suppose. His success in the Grand Prix was no surprise except to the credulous noodles who had complacently swallowed the tales about the French three-year-olds being "a wretched lot."

As there is no "outstanding" two-year-old this season it is curious that no fewer than fifty-three animals have been withdrawn from the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster out of an original entry of eighty-nine. Seaforth, who is the best two-year-old of the season so far, was not entered for this stake. There is the prospect of a most interesting race, as the list of acceptances includes Cellini, Pietri, Night Rider, Persephone, Sunstar, Romeo, Wrinkler, Prince Palatine, Nerestan, and the colt by Persimmon out of Dame d'Or. It is ridiculous that the minor forfeits, which amount to £265, should be impudently grabbed for the fund. They ought to be divided between the second and third horses, leaving the sweepstakes and the added money for the winner. The Stewards of the Jockey Club ought to insist on this change in the conditions, and the Rous Plate should be made a stake of £1,000 instead of £500, considering that the entrances amount this year to £411, so that only £89 of the nominal endowment comes from the fund. The list of acceptances includes Radiancy, Romeo, Mary Carmichael, Night Rider, News, and Black Potts. There are twenty acceptances for the Tattersall Sale Stakes.

There are only ten entries for the Doncaster Cup, owners being presumably scared by the prospect of encountering Bayardo. The list also includes Mirador (this horse has been so far a very great disappointment as a four-year-old), Glacis, Bachelor's Double, Apache, Bronzino, Ulster King, and Royal Realm.

Cargill fell lame in the spring, but I hear that he is now all right again, and it is probable that if all goes well with Lord Howard de Walden's horse he will win a good handicap during the autumn. Cargill is a useful horse if he is judiciously placed.

Nothing can be more fantastical than to attempt to estimate the two-year-old form of the season during the summer. It is obviously impossible to do so until after the Newmarket Houghton Meeting. I see that Cellini and Seaforth are described as "Derby colts." It will be full time to consider Cellini's Derby prospects seriously after the Middle Park Plate. Seaforth may be put aside, as he does not happen to be engaged in the Derby, but he is entered for the Two Thousand and Newmarket Stakes, and Cellini is also engaged in both those races.

Prince Palatine, who was so heavily backed for the National Breeders' Produce Stakes at Sandown Park, was much interfered with in the race, and he never had a real chance of winning. It was expected that Mr. Pilkington's colt would have run at Liverpool and at Goodwood, but it is understood that he is to be reserved for the Champion Breeders' Foal Stakes at Derby on August 31. Prince Palatine will have a chance of meeting some of the best two-year-olds of the season at even weights in the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster. This colt was bred by Mr. Hall Walker, and a high opinion must have been entertained of him as a yearling, for he commenced the season with thirty-nine engagements. He had been very well tried before Sandown, and his success in the £5,000 race was most confidently expected.

Entries close next Tuesday for a large number of races, including the principal handicaps at Doncaster (the Great Yorkshire Plate of £1,300 and the Portland Plate of £800 are the most important of these events) and the Cesarewitch and Cambridgeshire. The pecuniary conditions of the great Newmarket handicaps are most ridiculous and paltry, and they ought to be altered forthwith. There was a deal of braying in the sporting papers some time ago in praise of the alleged desire of the Jockey Club to encourage long-distance races, but the conditions of the Cesarewitch are calculated to give a freezing douche to the enthusiasts who clamour for such events. There is a sweepstakes of £25 each, £10 forfeit, with £500 added, but £300 is taken for second and third horses. The Cambridgeshire has the same sweepstake and the £500 of added money, but there is no deduction for the placed horses. Indeed, £100 is added for the second horse. Why on earth are not the Cesarewitch conditions the same? Of course, the added money is all vapour, for there is £5 entrance in each handicap. The Stewards ought long ago to have made these races much better worth winning than they are at present. Last year the Cesarewitch was worth only £905, being far below any of the other autumn handicaps in value. The Cambridgeshire brought in £1,370, but the Prince Edward Handicap at Manchester was worth £1,670 and the value of the Duke of York Handicap at Kempton Park was £1,665.

Lord Derby will not be racing between Goodwood and the Newmarket First October Meeting, except during Doncaster week, as he is going to Scotland for two months at the beginning of August. Lord Derby has rented the deer forest and grouse moors of Struy, in Inverness-shire, near Beauly, from Lord Lovat. The shooting extends over about 18,000 acres, and it is the lower section of the old deer forest of Glenstrathfarran. Lord Derby will be at no great distance from his late colleague as Steward of the Jockey Club, Lord Durham, who has taken the celebrated deer forest of Affarie in the same district.

There were only poor fields for many of the races at Liverpool, and the sport was very disappointing, considering the value of the principal stakes. The meeting ought to be reduced to two days, and it suffered severely through the unsatisfactory clashing with Windsor and Hurst Park. Persephone was not sent to Aintree, and there were only five starters for the Mersey Stakes of £700. The Lady Frivoles filly, who is now all right again, was made favourite, and she easily defeated Radiancy, the winner of the Coventry Stakes at Ascot, who had 8lb the worst of the weights. There was a field of seven for the St. George Stakes of £2,000, and Rosedrop was favourite, in spite of a heavy penalty. Sir William Bass's filly was very easily beaten by Yellow Slave, who has apparently come into form, and she was well backed, having 9lb the best of the weights with the Oaks winner. Rochester, who was much fancied for this race at Newmarket, ran badly, to the discomfiture of his friends. Lord Durham's colt runs next at Hurst Park. It is probable that the distance was not far enough for Rosedrop, nor was the race run to suit her. On the two-year-old form Rosedrop had no pretensions to give weight to Yellow Slave, who beat Greenback cleverly at Lingfield last season. There were only three starters for the Great Lancashire Breeders' Produce Stakes of £2,000, although there had been thirty-eight acceptances. There was, however, a most exciting race between Knockfeerna and Joie de Vivre, on whom odds were betted, but Major Loder's filly was also heavily backed, and she won by a head. The favourite had won the Acorn Stakes at Epsom, but Knockfeerna finished a respectable third in Cellini's race at Sandown Park, and she had 5 lbs the best of the weights. Whisk Broom had been kept for the Knowsley Dinner Stakes, but the American colt was just beaten, after a slashing finish, by Willonyx, who won a race at Ascot. Odds were betted on Lord Derby's Newmarket disappointment—Hair Trigger II.—for the Southport Stakes, but she again ran miserably, and it appears clear that she will not exert herself in public. The stable did better with Oliver Goldsmith, the Lingfield winner, as he found no difficulty in securing the Jolliffe Plate. There were positively only three starters for the Atlantic Stakes of £2,000, with twenty-two acceptances. Of course, the race was a certainty for Bachelor's Double, who cantered in alone, odds of 100 to 6 having been betted on him.

Swynford started favourite for the Liverpool Cup, and he won in a canter. He is a smart good-looking colt, and he is still improving. Swynford stays well (as he showed at Ascot), and Lord Derby's colt may prove to be the best outsider for the St. Leger. Rathlea, who had been a general fancy for this handicap, was never prominent. Koul was left at the post, and Sunbright, who also got off badly, did not run at all kindly. This colt has been very injudiciously managed, and he is much in need of a rest. His numerous backers on Friday must have been infatuated. Succour appears to have seen his best day, but this horse always has a large public following, and he carried a lot of money. Swynford has a nice engagement in the Liverpool St. Leger of £700 at the November Meeting, and next year he is entered for the Princess of Wales Stakes and Jockey Club Stakes at Newmarket, the Eclipse Stakes, and the Hardwicke Stakes at Ascot (which race he won this season). He ought to make a fine four-year-old.

St. Nat only won the Hurst Park Foal Plate by a head from Minehead, to whom he was giving 8lb, but I fancy Mr. Joel's colt really had a good deal in hand. The close finish gave a shocking fright to plungers who had betted long odds on the favourite.

Lord Derby would have won the Duchess of York Plate on Saturday if he had sent Swynford on from Liverpool, but he depended upon Decision, who was beaten, after a ding-dong finish, by Admiral Hawke. Major Loder's colt would have been beaten in a few more strides. He ought to be kept for races over six or seven furlongs, as he cannot really stay any longer course. He has fine speed. There were only five starters for this £1,300 stake.

Lemberg has an engagement next month in the Hurst Park Lennox Plate of £1,500, but I hear that he is not to run again until the St. Leger, which is a wise decision. After Doncaster Lemberg will be kept for the Jockey Club Stakes, when he may meet Neil Gow again, and the Derby winner would have to give 3 lb. to Lord Rosebery's colt.

There will be a mischievous and most inconvenient plethora of racing next week, meetings having been licensed at Sandown Park (one day), Birmingham, Ripon, Manchester, Lewes, Haydock Park (each two days), and Brighton (three days). The sport is not likely to be of much general interest anywhere. There are sure to be large fields, with plenty of betting, at Brighton and Lewes, but the racing at both these meetings has fallen off dreadfully in class. Seaforth has been left in for the Astley Stakes at Lewes, but it may be decided to reserve the New Stakes winner for his more valuable engagements at York and at Derby.

GOLF SWEEPS—FOOTBALL LIBEL—SWIMMING.

On the question of amateur golf a correspondent calls my attention to a statement in the Sportsman respecting the final in the golf tournament among the members of White's Club, which was played at Walton Heath last week, the players being Messrs. Maude and Grant. The first prize in the selling sweepstakes was £1,900. Well, I am delighted to see that there is so much loose cash at White's; but it is, perhaps, a matter for regret that gentlemen should make the game a medium of gambling for such large stakes. It is scarcely a good example for the weaker brethren who are not members of White's. I hope that this information will not shock Mr. Garden Smith. Of course, these players are genuine amateurs. They are not playing for a consideration. Their club does not pay their expenses to Walton Heath. If this were done there would be trouble. But a paltry stake—under £2,000—how ridiculous to make a fuss! The professional winner of the open championship gets only £50! In these democratic days gentlemen must make an effort to maintain their position and show what nerve and money, properly applied, can do. There is a wide gulf fixed between the professional and the gentleman amateur, and it is only right that the former should understand his proper position. The public thinks too much of professional players; they are pushed in the Press, they even write books on golf, and they play for a consideration—£50 for a championship. A mere bagatelle. Fortunately, artisan golfers cannot become members of White's. If one did become a member and played for such a prize sweep and won it, would he be a professional?

The Southern section qualifying competition for the News of the World golf prize was played at Stoke Poges. There were 144 entries, and only nine scratched, and play was continuous from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. and past. Fifty per cent. of the competitors ought never to have entered. They literally had no earthly chance. At the same time, for the thirteen places to be filled the cream of professionals employed in England, saving Herd and one or two others, were playing. Metropolitan courses are the Mecca of the professional golfer. To Mr. Allison, the club secretary, and to Mr. Mieville, the secretary of the Professional Golfers' Association, every credit is due for the management, which was spoiled by the paralytically slow play of one professional, who did no good, and who took well over three hours to get round. He and his unfortunate partner were finishing the thirteenth when the couple in front were ending their round. The sooner this player abandons golf for marbles the better for the rest of the competitors. He makes such a competition impossible. Tom Vardon played a very fine second round, and so got a place. Taylor just squeezed in. Braid was out of it, 79 for each round. He was a bit off his drive, and his puts simply would not go down. Sherlock, the local professional, headed the list. He has improved a lot since he left Oxford. His drive is some twenty yards longer. He had to develop his drive to tackle the long course at Stoke. A good judge of the game who scored for Braid and for Robson speaks most highly of the promise of the latter player. His driving is stupendously long and beautifully straight, never ten yards off the centre. At the first hole, which is a long one, over four hundred yards, he had to spare his iron for his second. There was no wind. He plays his full iron shots in just the same way as he does his wooden clubs, and he is just as long and just as straight. Chestney, of Burnham Beeches, made a good recovery from a bad start, and but for a long wait at the sixteenth in his second round he might have beaten Vardon's score of 71. But professionals must learn to endure long waits.

The competitors justifiably complained of the position in which the holes were cut. The edge of a banked up green or a few yards from a deep bunker is not the position for a hole. The approach play becomes fluky, and it becomes insensate folly to try to be up when the slightest excess of strength spells disaster. It is not golf. But in every club those who are responsible conceive it to be their duty to make the course difficult. They fear it will be spoken of as an easy course. And so the holes are cut in impossible places just to show how gloriously difficult the course is. It is a puerile habit, which has even infected the Royal and ancient links at St. Andrews. The course at Stoke Poges is a sound test of golf, and it is spoiled by cutting the holes in rankly ridiculous positions.

The Long Distance Swimming Championship took place over the course from Kew to Putney. Taylor, the holder, had gone off a bit in form, and he was beaten by over a minute by Battersby, who has been doing wonderfully well this season. The race was started in 1877, Sir John Astley getting together the funds for the cup. The course was from Putney to Westminster, the race being known as the Lords and Commons Cup, as it had been subscribed for by members of both Houses, and it was won outright after three victories by Davenport. Then another trophy was obtained, and the course was extended to the old floating baths at Hungerford Bridge. This cup was won by Itter. Then W. J. Innes presented a couple of cups. In 1890 the present course was used. But about that date the Amateur Swimming Association was very forward in its movements. London was not the hub of the universe. The provinces were the real centres of swimming ability. And so the race was held in the Mersey, at Southampton, and at Southport, where the water was so cold that the A.S.A. at last returned to the Thames and selected the present course. Jarvis won for seven years, and in 1900 Mr. Innes again gave a cup, which can never be won outright. In 1906 there was the great finish, when Taylor was beaten by Jarvis by a yard and a-half. The race has done a lot to promote long-distance swimming. One can only hope that it will never be swum again in divers seaside resorts. Such peregrinations spoil records for the cup.

A new terror has been added to the life of newspaper proprietors. The Newport Argus alleged that Llanelly were the dirtiest and foulest team playing Rugby football. This allegation was made after the team had met Newport in September. And so the team brought a libel action, and after hearing much evidence the jury gave a verdict for a farthing damages. I hope the fifteen players will regard this sum as a suitable solatium for their outraged feelings. The conclusion one comes to is that the Argus may have made its comments a bit too strong. But the damages would indicate that Llanelly would have better consulted their dignity by not running to law. The Welsh Union will be well advised if it takes strong action with regard to rough play. The evidence on both sides showed that the game was rough and unworthy of the traditions of genuine Rugby football. I dare not say exactly what I think about Welsh football, as I have no desire to have a libel action brought by the Welsh Union. But the Union will do well to take care that rough play is not the permanent adjunct of trickery.

Lord Harris commented recently on the new scoring for the County Cricket Championship. He hoped the papers would publish as well the results on the old system. He hinted that the method was more or less absurd. If he requires a concrete instance let it be taken from the University matches. Not having a Wisden at hand I do not recollect the figures. But a certain number of games have been drawn. Well, Oxford has lost under the old system a certain number of games; add to each list of losses the total number of drawn games and you get the losses of each side under the new system. It reminds one of tariff reform arithmetic. It pretends to get a satisfactory result by an absurdity. As an example, take Surrey and Sussex last week. A loss meant much to Surrey in the championship, a win meant everything, and to Sussex one way or the other did not matter. Surrey by enterprising cricket, Hayward hitting quite freely, put themselves in a winning position. The weather helped Sussex, and they played sturdily for a draw. They had won at Horsham, and were not going to be beaten if they could help it. And so each team lost a match. What stupidity. A win's a win and a draw's a draw, whether it's wind or weather, or batting or bowling. Surrey, who found Llewellyn and Newman bowling finely, lost to Hants despite two fine innings by Bird, and so they have the supreme satisfaction of knowing that in the championship table they lost just as they did against Sussex. By the way, Newman and Smith are useful bowlers for an English team. Kent simply mopped up Yorkshire. Blythe and Woolley alone bowled for Kent. They took all the wickets except one run out, and Seymour played two fine innings. There are young men in Kent. And 1912 and Australia is not very far off.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

THE Road Board, under the energetic guidance of Mr. Rees Jeffreys, has not been long in getting to work, and the letter which it has addressed to the county councils and other highway authorities throughout the kingdom inviting applications from them in respect of desirable local improvements gives evidence of an intention to proceed on thoroughly business-like lines. The amount at the disposal of the Board is variously estimated at from £600,000 to £900,000 per year, and whichever sum is the right one it should be sufficient to enable a vast amount of good work to be accomplished. It will be necessary, of course, to guard against spending the money on improvements of purely local value, since the funds at the disposal of the Board are not intended to relieve local highway authorities of their proper obligations, but to furnish the means of carrying out improvements of value to the community at large. Mr. Jeffreys may, however, be trusted to see to this, and for the rest the local authorities are offered no lack of choice as to the kind of improvements which the Board will be prepared to assist.

Reconstruction, widening, and tarring of roads, opening out of the dangerous corners, modifying gradients, strengthening bridges, making new by-pass roads, and acquiring land in urgent cases for subsequent widening schemes—under all of these heads the Board indicates its readiness to help on good cause being shown. So far as widening goes, the London motorist will think at once of Brentford, and I suppose that few worse cases exist in any part of the kingdom. At the same time, I imagine that the bulk of the Board's funds will be expended at present on treating main roads for dustlessness. This particular form of improvement has the advantage of being one appealing in an equal degree to the general public and to motorists, who, it is just as well to bear in mind, are being called on to provide the whole of the funds which are being expended.

If it were only the ungodly that flourish the Automobile Association might well feel aghast at its own turpitude. With a total membership now exceeding over 15,000 the youngest of the three leading representative motoring organisations goes on from strength to strength, and whatever doubts may have been entertained originally as to the desirability of some of its proceedings, it is impossible not to admire the extraordinary energy and capacity with which its operations have been directed and extended. From the most insignificant beginnings the association has developed in a few short years in a manner truly marvellous. Meanwhile, the recent suggestions of amalgamation hardly look like coming to anything, though it would certainly be a good move for the cause if the M.U. and the A.A. were to join forces.

A revival of the poppet valve v. sliding valve controversy seems imminent. I expressed the hope recently that makers would in future agree to differ on the point, but apparently they are not disposed to do this. Messrs. Rolls-Royce set the ball rolling again with their recent pronouncement in favour of the mushroom type, and now the Marquis De Dion has been speaking to the same effect. Both famous firms have been experimenting with sliding sleeves, and both have decided in the result to stick to the poppet type. This might have passed, but the Marquis De Dion went farther, and somewhat incautiously proceeded to proclaim the superior staying power of the older valve. This was more than Messrs. Daimler could stand, and now they have challenged the noble Marquis to make good his words in a trial of strength—poppet v. Knight. It should be a stirring combat—if it comes off. But I doubt if it will. Messrs. Daimler's gallant Knight is a formidable foe.

A cheap motor-car on quite novel lines has recently been brought out in France under the title of the Bedelia voiturette. In almost every respect it departs from conventional practice, and it is both extraordinarily light and extraordinarily cheap. In shape it rather suggests a coffin mounted on four bicycle wheels with a passenger in the middle and the driver sitting behind him. The engine is only 3½ h.p., air-cooled and single-cylindered, while the drive is conveyed by means of a chain to a cross shaft, and thence to the rear wheels by motor-cycle belts. Cheapness and simplicity have been studied under every head. There is neither differential nor clutch. In place of the latter the rear axle is so arranged that by a pedal it can be moved slightly forward, so slackening the driving belts. The car has a wheel base of 8 ft. 4 ins. and a track of only 21 ins., while the weight complete is under 3 cwt. The front axle works on a central pivot, around which it turns for steering purposes. There are three brakes, and wire wheels are used. The whole contrivance looks freakish, of course, and this would probably tell against it over here, but it seems to have been exceedingly cleverly worked out on the principle of eliminating the unessential and of combining the maximum of efficiency with the minimum of material and mechanism. It has already secured such popularity that a 5 h.p. two-cylinder model on similar lines to sell

An illustration in one of the motoring papers last week depicted a somewhat curious incident. A cover had burst, and the tube, forcing its way through the opening, is shown distended to the size of a football. The correspondent who sent the photograph adds somewhat naïvely, "I took the photograph immediately on discovery, and the tube burst at 6.25 while the photograph was being taken." He does not seem to realise that he would have been more profitably employed in deflating the tube than in photographing it. Then it might not have burst. As a rule, however, when a tube swells up like this the chances are that it will go. The same thing happens sometimes when a tube is being pumped up for testing purposes apart from the cover. It stands the strain up to a point, then at a spot where the rubber is perhaps weaker than elsewhere it will suddenly expand, and unless it is deflated very expeditiously it will probably go. A tube unsupported by the cover should not be inflated much beyond its natural diameter.

Motorists who are contemplating crossing the Channel during the holiday season may be glad to have their attention called to "Stevens's Motor Routes—France" (Ballantyne and Co.) as an excellent road book and general guide, specially prepared for English and American automobilists. The volume gives particulars of the best routes to and from Paris in all directions, along with various others, together with a quantity of general information of practical use to tourists (Customs regulations, driving licences, rules of the road, transport cost, etc., etc.), and is generally a very useful vade mecum. The following "tip" is not without its element of humour:—

> When in difficulties in a village through a breakdown or other cause, ask to be taken to Monsieur le Maire or Monsieur le Curé; the latter will generally be found the more intelligent.

What would Monsieur le Maire say to this?

The aeroplaning novel has not yet made its appearance, I believe, but one recently published bears the title "The Ascending Effort," while another is called "The Way Up." Both sound as though they should appeal especially to aviators.

Argylls, Limited, call attention to a novel coach-building detail which they have recently introduced. This takes the shape of valance boxes covering the gap between the chassis and the footboard. The appearance of the footboard, it is claimed, is enhanced, and the boxes provide accommodation for all tools and spares, as well as for lunch and tea kits, fishing rods, golf clubs, etc. The design of these boxes has been registered by Argylls, Limited.

From the Wolseley Motor Car Company I have received a useful speed calculating card which they have recently issued. By reference to a simple dial with two rings of figures—representing miles per hour in the one case and minutes and seconds in the other—the speed of a car doing anything from thirty to sixty miles per hour can be ascertained instantaneously when the time occupied has been taken. A copy of the calculator, the company adds, will be supplied gratis to any motorist who cares to apply for one to their head office, Adderley Park, Birmingham.

WOMAN.

THE DAUGHTERS OF HUXTABLE.

LAST March an article appeared in Truth under this title, and I have now received an interesting letter from a lady resident in New Zealand, putting forward the problem of the many girls who, in the Colonies themselves, remain unmarried through the lack of husbands. This correspondent is very earnest, and laments the passée spinsters she sees all about her. She paints a graphic picture of the New Zealand towns full of those women I have called Austen women, and whom Mr. Granville Barker calls the daughters of Huxtable. And yet there is still much to be said for the emigration of the domesticated, unmarried Englishwoman. Even if New Zealand were the most typical of our Colonies in this respect, my correspondent writes chiefly of life in towns of importance, like Christchurch. She refers to country visits paid by these girls from which they return unmarried; but otherwise she speaks mostly of city life.

But there is a great difference between a girl on a visit to friends—thoughtless, merry, with all her associations and family drawing her to the place of her home—and a woman who has definitely severed the chain which binds her to her native place, and has come out equipped to work and earnestly willing to work. My correspondent cites a case which is very much to the point. A lady help went out from England. Her idea was obviously that of marriage, and this she finally achieved—"but it was quite four years before she was successful. I believe the marriage has turned out quite satisfactory to both parties." It is related of the girl that she once remarked that she would do work in New Zealand that she would not do in England. That is a significant remark, and its importance becomes obvious when the writer goes on to say that "the class of women and girls that is wanted here is unfortunately wanted as much at home—indeed, all over the civilised world, I believe—good servants or working girls willing to learn. . . . In the country they are so difficult to get that all sorts of privileges are given and everything is done to make life pleasant."

Here is exactly the case I wished to point out for Miss Huxtable of England. It is seen that when she gets out she "will do work there she would not do at home." Why should she not go out, taking her domestic qualifications, and take one of those privileged places where domestic help is so much wanted? She would be a boon indeed to the wife of the farmer, used to putting up with any and every form of incompetence in an untrained servant, sooner than lose her altogether. Here, at any rate, is a livelihood for Miss Huxtable, and in a country where the mistresses work as hard as the servants, as my correspondent points out, no one minds.

In the better-populated districts of New Zealand it seems that marriage is not certain. The letter before me suggests that in Australia also there are more than enough women. This is a mistake. While the Premier of Western Australia was recently in England the men of his colony wrote to him, "Send us wives." In Canada women marry with startling rapidity when they go out. Of course, this refers to women who go out prepared to live an isolated life of hard work. It is not every woman who has the courage; but let those who have it do it. Mrs. George Cran, in her illuminating book on Canada, says that the great wants of that Dominion are wives and midwives. In highly populated centres all over the Empire the women find it difficult to marry. This is because the tendency everywhere is to leave the women in the city and to draw the men of the second generation away. The sons scatter, the daughters remain at home.

While an absurd stigma attaches to domestic service in England, the daughters of Huxtable are not likely to justify their existence by branching out into usefulness here. But the Colonies are crying out for help, and some at least of them desire it to come in the shape of wives. The suggestion I made of a Colonial Matrimonial Bureau would be difficult to carry out; but I maintain that if such an institution could be well worked, it would at least serve the useful purpose of showing what scope there is overseas for the superfluous daughters of England. They are a sad and sorry class, far too numerous.

THE GIRLS' PUBLIC SCHOOL.

The problem of combining the advantages of the day-school and the boarding-school ought theoretically to be soluble by means of the public school—that is, the school which, by means of boarding-houses, places boarders practically in the position of day-scholars. The difficulties of carrying out such an ideal lie chiefly in the fact that while parents talk glibly about the advantages of the sound education and the public spirit thus to be acquired, they have really no idea at all of allowing their daughters to have a definite aim in life. If the class of girl which goes to the best public school does anything in later life it is usually because she must; nor, should she wish on her return home to take up any interest of her own, is the opportunity usually accorded to her.

The idea of letting girls live in "houses," whence they can attend a great public school, is, of course, to teach them independence within the limits of what stands for home. From the teacher's point of view—and, therefore, to a certain extent, from that of the pupil—the arrangement could hardly be bettered, since no one person can teach, correct exercises, and attend properly to out-of-school conditions. At the same time, since the "house" is responsible for the girl, it cannot in the nature of things allow her the same amount of liberty that would fall naturally to her brother. Nor would the average parent be at all desirous of such liberty, however educational. The elasticity of home observance, therefore, can only be observed to a very limited extent in the school boarding-house.

Again the educational ideal in girls' schools is in an entirely fluid state. Boys go through a certain curriculum, which long years have adjusted to their later needs in life. The girls' public school is more or less modelled on the same lines without the same reason. I know of one such school in which the majority of girls have no intention of learning anything after the age of eighteen. They have a smattering of languages—and by no means a practical smattering; they have been told of the great eighteenth century writers; they know, whatever their private opinions, that pictures and music generally are to be admired; their mathematics will probably accord to them the glories of the Senior Cambridge or the Higher Certificate, the certificates of which neatly framed will form a presentable bedroom ornament. The minority go on to Oxford or Cambridge, where they will probably graduate high up, afterwards seeking at Dublin the official status at present refused them by the two English universities.

And then—well, then after being encouraged by ambitious parents to work hard, to have an object in life, to be independent and public-spirited, they are mostly called home to chaperonage, visiting-cards and the ideal of plenty of time, but never any time of their own. I pronounce neither for nor against this conception of a girl's duties; at the same time I do not understand the upholders of such a vocation allowing their girls to learn more than the three R's—in order to write notes, keep accounts, and read novels—with perhaps a little plain sewing thrown in. I am far from thinking that the object of education is utilitarian in the narrow sense of the word. To learn in order to teach is well enough in its way; but to learn in order to be is really more to the point. An ideal education should provide a girl, not with facts and facts again, not even with accomplishments, but with a file, wherein, ticketed and docketed, is a scheme of existence. It should give her principles, for in the ultimate resort women's principles bear less strain than do men's. It should enable her to know the world as it is and as it might be. Whether she reads novels or philosophy, her reading should rank as one more experience. If she has all this it matters not whether she "does something" or whether she "is something." The average parent sends her daughter to a public school for "dandy" and for nothing else. Up to a certain age she encourages her to be serious; after the age-limit is passed it is a crime for her not to be frivolous. Public schools may make, through indifferent hockey and worse cricket, for public spirit; a debating society and a school magazine will probably have some real effect in this direction. But without parental consistency the public school is worse than useless. For it trains a girl in almost entirely the opposite direction from that in which she is later intended to go.

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Wednesday.—I spent the afternoon by the bedside of Nita, who is indulging herself with a little malaria as the result of her sojourn in Siam. And yet she refuses to hear a word against the climate, declaring, indeed, that in its settled warmth it is far more reliable than our English special. She was wearing an excellent bed-jacket of white crêpe lined with pale pink and liberally bestrewn with pale pink roses and green leaves, and her nightgown of hand-embroidered lawn, with its square-cut neck bordered with very fine Irish lace must have been some consolation, together with her Siamese cat with its clubbed tail, topaz eyes, and black paws, which stretched itself unreproved on her bed-quilt of lawn elaborately worked à jour and inset with Venetian squares. The invalid's appearance, well surrounded with banks of pink carnations, mauve sweet-peas, and blue cornflowers, left nothing to be desired from the picturesque point of view.

As a matter of fact, she was almost convalescent, and fully able to discuss my proposition that she should spend a week with me at Overstrand and let the northern breezes endeavour to substitute some wholesome red for the graceless yellow of her present complexion, which she owes to the East, and does not seem to grudge to it. Dolly came in whilst I was there, expressing the last word of skimpiness in black satin skirt and coat, crowned with a black satin pancake hat edged with a narrow flat kilting. She was just back from a month's severe ruralising, and definitely certain that she hated the simple life and must gamble its memory away to oblivion during an immediate week at Dieppe.

Thursday.—H——, our tame explorer who thinks all who live in civilised countries are "narrow," and admits that music soothes his savage breast, took me to a concert and the opera to-day. He is very wholesale in his methods. This afternoon was Mme. Liza Lehmann's enterprise, and the Æolian Hall was packed with rank and fashion, and no one was tiresome enough to suggest that the most extensive millinery was a drawback to perfect peace and good will. Under the influence of Mme. Lehmann's music no woman, or man either, with a soul to save could have an unkind thought. Her work, like her personality, speaks the first and last word of sympathy, whether in her sentimental, her warlike, or her humorous moments, and we enjoyed samples of all. Five little love songs were rendered by Mr. Hubert Eisdell with infinite charm and a distinguished absence of affectation. Mr. Julien Henry effectively united music and drama when he sang the new song, "Incident of the French Camp," words by the one and only Robert Browning. Miss Blanche Tomlin won special applause for "Everybody's Secret," and I saw Mme. Belloc sharing the general appreciation, which was great, of Mme. Lehmann's setting of her clever son's "Four Cautionary Tales and a Moral," interpreted delightfully by Miss Palgrave-Turner and Mr. Julien Henry. Mme. Lehmann graced the piano in just the right frock of chiffon, velvet-hemmed, with sleeves and vest of multi-coloured embroidery, and her fair hair banded with dull gold. Constance Collier, clad in a garment of Oriental origin, a polychromatic glory of green and orange, red and blue, recited Oscar Wilde's "The Happy Prince" with characteristic and significant Lehmann interpolations, and she recited it most admirably, and accepted our Oliver cry for "more" with alluring diffidence.

It was a pleasant circumstance, that concert, and so was our subsequent tea at the Ritz, where H—— became frankly and suddenly enamoured of a buxom damsel in a disguiseful hat of dark green wreathed with crimson and green roses, and refused to be conscious of the patent size of her feet or the crimson insincerity of the painted lips. How dull is enlightened man! Yet I forgave him much when together we enjoyed Manon Lescaut to-night. Here the gay world was gaily assembled. Mme. Kousnietzoff sang with delicate grace and perfect art, the auditorium glittered with a thousand gems, and black was still the heroine of the tale of dress.

Friday.—This evening I went to see Arthur Bourchier play in "Glass Houses," and to realise once again what an excellent actor he is, while regretting that this task was unworthy of his talent, and desiring emphatically to throw stones at the all and sundry who had approved his undertaking it. Selfishly I resented Miss Violet Vanbrugh's well-earned holiday, and wished her pretty understudy would vary the monotony of her meaningless elbow and wrist gestures.

Afterwards I supped with Robert at the Savoy, to learn that he had spent the afternoon at the Japanese Exhibition, where for about the hundredth time in his life he confessed he had met the prettiest girl he had ever seen, wearing in this instance a tussore dress belted with patent leather and gold braid, crowned with a large black hat with a wreath of black silk flowers and dull gold leaves.

Robert, like the child in the play, seemed to have heard nothing and seen nothing but the band at Shepherd's Bush, although he had a kind word to say about the picture department, and seemed so appreciative of this that I proposed conducting him to the British Museum to interview the collection of old Chinese paintings recently hung there.

After supper we sat in a sympathetic silence occasionally interrupted with "Smart!" "Hideous!" "Desirable!" "Dreadful!" and agreed in admiring two beautiful women in beautiful gowns, whom I suspected so strongly of being American that I carefully kept outside the range of their voices. Thus, and thus only, there could be no flaw in the appreciation I had for their taste in clothes. The gown of one was of dull violet charmeuse with bands of grey and a tunic drapery of saxe blue chiffon, the fichu-corsage being of saxe blue over the violet, while the waistband was of grey, and a crimson rose of much artistic value was tucked into the waistbelt. The other wore a dress of old rose soft satin with a drapery of green and mauve chiffon, the effect of the colours being definitely beautiful and enhanced by a girdle of black satin threaded through straps of old gold and tasselled with gold, gold lace doing decorative duty on the bodice of mauve and green chiffon lined with the rose colour.

Hat of mauve and blue at the regatta.

The combination of colours is a great art much practised just now. One most popular union is of purple and red; another, scarcely less successful, is saxe blue and cerise, while more sombre, though equally triumphant, is an alliance of grey and green and brown. Sombre again is a black and white striped dress which bears revers of brown linen, and a motor coat of worth which Virginia continues to discuss and to refuse to herself is made of thick violet serge faced with peacock blue linen. My self-denying sister proposes a peacock blue linen cap to crown this, draped at one side into a round ornament with dangling tassels, and why she stands upon her order of buying and does not buy is amongst the minor mysteries. The major one is how she ever affords to pay for the things she does acquire. She never receives an invitation nor completes any plan for her amusement without finding it necessary to be specially equipped in the cause. Dear Virginia! if it were not for her spendthrift habits and artless declaration that she is perpetually suffering from a deficiency in her bank balance and a plethora of admirers, the family would lose one of its most legitimate entertainments. As a subject for conversation and critical comment Virginia is inexhaustible. Next week she declares herself bound for Goodwood, where she proposes by skilful selection of the right horse to repair the ravages the season has wrought in her resources.

Saturday.—I went down to spend the day with Florence, tempted by the Bourne End Regatta, which is always sufficiently amusing and patronised. We wasted two hours of the early morning playing tennis with an indifferent sportsman, who explained the too obvious cause for each of his bad strokes. I always feel fractious when a player of any game does this, and I hate the golfer whose glory has run its course and does not shine on mine, together with the wielder of the croquet mallet who will recount extraordinary hits he made last week, and the oarsman who casts unkind reflections upon the wind and water—both elements behaving themselves atrociously to-day when later I found myself lounging in a punt at ease. I gleefully proved my classic qualifications by commenting on the row-over for the Challenge Cup with "Except Nihil—Nihil was fit," and I afterwards ignored the sport aquatic and devoted myself exclusively to the sport social, noting with amazement that the same girls were being punted by the same boys as last year. Marjorie's brown Shantung was as fresh as it was when I met it a month ago. Florence wore well a well-worn black muslin with a transparent lace yoke and large lace hat heavily wreathed with black oats and a single velvet poppy at one side, and a pretty young girl adorned a hat of crinoline straw in pale blue with pale mauve ribbon tied in a double bow at one side and double frills of pale blue muslin shading her face. This represented a new variety of baby millinery eminently satisfactory; praise which was equally well deserved by a grey linen costume crowned with tuscan draped in grey tulle. Protesting against the "no fireworks" order, Joan came down late, after having attended the Hadow-Courage wedding, and admired the mauve and blue, pink and silver of the elder girls' frocks, and the embroidery of silk, bugles, crystals, and rough pearls decorating the net tunic which draped the bride's satin gown. She had met the Suffragette procession near the park, and was so much impressed by the excellence of its attendant music that she is anxious to suggest to his Grace the Duke of Norfolk that for the Coronation street ceremonies he should seek a lady collaborator in the best Freedom circles.

Mrs. A.'s Letter-Box.

I have been persuaded to counsel through these columns all wise women who send me their dress difficulties to solve. But their inquiries must be clearly addressed to Mrs. A., "Truth" Office, Carteret Street, S.W.

May Queen.—The best trimming for the top of that white lace dress would be a binding of white satin ribbon. The sleeves would only need a chiffon lining, and a chiffon lining between the lace and the satin would be good all through, for this softens the lace and improves it generally.

Gadfly.—I like a linen djibbeh for little girls. You can get these at 15, Sloane Street, do go and see them. They are worn over a camisole and quite loose. There is nothing so pretty and they look as well on a slim child as on a fat one. Besides the linen djibbeh you might have a serge kilt and a knitted jersey. You would need little else, save a panama hat which turns down over the face with a black ribbon round it, and some sun bonnets.

WORK AND PLAY.

At the sixth birthday dinner of the Lyceum Club Dr. Helen Boucher's speech was remarkable for giving a concise history of woman in about three sentences. There was the day when she was considered to have no soul, the day when she pretended she had none, and the day when she set forth to prove that she had one. To this might have been added the day when she became self-convinced of the possession of "the body's guest." The club, declared Dr. Boucher, existed to bring together women who thought things and did things, in order that they might help each other and use their souls for the advancement, material and spiritual, of the whole world. It certainly has a remarkable record of work done during its six years of existence.

Mrs. Aubrey le Blond, having made mountain climbing almost a domestic pastime, is now specialising in another direction. She lectured recently at the Lyceum Club on Italian gardens, tracing the beginnings of the Italian garden, as we know it, to so early a date as Pompeii, and pointing out that the Raphael at the Villa Madama laid the foundation of the formal gardening which, after being one of the glories of the sixteenth century in Italy, fell into disuse, and has now been revived again. Mrs. le Blond may be congratulated on knowing as much about these sequestered spots of sunny earth as she does about ice-bound peaks and perilous precipices.

Lady Tullibardine has discovered another occupation for women. She suggests that they should spend their life of single happiness in the preparation for their days of wedded bliss. The notion is really not quite so novel as it appears, for one or two of the women's universities and higher educational establishments have already instituted chairs of domestic science, and the prospective bride may learn the scientific values of foods, the best angle at which to keep an egg in its first freshness, and many other matters conducive to the happiness of the home and the husband. Will the day dawn when the marriageable girl will be marriageable no longer unless she has the S.D.Sc. (Spinster Domestic Science) after her name?

* * * * * *

While Belgravia, in the person of Lady Tullibardine, is seeking to alleviate the lot of husbands, Mile End, in the person of one of its guardians, makes a suggestion intended to soften the hardness of the poor widow's lot. The proposal is that a woman relieving officer should be appointed, qualified to advise widows and others in charge of children receiving outdoor relief on hygiene and domestic economy. In the two proposals we have the two parts which make the perfect whole. Graduates in domestic science who fail to obtain the matrimonial degree can place their talents at the disposal of the poor widow.

* * * * * *

France, the birthplace of the feminist movement, has afforded still further evidence of the advance of woman. For the first time in history a woman advocate has appeared before a court-martial. The case came on at Marseilles, and was a very ordinary matter of desertion. Such was the eloquence of the female defender of the prisoner that she obtained a considerable diminution of the penalty. The young lady was Mlle. Isnard, of Avignon.

* * * * * *

The women factory inspectors have provided some quite engrossing reading in the Blue Book just issued by the chief inspector, and one of the features of their reports is undoubtedly the way in which the ready-made trade is increasing. This is hard on the dressmaker, but it is quite comprehensible. Large manufacturers can afford to employ good designers and good cutters and good materials to turn out blouses, dresses, and underclothing at low prices, while the ordinary woman of average or less than average means goes to a "little dressmaker" who has few facilities of seeing what is really worn and improving her notions as to material and colour.

* * * * * *

The adverse side of the picture is the sweating system. This is being got under slowly but surely. In the meanwhile, however, thousands of women are supporting existence in a way that is much too reminiscent of "The Song of the Shirt." The public can help to mend these matters by refraining from buying goods which are obviously vamped up from cheap materials to meet the passing taste. A fair price for a ready-made article will, quite legitimately, be lower than the cost of even a less elaborate article made to order. But it must be obvious to any one who thinks at all that to turn out garments below a certain price and yet make a profit the firms who do so must be overworking and underpaying their workers.

Sykes-Josephine's New Waist-line Corset is the ideal of perfection. The contour is graceful, the fashioning elegant, and the build on anatomical principles. Particulars and prices on application to 280, Regent Street, London.

LETTER FROM MADGE.

Dearest Amy,—Jim said the other day that if the English intend to be air-travellers they will have to become better acquainted than they are with foreign languages. It would be awkward to descend in any country where one could not make oneself understood. English is spoken, more or less, in all the great cities, but in small towns, villages, and hamlets there would be little likelihood of finding anyone conversant with our difficult language. An aviator of Jim's acquaintance, descending at some distance from Boulogne, found himself in this predicament, but knew enough French to say: "Envoyez chercher le maître d'école, et s'il y a un tuteur anglais priez-le de venir." This produced a University man, who knew all about the aviator in question, and was full of enthusiasm and delighted to be of use. It was an inspiration, and Jim suggests that every aviator flying to or on the Continent should provide himself with this request in Belgian, Dutch, German, Breton-French, and so on. English is now taught so universally all over the civilised world that an English tutor is almost certain to be found in all schools and colleges of any importance whatever.

And what an increase there has been during the last few years of French-speaking English here at home! It is unusual to find a man or woman of the educated classes who is not fluent in this most delightful of languages. The fluency may be superior to the grammar, but after all it is less academic than colloquial French that is required for mutual intercourse. It is surprising that more attention should not be paid to modern languages at our public schools. There would be no need to sacrifice Greek and Latin for this. Girls who cannot speak French are rare in our well-to-do classes and practically non-existent in the aristocracy. Why should their brothers lag behind? The anomaly that young men of the business classes should be better conversant with Continental languages than their social superiors in rank is produced by the care taken to equip the former with an all-round commercial education.

It seems odd that it is only in learning another language that one gains a thorough knowledge of English. The classical scholar finds the way through the dead languages, and the student of German and French gets at the heart of his mother tongue through them.

Katharine Duchess of Westminster honoured the Kensington College on Saturday last by opening the new premises at 34, Gloucester Gardens. The director, Mr. James Munford, founded this college twenty-three years ago with a single pupil, and since then it has grown to its present development. It gives special commercial training to the sons and daughters of gentlemen, qualifying them for superior positions as private secretaries, correspondents, accountants, bookkeepers, and other dignified and remunerative professions. There may be other colleges that do as much, but where is the one that guarantees an appointment to each graduate on the completion of the training? And yet there is nothing strange in this when one reflects that there is a never-ceasing demand for satisfactorily trained workers such as Kensington College turns out. Mr. Munford has had a long and wide experience in matters appertaining to education, and in his capacity as member of the London Chamber of Commerce he knows exactly what is needed in the clerk or secretary. This is the secret of his success. He himself is the Secretarial Lecturer, and his staff includes professors of commercial subjects, of shorthand, typewriting, Continental languages (natives of France, Germany, Italy, and Spain), and also a specialised teacher of English to foreign students. The rule of the college has been well described as "Appointments versus Disappointments," and Lord Lytton made for its motto a paraphrase of Dante's well-known line giving the inscription above the entrance to the Inferno:—

"Lasciate ogni speranza, voi ch'entrate," converting it into:—

"Abbiate ogni speranza voi ch'entrate."

We called ourselves peripatetic gastronomical experiments on leaving the new Chinese restaurant the other day. Friends had lauded some of the dishes, and, induced by their praises to try them for ourselves, we made up a party and took our courage in both hands. Everything looked beautifully clean, and though some of the decorations offended our colour sense by their crudity, we approved the pale-green walls relieved with white. The choice of dishes presented some difficulty, even though the English names are given under the Chinese, with just a few mysterious exceptions. Bamboo shoots had been praised by our pioneering friends, so we had some. We never want any more. Tough and destitute of flavour they seemed, and mixed in with them were pale shapes which the menu described as prawns. Their flavour was as strong as their aspect was feeble.

"What are we going to drink?" asked one of the party. "Tea, of course," said another who had noticed the little blue and white cups without handles. "Tea with crab soup?" queried one who had selected that item from the list. "What a vile idea!" and he passed a small yellow coin to the attendant and mentioned a well-known brand of a pleasant wine. "I see eggs on the list," remarked a voice, "preserved eggs, pee tan in Chinese. Let's try them!" But cautiously we ordered one portion—no more. When the eggs arrived they were black as ink. They had been buried in clay for either seven or seventeen, or seventy years, we were told, when we asked if the Chinese hens had laid them that colour. None of us could be sure whether it was seven, seventeen, or seventy. But no one had courage to try the eggs. Jim ordered fried crab, Chinese omelette, and found it so good that he had a second helping. Arthur reported favourably of shark's fin, an expensive dish, and Linda acquired a liking for "birds' nest with minced chicken." Richard viewed everything with the deep distrust of the true Briton towards the unfamiliar, but he was reassured by some excellent fried chicken. He would not venture on anything unknown, and the sight of "frog" among the available dishes filled him with insular indignation. The rest of us experimented merrily, frolicking among the very numerous items and finishing up with delicious pastries and a nice chow-chow of mixed fruits.

Winifred writes from Liverpool:—

We provincial folk have been quite gay these recent days. The pageant at Chester has been unrolling in pomp and circumstance over the green sunlit plain of Eaton Park, looking for all the world like some superb moving frieze and giving us two thousand years of history in a glance. The splendid reproduction of the historic has called forth high praise for Mr. George Hawtrey, the master of the Pageant. Chester has been thronged with Americans, who, with their inbred love of the beauty of ancient things, shopped in the rows and wandered along the walls, and inspected the quaint curios of the old cathedral town. All Chester has been "pageanting," for when we took our walks abroad in the streets we met plumed soldiers, dancing girls like orchids, picturesque groups of peasants, full-blown heroes with medalled breasts, courtiers in silken raiment laced with precious things, ladies in sheeny textures and pearl woven heads, the sock and buskin of the times, all ready and waiting for their cues to "go on." Somehow this farrago, this swashbuckling play, this complex atmosphere of colour and light and beauty seemed quite appropriate to the old-world setting—grey spires, grey walls, and covered rows—of grey old Chester.

The Duke of Westminster, who was President of the Pageant, took part as the Earl of Surrey. Alderman D. L. Hewitt, the Mayor of Chester, was King Edgar. The Hon. Sir Savage Lloyd Mostyn and Lady Mostyn, Lady Arthur Grosvenor and Lord Gerald Grosvenor, Lady Cholmondeley, and Countess Grosvenor figured in various episodes. Among the celebrities on the grand stand one saw Countess Beauchamp, Lady Helen Grosvenor, Katherine, Duchess of Westminster, Lord Haddington, and the Bishop of Chester and Mrs. Jayne.

The Congress of the Royal Institute of Public Health was held in Birkenhead (which, as you know, is just across the Mersey), and work and play was the order of programme. Mr. W. H. Lever was President this year, and in his opening speech said brilliant and clever things on everyday economics. There were meetings every day, when important problems were discussed by professors and doctors and wise men. So now we know all about "selective degeneration," the "plumbo-solvency of moorland waters," mussels and the "green seaweed ulva lattissima," and are feeling most learned in things about which we are not quite sure! Ladies contributed papers of high interest on health and housing. Mrs. Arkle, the Mayoress of Birkenhead, presided at their special conferences.

In intervals of discussion there was a charming garden party at Thornton Manor, Mr. W. H. Lever's beautiful residence in Cheshire. You have heard of his lovely village, Port Sunlight, the Mecca of all social reformers. Mr. and Mrs. Lever welcomed their guests with delightful hospitality, Mrs. Lever wearing a black lace and chiffon gown and a black picture hat. Among others who were there were Mrs. W. H. Williams, the Lady Mayoress of Liverpool, and Mrs. E. R. Pickmere, wife of the Town Clerk. A pretty reception was afterwards given by the Mayor and Mayoress of Birkenhead, Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Arkle, who are so much beloved by everyone.

Then Councillor and Mrs. Hugh Carruthers, the Mayor and Mayoress of Bootle, had a garden party on Wednesday, the Mayoress looking well in pale blue and white silk, and wearing a hat of white flowers. The Marquis and Marchioness of Salisbury came in the drenching rain to lay the foundation stone of the first house of our new Garden City. Sir Benjamin Johnson, the Chairman of the Liberal Federal Council, and Lady Johnson, and Mr. and Mrs. James Moon were the hosts and hostesses of the occasion, and Mr. W. H. Williams, the Lord Mayor, gave a luncheon for them at the Town Hall, at which Viscount Howick, Sir William and Lady Bowring, Sir Edward and Lady Russell, Sir Charles and Lady Petrie were present. As mementoes of the event Lady Salisbury was given a handsome silver trowel and the Lady Mayoress a beautifully bound album of Garden City pictures.

You will be glad to hear that we have now established a Liverpool branch of the Children's Happy Evening Association, a beautiful idea which originated with Lady Derby and the Lady Mayoress. A committtee has been formed with the Lady Mayoress as Chairman, and Mrs. Louis N. Cohen, Lady Petrie, Miss Eva Melly, Mrs. E. R. Pickmere, Mrs. F. Robinson, Mrs. A. E. Jacob, and Miss Hughes as assistants. The foundation stone of the new St. Paul's Eye Hospital and George Edward Walker Memorial was duly laid on Wednesday by the Earl of Derby, and the name of the great and humanitarian doctor who so cared for the poor is perpetuated in the way he would have loved best.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

Dearest Madge,—Although the Horse Show nominally has only a "week," it may, in some degree, be said to hold sway over the whole month of August. No Irish social, industrial, or sporting event casts such a long shadow before. In fact, from this week out the Horse Show looms large in all our arrangements and engagements. On the top of it this year there comes the aviation meeting, now definitely fixed to be held on the 29th and 30th of August at Leopardstown Park. Leopardstown comes second only to Punchestown in sporting renown for racing and contests on the mere earth. Hardly six miles distant from Dublin, its situation is charmingly picturesque, with ample spaces for flights over the surrounding Dublin and Wicklow mountains. The most exacting airman will not have to complain of any want of the element needed for his operations. You can imagine the addition to our preparations for the Horse Show week created by the aviation sequel. Amongst other things air meeting toilets will, no doubt, be added by our sex, to the always very ample dress list of the week.

The Duchess of St. Albans has arrived at her residence in Tipperary, Newtown Anner, to stay for some time. It is her own family home, and on her marriage was settled on her and her son, to the exclusion of her elder sister, Lady Blake. She was often seen at Dublin Castle during the first Spencer Viceroyalty, and was a girl of much personal charm and beauty. In those days the "professional beauty" had not yet come, and pretty girls had, as they would say now, "the time of their life." They moved in an atmosphere "clouded" with admirers, to snatch them from whom there were no dancing matrons.

Lord and Lady Granard are having a rest from Court life, and making a stay at Castle Forbes, in the remote country part of mid-Ireland, which has few picturesque spots to draw the tourists, who are specially numerous this year. There are no counties, however, which have not still unworked mines of history—Irish history has been so long out of fashion—to interest the historian and the antiquary. The joy of the explorer in finding new worlds is not greater than that of the historian and antiquary in making new discoveries regarding the old past.

Sir John and Lady Arnott are spending the summer at Mr. Justice Kenny's fine residence, Marlfield, in the County Dublin. They could not, as usual, rent Old Connaught House near Bray this season, as Lady Plunket with her children returned to the family residence, where Lord Plunket now joins them, on leaving New Zealand early in the year.

An interesting event of this month was the celebration of Mrs. Rowan Hamilton's ninetieth birthday at Clandeboye, the residence of her daughter, the Dowager Lady Dufferin and Ava. Mrs. Hamilton, who was a lady of distinguished ability, enjoys a fine old age, still taking an active part in life. She travelled from Shanganagh Castle, her residence in the county of Dublin, to Clandeboye, in Down, for the celebration, a large and distinguished family party being assembled for it. Mrs. Hamilton has the unique distinction of having two daughters who were Ambassadresses at St. Petersburg, and numbers amongst her grandchildren Ladies Plunket, Clanwilliam, and Helen Munro-Ferguson.—Yours ever, CLARE.

As you want some new sweet dishes I have procured a few nice recipes for you, and after these you shall have the entrées you say you wish for.

Iced Coffee Creams are sure to please your guests at garden parties. Make half a pint of strong coffee, using 6ozs. of coffee; add a few drops of Branson's extract, a spoonful of brandy, and a gill of strong syrup. Make half a pint of milk into custard, using one egg; whisk them thoroughly together and mix in a gill of stiffly whipped cream. Freeze the cream and serve it in small glasses, accompanied by vanilla fingers.

Crêmes à la Moderne.—Stew half a pound of ripe apricots with 6 oz. of loaf sugar and rub them through a hair sieve, mash six bananas with a silver fork, a spoonful of sugar, and half a glass of sherry; and, after allowing them to stand for at least an hour, rub them through a hair sieve. Whisk half a pint of cream with a teaspoonful of sugar, mix it with the fruit purée and place it in a bain marie. Stand this in a tin basin containing crushed ice and salt and leave it to get iced without actually freezing. Serve it in tall custard glasses and sprinkle the tops with chopped pistachios.

Crême Royale en Tasses (a supper sweet).—Soak ½lb. of dried apricots in water over night. Stew them and rub them through a hair sieve, mash three or four ripe bananas with a spoonful of sugar, allow them to stand an hour and rub them through a hair sieve. Mix the purée with a gill of syrup in which two sheets of French gelatine have been dissolved, and add a tablespoonful of brandy. Place the vessel, which may be a bain marie, on crushed ice and salt and stir the contents frequently to make it icy cold without actually freezing it. Serve it in small custard glasses with a spoonful of whipped cream on each, and, at the last moment, put a ripe strawberry on the top. Serve finger biscuits apart.

Gâteau à la crême de Framboises.—In the first place, make a round, flat Genoese cake, coat it with apricot jam, and garnish the edges with halves of glacé cherries. Mash 1 lb. of ripe raspberries with 4 oz. of sugar and rub them through a hair sieve, mix the purée with a gill of syrup, the juice of a lemon, and 3 gills of whipped cream; turn the cream in the freezer until frozen to a nice consistency, then mould it into the shape of eggs, with two tablespoons dipped in cold water, arrange them around the edge of the cake, working to the centre en pyramide. Garnish it with spun sugar or the leaves of maidenhair. Dish it on a lace paper.

Pain à la Muscovite is delightfully cool.—Rub 4 oz. of loaf sugar on a lemon, and dissolve it in half a pint of strained red currant juice, adding sugar to taste, and half an ounce of Marshall's leaf gelatine. When it is cool pour it into a tube bombe mould to set. Crush half a pound of ripe raspberries with 6 oz. of castor sugar, and, when they have stood for an hour, rub them through a hair sieve, put the purée into an egg bowl with the yolks of 2 eggs and a spoonful of Maraschino. Whisk it over a saucepan of boiling water till it is hot; add 4 sheets of Marshall's gelatine, and whisk it till it is cold. Remove the tube from the mould, fill the cavity with the mousse, replace the plain cover, and place it on ice to get firm.

Ever your loving Cousin, MADGE.

BESS of HARDWICK

By Mrs. STEPNEY RAWSON

In cloth gilt, 16s. net, with 38 illustrations

"A lively and picturesque account of this extraordinary woman. Bess of Hardwick had some fine qualities and many bad ones; indeed, the only great lady at Court with whom she can be compared was one who was at the height of her power exactly a century later, Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough. Mrs. Rawson's book contains some interesting contemporary letters and not a few piquant and dramatic sidelights on English Society in the great days of Elizabeth" Standard

INTIMATE SOCIETY LETTERS

OF THE 18th CENTURY.

Edited by His Grace the DUKE OF ARGYLL, K.T.

In two handsome volumes, fully illustrated with portraits, demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 24s. net the set.

Few families possess a richer correspondence than the House of Argyll, and in this valuable work are collected for the first time many important letters which deal intimately with high society life under the Georges. The letters extend back to the reign of Queen Anne, many being illuminated by brilliant wit, sparkling repartee, and amusing anecdote. Much interest will be evoked by the correspondence (over fifty pages) of Madame de Staël; other interesting letters are those from Queen Charlotte, the Duchess of Brunswick, Douglas Duke of Hamilton, Dr. Moore, Lady Deroy, George Washington, William Pitt, Felicia Hemans, etc. Many letters and documents are reproduced in facsimile, also an original poem by Thomas Moore and original verses by Sir Walter Scott.

PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed primarily to acquire, work, and develop the Kilimanyota and Kibongo Rubber Estates in British East Africa.

Kilimanyota Estate is situated close to Kibwezi on the Uganda Railway, to which it has a frontage of about 1½ miles, is about 2½ miles from Kibwezi Railway Station, and about 190 miles from the sea port of Mombasa. Kibongo Estate is situated about 2½ miles from Malindi township on the sea coast, and is about 75 miles from Mombasa. The area of Kilimanyota Estate is approximately 4,000 acres, of which about 170 are planted, and that of Kibongo Estate 165 acres, of which about 100 are planted. The cultivation consists of Ceara Rubber throughout.

KILIMANYOTA ESTATE—4,000 ACRES.

TITLES.—About 3,000 acres are held under a lease for 99 years from the 1st day of April, 1910, from the Government of the British East Africa Protectorate, at a rental of Rs. 455 per annum (say £30). The remainder, which originally formed part of a larger area held under a concession granted by the Government of the British East Africa Protectorate, has since been acquired by two of the present owners of the Estate—Messrs. G. M. Dean and Geoffrey Williams—at a rental of £30 per annum. The Government have confirmed this transfer, and have guaranteed that in the event of any modification of the concession this area shall be converted into an ordinary Government Lease for a period of 99 years from the 1st day of January, 1904, at the same rental. The total rental payable in respect of this Estate is thus approximately £60 per annum.

RAINFALL.—The annual rainfall is about 60 ins., and in regard to both quantity and distribution is well suited to the cultivation of Ceara Rubber.

BUILDINGS.—There is a Manager's House on the Estate, also Stores, Labour Lines, Workshops, etc.

EXTENSIONS IN HAND.—In addition to the 170 acres under cultivation, a further 200 acres have been cleared, and are now ready for planting.

NURSERIES.—These cover some 12 acres, and are estimated to contain not less than 150,000 young Rubber trees of over three months of age.

CONDITION OF THE ESTATE.—The planted area is well cared for, and is in first-class condition, clean and free from weeds. All Buildings have been maintained in good order. Tapping is in progress.

REPORTS.—The Estate has been reported on by Mr. A. B. Willett, a Ceara Rubber Planter of Kibwezi, and also by Mr.

THE ANGLO EAST AFRICAN RUBBER PLANTATIONS, LTD.—Continued.

Walter Graham, formerly an Engineer of the Uganda Railway. The Estate was also reported on in May last by Mr. H. Powell on behalf of the British East African Government. Mr. Powell is the Agricultural Expert to the Government of the Protectorate. The following is an extract from Mr. Powell's report, which is headed: "Report on the Kilimanyota Rubber Estate, Kibwezi, the property of Messrs. Williams and Dean":—

"The strong and vigorous condition of the Ceara trees with their proved excellent Rubber yielding qualities places Kibwezi amongst the best tried Rubber areas of the Protectorate. The tapping on older trees now done shows very successful results. The present prospects are bright and will rapidly increase in the immediate future."

KIBONGO ESTATE—165 ACRES.

TITLE.—Freehold.

RAINFALL.—Average rainfall is about 40 ins., which is well distributed and suitable for the cultivation of Ceara Rubber.

BUILDINGS.—There is a Manager's House on the property, and other buildings suitable for housing of Headmen and Labourers.

CONDITION OF THE ESTATE.—Telegraphic advices from Messrs. Boustead and Clarke, Limited, report that the Estate is in good condition, and the tapping of the Trees is in progress.

REPORT.—The Estate has been reported on by Mr. H. Rayne, a Ceara Rubber Planter of considerable experience in East Africa.

Since the date of Mr. Rayne's report, telegraphic advice has been received from Messrs. Boustead and Clarke, Limited—to the effect that the number of trees now found to be tappable is approximately 40,000.

EXTENSION OF CULTIVATION.

It is proposed to plant up as rapidly as possible a further 3,500 acres in Rubber. This will make a total of 3,770 acres. It is anticipated that there will be no difficulty in planting at least 400 acres this year, and not less than 1,000 acres per annum afterwards, so that the whole 3,770 acres should be planted by 1913 and in bearing about the middle of 1915. Mr. Geoffrey Williams, the Managing Director, estimates that to bring this acreage to the bearing stage will involve a total expenditure not exceeding £45,000. The total capital required, including the purchase price and costs of promoting the Company, should not amount to more than £80,000, or less than £22 per acre.

REQUIREMENTS AND ADVANTAGES OF CEARA RUBBER CULTIVATION.

Owing to a too heavy rainfall, Ceara rubber is very little cultivated in the Middle East. It requires for its successful cultivation a moderate and well distributed rainfall and a rich deep soil, both of which conditions exist in these Estates. On account of the rapidity of its growth the Ceara tree is available for tapping within 2½ years from the time of planting, as compared with 4 to 5 years in the case of Para trees. As Ceara trees can be grown much more closely than the Para variety, the yield per acre is at least as great. The cost of harvesting the latex is low owing, among other things, to the different method of tapping adopted.

Cultivation is not carried on by imported labour as is the case in the Middle East, local labour being cheap and efficient. This is a factor of enormous importance in arriving at a low cost of production. These considerations tend to show that in no other country and with no other variety of tree can rubber be more cheaply produced, and the importance of this when the inevitable fall in the price of raw material takes place cannot be over-estimated. The Directors are of opinion that, at a gross selling price of only 1s. 9d. per lb. the profits will, when the present planting programme is complete and the trees are in full bearing, amount to not less than 100 per cent. per annum, and that as at that price the demand for rubber will be enormously stimulated, there need be no fear as to its falling below that figure. Another feature of this Company which is of the greatest importance is that when the planting programme, as mentioned above, is completed, the total cost should not exceed £22 per acre.

ESTIMATED YIELDS AND PROFITS.

The approximate number and ages of trees planted are as follows:—

| Age of Trees. | Kilimanyota. | Kibongo. | Total. |
|---|---|---|---|
| 3½ years | — | 5,000 | 5,000 |
| 2-2½ years | 8,000 | 45,000 | 53,000 |
| 1-2 years | 50,000 | — | 50,000 |
| 6 months to 1 year | 43,000 | — | 43,000 |
| Total Trees | | | 151,000 |

Mr. Willett estimates the yield on Kilimanyota Estate commencing at the age of 2½ years, at ¼ lb. per tree for the first year's tapping, and Mr. Rayne's estimate for rubber of the same age on Kibongo Estate is ¼ lb. per tree.

The following estimates are based on an average cost of production of 1s. per lb., and on a yield of a ¼ lb. of dry Rubber per tree for the first year's tapping, of ½ lb. per tree for the second year, ½ lb. per tree for the third year, 1 lb. for the fourth year, and 1½ lbs. per tree thereafter, although ultimately lower costs and considerably higher yields may be expected.

| Year ending 30th June. | Number of Trees Tappable. | Yield. lbs. | Estimated net profit per lb. | Profit. £ | Estimated percentage on Capital paid up. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1911 | 48,000 | 12,000 | 4/6 | 2,700 | 7% |
| 1912 | 103,000 | 32,000 | 4/0 | 6,400 | 11% |
| 1913 | 151,000 | 58,000 | 3/6 | 10,150 | 16% |
| 1914 | 324,000 | 124,000 | 3/0 | 18,600 | 26% |
| 1915 | 739,000 | 277,000 | 2/6 | 34,625 | 46% |
| 1916 | 1,159,000 | 509,000 | 2/0 | 50,900 | 63% |
| 1917 | 1,566,500 | 818,000 | 1/6 | 61,350 | 76% |
| 1918 | 1,566,500 | 1,229,000 | 1/0 | 61,450 | 78% |
| 1919 | 1,566,500 | 1,719,000 | 1/0 | 85,950 | 107% |

The yield, when all the trees are in full bearing, should amount to 2,350,000 lbs. per annum, which at 1s. per lb. profit would give a total profit of £117,500 per annum, representing 145 per cent. on the estimated total invested capital.

QUALITY OF RUBBER.—The Rubber from these Estates is at present produced in rough sheet form, and in that form it has been valued by the Company's Produce Brokers at from 6s. 6d. to 7s. per lb. They also state that if the Rubber is prepared in biscuit, crepe, or sheet form it would realise practically the same price as Plantation Para Rubber.

VALUATION.—Kibongo Estate has been valued by Mr. Rayne at the sum of Rs. 111,650, say £7,443. Kilimanyota Estate has been valued by Mr. B. A. Willett at the sum of £30,000, making a total valuation for the two Estates of £37,443.

PURCHASE PRICE.—The Fenchurch Investment Syndicate, Limited, of 5, Fenchurch Street, E.C. (hereinafter referred to as "The Syndicate"), who are the Vendors to and Promoters of the Company, and are selling to the Company at a profit of £1,500, have agreed to sell these Estates to the Company for the sum of £26,500, payable as to £9,500 in cash, £10,750 in fully paid Ordinary Shares of the Company at par, and as to £6,250 in cash or Shares, or partly in cash and partly in Shares, at the option of the Directors. The Company will take over Kibongo Estate as on the 25th August, 1910, and Kilimanyota Estate as on the 1st July, 1910. No part of the purchase consideration is payable in respect of goodwill. The Syndicate also has the option at any time before 31st December, 1914, of taking up at par up to 150,000 Shares, part of the unissued portion of the Capital of the Company.

PRELIMINARY EXPENSES.—The preliminary expenses of forming the Company down to the first general allotment of Shares (excluding the brokerage on Shares and underwriting commission) are estimated at £3,500. Under the Agreement (D) below referred to, the Syndicate undertake to pay the said preliminary expenses which are to be repaid to them by the Company with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

UNDERWRITING.—Under the same Agreement the Syndicate undertake to procure subscriptions for 525,000 shares of the 600,000 shares now offered for subscription for a commission of 5 per cent. and an over-riding commission of 1 per cent. These commissions are payable by the Company. The Syndicate has entered into sub-underwriting contracts for guaranteeing the subscription of such 525,000 shares.

The minimum subscription on which the Directors may proceed to allotment is fixed by the Articles of Association at not less than seven shares of 2s. each, but, 525,000 shares having been underwritten, the Directors will proceed to allotment on the closing of the Subscription List.

The following Contracts have been entered into :—

A. An Agreement, dated the 18th day of May, 1910, and made between Colonel Edgar Garston Harrison, of the Army and Navy Club, Pall Mall, London, S.W., of the one part, and John Melvill Boustead and Edgar George Money, both of 5, Fenchurch Street, in the City of London, of the other part, for the sale of Kibongo Estate for the sum of £3,000, payable in cash, together with the call option at par within two years from the date of the Agreement of £500 worth of Shares in this Company.

B. An Agreement, dated the 22nd day of July, 1910, and made between John Melvill Boustead and Edgar George Money, both of 5, Fenchurch Street, in the City of London, of the one part and the Fenchurch Investment Syndicate, Limited, whose registered offices are situate at 5, Fenchurch Street aforesaid, for the sale of Kibongo Estate for the sum of £5,000, payable as to £1,750 in cash, as to £2,000 in fully paid shares of the Company, and as to £1,250 either in cash or fully paid shares of the Company, or partly in cash and partly in shares at the option of the Syndicate, together with the call option at par within two years from the date of the Agreement of £500 worth of shares in the Company.

C. An Agreement dated the 23rd day of July, 1910, and made between Guy Marriott Dean and Rosser Fellowes Marriott Dean, both of Kilimanyota, in the Protectorate of British East Africa, Colin de Stuteville Isaacson, St. Michaels, Musselborough, N.B., and Geoffrey Champneys Williams, of Allerton, Yarmouth, in the Isle of Wight, of the one part, and the Fenchurch Investment Syndicate, Limited, whose registered offices are situate at 5, Fenchurch Street, in the City of London, of the other part, for the sale of Kilimanyota Estate for £20,000, payable as to £7,000 in cash, £8,000 in fully paid shares of the Company, and as to £5,000 in cash or fully paid shares of the Company, or partly in cash and partly in shares at the option of the Syndicate.

D. An Agreement dated the 25th day of July, 1910, and made between the Fenchurch Investment Syndicate, Limited, whose registered offices are situate at 5, Fenchurch Street, in the City of London, of the one part, and the Anglo East African Rubber Plantations, Limited, whose registered offices are situate at 5, Fenchurch Street aforesaid, of the other part, for the sale of Kibongo and Kilimanyota Estates for £26,500, payable as to £9,500 in cash, as to £10,750 in fully paid shares of the Company, and as to £6,250 in cash or fully paid shares of the Company, or partly in cash and partly in shares at the option of the Directors of the Company, together with the right for the Syndicate at any time before the 31st December, 1914, to subscribe for and have allotted to them at par up to 150,000 shares of the unissued capital of the Company. This Agreement also provides for the payment of the Preliminary Expenses, and the Underwriting of 525,000 of the shares now offered.

The Articles of Association provide that the qualification of a Director shall be the holding of shares in the Company of the nominal value of £200, and they contain the following provisions as to remuneration of Directors :—

105. The Directors shall be entitled to appropriate and apply as their remuneration an amount at the rate of £100 per annum for each Director other than the Chairman, and £150 per annum for the Chairman, calculated in each case from the date of such Director's appointment. The Directors shall also be entitled by way of further remuneration in each year, to so appropriate and apply for division between themselves in such proportions as the Directors may determine, and, failing determination equally, a sum equal to 5 per cent. on the net profits of each year. In the event of a Director retiring, or for any other cause vacating his office before the end of any year his remuneration shall be deemed to have accrued up to the date on which his office as a director shall have been so vacated. All remuneration under this clause shall be paid free of Income-tax. The Directors may in their discretion pay out of the funds of the Company any travelling or other expenses of any Director or Directors whilst engaged on the business of the Company. The Company in General Meeting may from time to time and at any time increase the remuneration by this Article provided.

106. If any Director shall go or reside abroad on the Company's business or otherwise perform services, whether of a temporary or continuing nature, for which, in the opinion of the Board, his ordinary remuneration as a Director under the last preceding Article may be inadequate, the Board may arrange with such Director for such special remuneration for the said services, either by way of salary, commission, or the payment of a stated sum of money, or otherwise as they shall think fit, such special remuneration to be of such amount and to be payable during any period or periods, and to be in addition to any remuneration to which such Director would be entitled under the provisions of the last preceding Article or otherwise as the Directors in their absolute discretion think fit.

137. The remuneration of a Managing Director shall from time to time be fixed by the directors, and may be by way of salary or commission, or participation in profits or by any or all of these modes.

Mr. J. M. Boustead is interested as one of the Vendors of Kibongo Estate, and is receiving one moiety of the Consideration payable under Agreement B, above referred to, but has to provide thereout for one moiety of the Consideration payable under Agreement A.

Mr. Geoffrey Williams is interested in the sale of the property to the Company as one of the original Owners of Kilimanyota Estate, and receives £1,750 in cash and £2,000 in fully paid Ordinary Shares of the Company at par, and £1,250 in cash or shares at the option of the Syndicate.

Mr. W. R. Davies is sub-underwriting 50,000 shares of the Company.

Copies of the Reports of Messrs. Willett, Graham, and Rayne accompany the prospectus, and form part thereof.

Mr. Geoffrey Williams, who has resided on Kilimanyota Estate and who has managed the property jointly with Mr. Guy Dean, has consented to act as Managing Director of the Company. Mr. Guy Dean has consented to act as Manager of Kilimanyota Estate.
